"LONG LIVE KOREA! LONG LIVE KOREA!" The cry continued to echo from the fog. Kangwon couldn't tell if his comrade was still one of the people giving it.

More soldiers streamed by them, clearly exhausted, more than anyone should be, worn and haggard and beaten down. But they still went, throwing themselves into the fog to reach the guns their dead comrades had been manning. Not to sink the destroyers or wipe the reactionaries off of Hwangto Island. Not to win. Just to keep the counterfire up for the possibility of a landing, and to show that they still could.

A young man burst from the tunnel, looking around wildly before his eyes landed on Kangwon and he threw himself at him.

"I- I din't know what to say," he babbled, the cheap paper Korea had given him clutched in his hand. "I din't know what to tell her, I din't and now- Do you have another pencil, please tell me you have another pencil!"

Kangwon looked to Korea, who shook his head. "I'm sorry," he said.

The man's eyes filled with despair, and before Kangwon could stop him, he'd whipped out his military blade and almost severed the tip of his finger. He dropped to his knees, spreading the paper over them with shaking hands, using his blood to write sloppy characters.

He stood, shoving the letter into Kangwon's hands. "Kim Sanhyang, in Chaeryong, I don't even know if she's still alive, but please, please give this to her."

Kangwon held the letter flat, careful not to smear the blood. "I will," he promised past the lump in his throat.

Relief filled the man's watery brown eyes, fading as he turned to stare into the barrage of death on the shore. He took a step back, towards safety. Then his jaw firmed, and he ran forward, vanishing into the clouds of smoke and sand, letting out a battle cry.

The guns blasted, and it cut short.

Kangwon looked down at the letter in his hands. '사랑해,' it read.

'I love you.'

The smoke had started to clear as the guns shifted farther down the peninsula. Their artillery had picked up again, firing back at the destroyer and Hwangto Island. At least some of their soldiers had made it.

The rest were spread out between the hills and the shore, ripped clothes and flesh still smoking, limbs torn from bodies in sudden and violent amputations. Kangwon saw a man on the edge of a crater twitch, and went to go help.

Then he stopped, looking back at Korea. His Countryhuman stared into his eyes, then out at the shore, his shoulders straight as he watched the peninsula, more guns picking up and more falling silent.

Kangwon knew he shouldn't have handed himself over back then. He'd been putting too important a piece in the enemy's hands, especially when they didn't know the full extent of how the Commands worked. And while he'd managed to keep the injured militiamen alive until Seoul...

He'd read the document smuggled out of Geoje. He didn't think he'd saved them for long.

He couldn't risk getting sent into a recuperative coma now. If Korea had needed him last year, he needed him now more than ever. For the germ warfare, for the casualties after this battle, for keeping their unit healthy. For the well-being of the Republic.

Kangwon wasn't any more important than any of their soldiers. But Kangwon province was. Even if he hated to say it. Even if he had to curl his fingers so tight into his palms that the burns there burst to stop himself from going to help.

Even if he knew if he wasn't here, Korea would be down there.

The stretcher platoon eventually ran past him, hurrying down to the shore, taking advantage of the ship being trained on the artillery to look for survivors. But the man on the edge of the crater had already stopped moving.

Two months was the average for a post in Wonsan, even when they didn't have enough active-duty soldiers to rotate them that often. Not because they were moved to other posts. Because they didn't survive longer than that.

One hundred thousand people had lived in his capital before the war. Fishermen, washerwomen, factory and rail workers, children that spent their days playing by the docks, getting underfoot and jumping into the deep blue waters.

Now there were only soldiers. And they weren't here to live.

'A city of death,' an American admiral had called Wonsan on the 100th day of the seige. Today was the 494th.

He stood with Korea, watching the corpse of their city be desecrated and their people die. His Countryhuman's face was expressionless, his arms folded tight behind his back.

This felt like some kind of punishment. But Kangwon knew it was a twisted attempt to make him feel better. Korea was trying to show him that as badly as he was hurting, as stressed as he was, their people were worse off. He wanted him to realize there wasn't any reason for him to cry when others were suffering far worse.

Kangwon couldn't feel that way. They were all in pain. It didn't matter who was in more of it.

But still, in a twisted way, he did feel better. As the shouts and screams of his soldiers echoed over the shore, as the stretcher women hauled dying and dead men back into the tunnels, as more people came to stand next to them, poised and ready to die next as the sky filled with toxic smog, something inside of Kangwon settled.

These soldiers, his soldiers, from Muncheon and Anbyon and Incheon and here, Wonsan, and all across the country, knew this posting was a near death sentence. That was what they were- suicide squads. They were here to keep the guns going and keep the enemy from their shores, and to almost definitely die and be replaced.

But still they came, and they fought. Even when some broke and surrendered to the enemy or accepted the bribes, the majority charged forward to make sure the defense wouldn't slacken for even a second, so that their reserves wouldn't have to repel an invasion, so that the Americans and Rhee's men couldn't rape and slaughter their way across Korea again. They gave their lives so that the children in the Mangyongdae School and the orphanages across the north could scrape some semblance of a normal life out of the war, to protect children like Yun Jin-suk and the boy whose hand he'd held.

They sacrificed so that he and all their people could remain free. And he let them, so that he could save those they were protecting.

He knew he'd never get a real answer on if people naturally tended towards good or not, or how they affected him and the others. But he could say confidently that his people were good. Not perfect and incapable of being selfish or cruel or any of the other things that people could be. But good.

And if he really was a half-formed lump of clay on the potter's wheel, how could he worry about what he could be shaped into when these were the hands doing it? How could he worry about what Korea could be? All he had to do was help Liberate their country and make sure the nurture they received would turn out more people like them.

'Our people.'

Kangwon's head throbbed with the empathetic fever and his stomach hollowed out with the empathetic hunger, but his heart swelled, aching and tender as his body burned with his people's. The earth underneath his boots trembled in time with the artillery and cannons, and as a round slammed directly into a dug-out and the ground exploded, he felt a pain somewhere deeper than his skin or flesh, sharp and hot, like the moment a candle flame flared as you blew it out. It felt like if he grasped under his ribs, somewhere beyond what you could reach with a scalpel, he could seize a fear, a grief, a burning, poignant triumph that weren't quite his yet belonged to him more than any of the paper-thin emotions he'd ever felt before.

"Manse," he murmured at the same time as Korea did, burns crawling over them both, reaching up from the bandages on his Countryhuman's neck.

Then the flame went dark, and all he was left with was the grief he couldn't imagine ever thinking was paper-thin, and the sight of a new soldier rushing to take up the howitzer.

Kangwon's eyes burned and his feet itched. But he kept them open, and he stayed still.

After all, war wasn't won without sacrifices.

—

As North watched the decimation of Wonsan and the sacrifice of their people, the song that haunted him grew quieter. Not slithering out of his mind, but settling among the names from today, wrapping itself gently around them, less of an invader now. More like it belonged. Not in the way he'd wanted, but... good enough.

As Kangwon breathed "Manse" at the same time he did, he knew he was feeling the same great ache North always did. He chanced to look over at him.

His province was watching the ships and enemy batteries bombard the peninsula, ravaging sand and bodies, unblinking. Like North, he didn't flinch as a round rocketed into the hills, making the earth above them quake as rocks and soil rained down.

His expression was sorrowed, but there wasn't a single trace of despair. His lips held a sad set, not trembling in fear or agony, and his heavy-lidded eyes shone, not with tears, but love, and that deeper feeling. It swallowed up the pain.

North felt the tension leave his shoulders.

He didn't look like South anymore.

His skin hadn't stopped burning for a second, but now it grew worse. He felt the burn gash that had just healed split open again, hot blood soaking the bandages on his stomach.

Behind them, the flickering lights finally went out, plunging the entire tunnel into darkness. Confused cries and exasperated sighs echoed from down it.

"Odd," one of the soldiers with them murmured. "Cables were just serviced. And we've taken worse hits than that without them getting cut before."

"It wasn't your cables," North said with none of the heaviness he felt inside, eye still fixed on the ruins of Wonsan.

He knew every tunnel and dug-out in it would have just gone dark, along with nearly every light in Korea. America had finally finished eliminating the target he had been trying to since yesterday.

"They just destroyed the Supung."

'In Wonsan, you cannot walk on the streets. You cannot sleep any time in the 24 hours unless it is the sleep of death. Today marks the 100th day of the siege. It is a city of death.'

By the way, everything about kidnapping fishermen and sending Rhee troops in to bribe civilians and sabotage rail tunnels is openly admitted to by the US. They are very proud of it. They're also very proud about the literal hundreds of millions of dollars they spent on ordnance to continually fire on the city (thousands of shells in each salvo) while their civilians at home didn't have free healthcare or schooling. They talk very highly of it.

Also obligatory I hate the UN rant where I go insane.
Soviet representative: Hey guys, the UN doesn't have anything explicitly condemning biowarfare, and there's a few states that never ratified the Geneva Protocol against it, so here's a proposal for a resolution for them to ratify it and for the UN to condemn biowarfare while the Disarmament Commission works on the methods for limiting it.
American representative: This is actually a very sensitive subject for my people because we are NOT using biowarfare in Korea. Honestly only a historian would care about why we didn't ratify them. Also I think we as a society have moved beyond the Geneva Protocol. Also when you said if a state that didn't ratify the Geneva Protocol ever used those weapons against you, you could use them to retaliate (which the other major states also said) that clearly meant that you can use those weapons first on anyone you want. Since anyone could really use germ weapons anyway there's really no point in signing anything at all. We need to eliminate aggression, not the methods of aggression.

...YOU INVADED KOREA. IF YOU AREN'T GOING TO BE PART OF ELIMINATING AGGRESSION, WHY CAN'T YOU JUST SIGN THE THING AGREEING NOT TO USE THE WORST METHODS IN THE MEANTIME.

Also not a word in the resolution about Korea. Mr. Malik didn't mention the war at all. Not a single sentence that could be used to imply that anyone agreeing to the resolution has used biowarfare or will stop using it. And since the Soviets already had the 'If a state that has not signed it uses germ warfare on us, we will retaliate' clause, it wasn't like it would be opening the way for them to say 'we know you're using germ warfare in Korea, so we can now attack you.' It had to be germ warfare used on them, and even if it was, they could already do that. Same for China and Korea, since their current governments hadn't been around to ratify it and weren't part of the UN. It was just a simple request that the six UN states that didn't ratify the Protocol ratify it. And the US jumps through hoops just to justify that no, they will not say they won't commit germ warfare, thank you very much. And then the other right-wing states (no Socialists or anti-Imperialists at all in the Security Council at the time) dogpile him and go 'Oh it's just propaganda, why should the US ratify at all when it's not like words would actually stop anyone, we need a better anti-germ warfare thing to come along eventually.' WHY CAN'T THEY JUST RATIFY IT ANYWAY. WHO CARES IF IT CAN'T ACTUALLY DO ANYTHING. THERE'S NO WORDPLAY TRICK IT'S LITERALLY JUST 'HEY CAN YOU SAY YOU WON'T USE GERM WARFARE LIKE THE REST OF US.' YES THERE NEEDS TO BE SOMETHING MORE BINDING AND COMPREHENSIVE BUT IN THE MEANTIME WHY CAN'T EVERYONE BE ON THE SAME PLAYING FIELD OF 'I PROMISE NOT TO USE BIOLOGICAL WEAPONS.' Genuinely if I was alive back then and I didn't think the US was using germ warfare in Korea, the fact that they were in the UN moving mountains to justify avoiding ratifying the 'we won't use germ weapons' protocol would change my mind. The Chilean representative says the Soviets are suffering from psychosis PSYCHOSIS for even suggesting it. ????????

Then in another place fucking Jebb starts implying that the idea of germ-infected chicken feathers is not only foolish but insane, like feathers aren't proven vectors for germ carrying. They are gaslighting Comrade Malik. UN meetings in the 1950s were about putting Yakov Malik on the floor and mass gaslighting him.

I would bring a weapon to work if I worked at the UN. Mr Kyrou of Greece and Chile man and fucking Gladwyn Jebb you better hope you're dead and rotting. I am not exaggerating when I say the average UN representative during this time deserved an awful fate. I know this seems like an overreaction but the Turkish rep says the UN Charter was formed to keep friendly relations between nations and the CCCP is turning them bitter by accusing the US of germ warfare, and Jebb says the Soviet Union should stop its 'hate campaign' and agree to 'reasonable political settlements' so the world can have peace and recover from the Nazis.
YOU ARE BOMBING KOREA. KOREANS CAN'T HAVE PEACE BECAUSE YOU HAVE RAZED THEIR HOMES TO THE GROUND AND ARE MURDERING THEM BY THE MILLIONS. YOUR 'ALLY' IS REFUSING TO SETTLE THE POW ISSUE TO END THE WAR AND ALREADY HID THE FACT THEY WERE USING NAPALM FROM YOU. AND NOW YOU ARE HIDING THAT THEY'RE USING NAPALM FROM YOUR OWN PEOPLE. YOU BROKE INTERNATIONAL LAW AND THE UN CHARTER AND YOU ARE COMMITTING THE NEW ORGY OF SLAUGHTER. DO KOREANS NOT DESERVE PEACE. IS KOREA NOT OF THE WORLD. I hate reading UN records I hate reading UN records I hate reading

Anyway Mr. Malik does absolutely destroy the US by being like 'You want a free world? Бггг, you voted against giving women equal pay and workplace rights, and the guarantee that people should enjoy human rights without distinction against race, property, religion, and etcetera. If that's a free world, then we don't want any part of that.'

As Long As I Can Feel It

1919

Thunder roared, lightning crashed, and Kangwon hid under his blanket.

The trees thrashed, their leaves clashing like knives as Mother Nature tried to shake them bare. The rain pounded down and down as if it would never end, filling the mouth of the sloped cave with water, attempting to wash away the world.

Kangwon wasn't afraid of storms. He liked the melody of rain and trees mixing with the roaring and crashing of the clouds.

What he hated were storms like these. Ones that came out of nowhere, when the sky had been blue. Ones that filled the air with the smell of ozone and a strange, tense energy. Where he could look out into the torrent of sheeting rain and swear he saw figures dancing in it. When the roll of thunder sounded less natural and more like shamanistic drums being beat in some dark ritual.

Which was silly. Shamans were regular people, ones who carried a important role in Korean tradition. He'd even met a shaman, once, when he was sick with a fever. She'd been kind, and told him about some herbs growing nearby that could help, getting him started on his medicine path.

But when the mouth of the cave was filled with darkness, and he was alone in it, it was hard to be comforted by that.

There was a low sound, and he jolted, terrified, before he remembered himself.

Right. He wasn't alone anymore. Korea was here.

He was unconscious, and badly wounded, but he was here.

"South."

Kangwon froze. “Korea?”

He didn’t say anything else, but Kangwon could hear him moving restlessly before it was drowned out by a lightning strike, thunder pounding immediately on its heels.

When it faded, he could still hear Korea moving, thrashing now as he murmured to himself. He was going to break his stitches.

Kangwon closed his eyes tight, wanting to stay safely huddled under the blanket. But he had to help him.

He sat up, his protection falling away, trying not to look towards the mouth of the cave as he crawled towards the other boy.

“Korea-ssi?” he tried, before confirming it was only feverish sleep-talking.

Korea’s white face was still flushed, heat palpable before Kangwon’s hand could even touch his skin. The lightning showed that his bruises were stark against it, purple, yellow, green, black, blending together with the colours on his flag.

Kangwon sighed, chewing on a nail. Was he healing? Had he done enough? Was there anything else he could do but keep disinfecting him and hoping that his body would heal itself?

Lightning flashed again, brighter this time, sheets and sheets of it. Kangwon looked up instinctively, freezing as the darkness beyond the cave illuminated white.

What was that figure? A tree? It looked like it was between the forest and the cave. But there shouldn’t’ve been anything there.

He scuttled back for his blanket, eyes squeezed shut, but froze when Korea murmured again, louder.

“South.”

South? Could he hear the rain? Was he worried for their people along the coasts?

The province hesitated, then crept back over, still not looking at the cave mouth.

"I-It's actually heading n-north," he said quietly, hoping that Korea would hear him and be comforted. "N-N-"

He squeezed his eyes shut as lightning painted them again.

"Northeast," he finished. "It might even hit Japan."

He wondered if Korea would mind his occasional nervous stutter when he woke up. If he woke up. If Kangwon hadn't made him worse somehow. If he was doing enough.

"Please wake up," he whispered, thunder making his words inaudible.

"South!" Korea said again, a cry this time. He started to thrash, and Kangwon grabbed his shoulders as gently as he could, though there wasn't an inch on his country that wasn't covered in wounds.

"North," he corrected soothingly. "It's heading north. It's okay."

The storm howled and roared, and he swore he could hear wailing out in it, an unearthly ululation that sent the hair on his arms straight up. It jittered through his body, and he wanted to turn to the cave mouth, to see what was out there, crying in the rain.

Whatever it was, he knew it would send him running for the covers again. Instead, he clung to Korea, closing his eyes as tightly as his fever-stricken Countryhuman's as he leaned over him, keeping him from hurting himself as he struggled, murmuring gibberish under his breath. Kangwon tried to decipher it, but the only clear thing was the direction 'south.'

Had he come from there? Did he want to go there? There was no way for Kangwon to know. Not unless he woke up.

Lightning *'boom'*ed nearby, splitting a tree, and Kangwon shook, whispering, "We're going to be okay," half to himself and half to the feverish boy he was holding.

Korea’s movements grew weaker, and Kangwon pressed his head lightly to his chest, careful of the thick mass of bandages, but needing to make sure his heart was still beating.

It was. Fast, unsteady, but strong.

He sighed, too relieved to flinch at the next lightning strike. “You’re going to be okay,” he assured him.

He was going to make sure of it.

Kangwon held onto Korea until he’d stopped moving, his heart rate slowing somewhat as he slid back into the waters of deeper unconsciousness.

The thunder that rumbled came almost a minute after the last flash of light, and the rain started to sound more like rain and less like a waterfall sent from above to scourge them away. Kangwon knew if he looked out the cave mouth, he would see the next distant lightning strike illuminate the small apple sapling he’d planted on the edge of the trees.

He still didn't look.

Finally letting go of Korea (giving a little apologetic bow as he did), he slid back to his own straw mat.

He hesitated, looking back over his shoulder at the slightly darker shape of Korea. He tugged his blanket over, then inched back to him.

Was it okay for him to do this?

Lightning flashed again, less furiously this time, but still enough to make his mind up for him.

He tucked his blanket over Korea, careful not to disturb his injuries, then lay down next to him, scooching over until his back was lightly pressed to the other boy’s side. He was warm, solid, even though he was incredibly malnourished. The province held still, making sure he could feel his heart like this. He could.

Kangwon sighed in relief, tugging the edge of his blanket over himself.

“South,” Korea murmured again, voice fading along with the storm.

Kangwon closed his eyes, feeling his country’s heartbeat against his back.

“We’re okay,” he murmured. “I’ll heal you, Korea, I promise.”

Hopefully his country could hear him.

—

1952

They didn’t head back to Pyongyang right away, even though Kangwon knew Korea was anxious to deal with the power situation.

He was, too. They had people on life support.

But they stayed in Wonsan the entire day, helping their soldiers make torches and start the generator, and Kangwon helped cook rations for the men manning the shore batteries. And prepared blood for them, as much as he could give. More than he should've.

They didn’t come back until nightfall, limping in under the cover of darkness after new units went to replace them. Bloodied, worn down to the bone, and with far fewer than had left.

Heung In-kun was there, and even though Kangwon had to pull long shards of metal from an exploded gun out of his chest, he should live.

Pak Jung-hwi wasn’t. Kangwon held the letter he’d written back to the little boy from the orphanage close with the bloody love letter, vowing to make sure it got where it needed to, and glad that he’d been able to give him a bit of care before he went.

The man that had shoved the confession into Kangwon’s hands wasn’t there either. Almost a quarter of the letters no longer had senders. The kids didn't have to know, but Kangwon would have to make sure he wrote letters of condolence for all the family members, letting them know they'd be personally honoured by him.

After all, he was one of the things they had sacrificed themselves for here.

They huddled with their soldiers in the dim flashlight glow in a side tunnel, packed together like pills in a bottle. Their comrades were scarfing down their rations or curled up, too tired to eat, even with the blood in them. They'd offered them some of their food, and for once Kangwon was able to get Korea to agree.

They had limited supplies, and the rail lines were being cut by bombs every day, and at risk of enemy sabotage, making sure there would be even less food for the defenders of Wonsan. But he could feel that their soldiers needed to share a meal with them.

Korea watched them eat their rice and pork, the State going through every expense to get the best rations possible to the soldiers protecting their nation. But even the meat wasn't enough to fully lift their spirits.

He eyed the man that had slumped against his side and was nuzzling his head into his shoulder, too exhausted to realize what he was doing to his Countryhuman, just seeking a bit of warmth and confront.

Kangwon watched their country rub his wrist, where he'd made his province stick a needle into the burnt skin to harvest his blood. Subtly, thinking no one was looking, he used his chopsticks to push his untouched plain rice into the man's empty bowl.

He thought about what China had said about choosing to be worshiped or devoured, and yeah- he was really glad he'd made the call to ask him not to tell Korea that drinking their blood provided the same benefits as the transfusions. He'd clearly kept his word.

Though honestly, when he looked around at his soldiers, the bit of life his blood had brought back to their eyes already fading…

Well, he knew what he'd choose, too. But not with Korea here.

They didn't leave until long after dark. As Kangwon stood outside the tunnel, his soldiers surrounding him, some even leaving the sick bay or waking up from a hard-fought-for sleep to see them off, he knew he had to do something to show them he didn't take their sacrifices for granted, and how much they meant to him. That his life had to be more important, but he still saw them as equals.

He didn't look over at Korea as he unbuttoned his tunic. His Countryhuman didn't want them exposing their wounds to their people, letting them see just how badly the war was affecting them. He wanted the provinces to keep up the appearance of being untouchable for them, so they wouldn't be afraid.

Kangwon's fingers fumbled with the buttons on his undershirt, glancing over at Korea. He'd pulled his collar up to his chin, covering the burns that had spread past the bandages.

'Oh.'

But vulnerability could be good. If he hadn't ended up crying for once, he wouldn't've had that talk with North Pyongan, and he probably would have broke down worse by now.

He'd say it was always better than the opposite, but he did know that, in the end, they weren't human. The proof was in their blood and flesh- they were representations of their country. And if their people could see the burns the American bombs had left on their land in their skin, they might start to wonder how much more it would take before they turned into cracks.

They wouldn't. For all the open sores and third-degree burns, and that worrying chasm that'd eaten down into Korea's torso, there wasn't a single crack on him or any of his cousins. He hadn't been able to look at Korea personally in awhile, but China changed in the same room as him sometimes, and he'd mentioned offhandedly that 'Your people's will must be just as strong as mine during my civil war. Your Countryhuman doesn't have a single crack on him.' Which was reassuring, and also maybe meant Kangwon was forgiven for not listening to his warning about Oslo.

He didn't expect Korea to crack. A Countryhuman only started to when its people's faith in them and their principles started to dissolve, or possibly their own. A civil war could do it, even if it didn't make them crumble completely, but after being here in Wonsan, Kangwon was sure that wasn't happening, and wouldn't. And he knew Korea's commitment to their country would never waver.

But if civilians saw the sheer amount of damage done to their Countryhuman and Provincehumans' bodies, and realized what that meant for their land, they might start to think about them cracking, and fearing it. And that was what could lead to cracking for real.

But the people here knew what was being done to them. They lived with it every day, without even sleep to help them forget for a moment. And they were still fighting. The most Kangwon could do for them was show them that he shared their pain, that it belonged to them equally, just like his blood.

He shrugged off his uniform shirts, keeping the sleeves on just his wrists as he let them slide down his back. He didn't remove all his bandages, just the one wrapped around his upper chest, undoing the clip and prying the fibres away from his sticky flesh. That was enough.

His soldiers and civilians stared soberly at the mess of third-degree burns that spread across his collarbones and pectorals, and down his arms. They couldn't see the dozens of track marks from his blood donations through the charred skin, but they knew what the patches covering him from his cubital fossa to his wrists meant. He'd put a few of them on today.

Kangwon didn't have much good skin left. Only little russet patches that didn't stick out much from the raw red with crisp black edges. And a stubborn patch that spread over his right hindquarters and down the back of his thigh that no one could see.

His soldiers looked at the bandages and dressings on his face with new eyes, seeing the burns under them that echoed those around them. The artillery and guns still fired over the hills, the worst ones deepening their wounds. As the B-29 bombers came in to finish off the petroleum plant, another patch of good skin was eaten up, connecting the burns on the left side of his chest to the ones on his ribs.

The defenders of Wonsan watched it spread, and understood what he was trying to say. Slowly, Heung In-kun raised his hand to his bandaged brow, followed by the rest of them, soldier and civilian alike, saluting. Kangwon slid his arm out of his sleeve, and saluted back.

Korea pulled his collar tighter around his throat.

The ride back to Pyongyang was quiet. His Countryhuman refused to answer his questions about the Supung, saying he'd do it tomorrow.

He was looking at him again, but too much now. His eye kept straying back to Kangwon's chest, covered by his uniform.

The province wished he hadn't had to show him, too. Like with his tears, he knew he'd see each patch of burned skin as his fault, even when it wasn't. He was making himself look at Kangwon because he felt like he wasn't allowed to look away, the same way he'd used to stare at Bong-nam's healing lash wounds in the cave when he thought they didn't see.

His province couldn't muster a smile, but he dimpled the edges of his lips at him. Korea turned his head.

Back in Pyongyang, surprisingly he had the truck take them to the muster point instead of any of the hospitals, where China was waiting with the camouflaged Jeep, along with… the Premier.

Korea's shoulders hunched as he saw him waiting, but the back of the truck was empty, so there was nowhere to hide. Kangwon watched their Premier take him to the side, and after a brief, hushed conversation (that he got the sense relieved and irritated Korea), his Countryhuman stomped back over, wordlessly snatching the Jeep keys from China and throwing himself into the driver's seat.

Kim Il-sung smiled at Kangwon, inclining his head before heading to his own vehicle.

'Good.' Korea was just as sleep-deprived and low on blood as he was. There wasn't anything he could do about the Supung tonight. If it wasn't still being bombed, they probably already had an engineering team on it.

Kangwon really hoped it was just the power facilities that were destroyed and not the dam itself. All that water…

"Good trip?" China asked as Korea hit the gas. When he didn't answer, he said, "You seem a bit light-headed. Should you be driving?"

Kangwon was surprised again when his Countryhuman headed straight for the bunker, still not taking him to the hospital. He guessed he thought he'd done good today.

That warmed him, even if he wanted to get back to the hospitals and do damage control. They had generators, but they'd have difficulties powering everything, and required too much fuel.

But like sharing rations with their soldiers, he got the sense he needed to sleep in the bunker tonight.

Pyongyang was always dark at night, just like everywhere else in Korea. But as they drove through the ruins, it felt even darker.

Now Kangwon was in his bunk, thinking. Even with the sound of his cousins sleeping peacefully around him, he still couldn't close his eyes. The phantom echoes of the guns in Wonsan kept him up, pounding in his flesh.

Were Heung In-kun and Kim Ju-kyu alright? How many of his soldiers had already given up their lives in the time it'd taken to drive back here? How many would be gone when he visited next time?

After awhile, he got up, making his way down the hall to Korea's room, pushing the door open with as little noise as possible.

"Korea," he said quietly, knowing he'd still be awake. "Can I sleep in here tonight? I'll leave before China wakes up."

He was counting on his Countryhuman to get up before everyone else to 'borrow' the Jeep, and get him back to the hospital as soon as possible.

Korea didn't answer, but he heard his clothes rustle as he rolled onto his side. Kangwon slid in, carefully closing the heavy steel door and creeping over, lying down on the edge of his bedroll, turning his back to his.

When he'd first met Korea, his breathing had been either too quiet or too loud, rattling wetly in his lungs with each jagged gasp or fading to a faint, shaky tempo. Both made Kangwon get up to check him every minute, convinced he'd screwed up and was about to lose him. Now he couldn't hear him at all. But the silence comforted him. He could still feel him there. His familiar presence was like a poultice, even if it was cold and made of bitter herbs.

"I'm not like you or China," he said after awhile, keeping his voice low. "I can't think the world is against us. I won't."

He had to believe that the Westerners and the people in the nations that followed them were just as capable of being good as their people. That his workers and soldiers had more in common with American workers than Korean capitalists. That the class divide, was the deepest divide, not race or nationality or anything else, and that one day it would be erased.

Korea didn't answer, and he inhaled deep.

"But you're right," Kangwon murmured, pressing his fist to his chest, feeling the burns there. "We can't trust them."

It didn't matter what had made America the way he was. If his people shaped him or him and his beliefs had shaped them. They were the way they were. Like CCCP said, they'd made their choices. Kangwon's people chose to give their lives just to keep guns firing for someone else's sake, and America's couldn't even choose to refuse to kill for their own. It wasn't nature that had made them that way, some immutable law that couldn't be changed- it was nurture. The twisted 'nurture' of capitalism and imperialism that had been breeding in America for over three hundred years.

But that was the way they'd been grown. Just like the other Imperialists and monarchists, Japan, Britain, Norway. Decades of nurture couldn't be overcome easily, let alone centuries, especially when you didn't even want to try. And from America's mad-dog grin, Oslo's icy disaffected stare and crown of bronze, and the glimpses of Japan's cold feline eyes he'd seen on Paektusan, he knew none of them ever would. Their roots were too deep, too twisted, watered by years of conquest and being treated like gods and kings. Their natures grew in their societies, choking their people, suffocating them like mint overrunning an herb patch, making sure any nurture they received came filtered through shade and from soil that they leeched every bit of nutrients out of, turning them stunted.

Kangwon believed in people. He believed that the Americans and Japanese and Norwegians could overcome their country's natures. They could find better ways to grow, out of the dark and into the light, like them.

But he didn't believe in their nations. He didn't believe that the Countryhumans and provinces that had spent centuries directing how their people were formed would ever tolerate them pruning back their leaves and changing the way they grew.

Some countries had gaping wounds carved into them by colonization and exploitation, and once they were cauterized, their societies could start to heal. But others had blighted roots, rot that went all the way down and couldn't be fixed until their Countryhuman put a gun to his head in a private bunker.

And they could only be uprooted. The way Korea would've had to be if Joseon had never been dissolved.

"If they actually invite us to the vote, we should let the Red Cross in," Kangwon said. It'd just give America fuel to say they were lying if they didn't. "But I don't want them here."

America and all his puppets needed to have their roots torn out of the ground and burned, with new seeds planted before Kangwon could ever trust their people as a whole. He knew there wouldn't be anyone like Adolfo or Jepp on the Red Cross investigation team. They would be people like Gillies from the POW holding camp, or South's American guards, or the ship captains that sent reactionaries in with the supplies they were depriving their people of, trying to make them turn.

Or worse, like the pilots that brought sickness into their country, knowingly or not.

He didn't want them on his soil, bringing information back to America so he'd know how to poison them better or talking over the ISC after they risked their reputations to investigate. Whether they lied or just didn't want to believe it, he didn't want to give them a chance to let the rest of the world pretend there was nothing happening in Korea, that Kangwon and his comrades weren't working themselves to the bone in the hospitals and military units to keep people healthy, that he hadn't had to watch hundreds of people waste away and hold them down as they struggled and hold their hands as they died for the past year.

He didn't want to have lost his brother for nothing.

"I don't think we're the only ones we can trust," he whispered to Korea, closing his eyes tight. "But we are the only ones we can depend on."

He trusted China and CCCP and all their comrades. But it was different. The only ones he trusted with the future of their country were Korea, his cousins, and their people. And himself.

Korea still didn't say anything, but Kangwon thought his silence felt proud. And maybe a little sad. Or maybe those were both just wishful thinking.

It was past midnight now. June 25th. Two years ago, SH had given the star eyepatch he'd made for Korea to him. Two years ago they'd been sleeping in the barracks with their soldiers at Ongjin when Rhee had launched his attack across the 38th Parallel. Two years ago, war had came to Korea for real. Two years later and it was still here.

Kangwon hesitated, then carefully shifted back on the bedroll. Korea tensed as his shoulder blades touched his, but he didn't move away. So after a second, Kangwon moved closer, pressing their backs together. Korea's spine quivered against his, then went limp.

Kangwon's screwed shut eyelids relaxed, and he let out a breath.

It didn't matter what had made South turn out so different than his Korea either. Kangwon knew when their country was Reunified, their people would rebirth him. The traitors didn't have the will of their nation, nothing they did could change Korea at his core. And even if something in South did, Kangwon would be here for him.

He was never going to lose his Korea.

He'd show him that he had someone to depend on, too. That he was reliable and wouldn't ever crack. That no vulnerability his Countryhuman showed could ever make him lose faith in him, or in their victory.

Maybe then he'd let Kangwon take care of him again.

The deep sleep he'd been hunting for months came easily tonight. He fell asleep with his back pressed to his Countryhuman's, feeling their burns spread, and his heart beat against him.

(You)

Matching North flashback POV was at the end of the Pestilence and Plague chapter, if you want to read that with new eyes. Ehe. ^^

Also for the shaman in Kangwon's backstory, I like to believe she was a ghost. You could consider her a living person or maybe a feverish manifestation of his common sense telling him about medicinal herbs, but I really like to think she was a ghost. He's terrified of spirits, but he's actually met one before and she was literally the person that got him started on his path of saving people.

Modern day North doesn't let anyone sleep with him, so this would take place from the 60s to 80s.
South Pyongan telling Hae she's the favourite and gets special privileges Hae: 'Well, ah am the fav'rit, but ah don't get special privileges. Korea treats us all equal.'
South Pyongan: 'Oh yeah? So he'd just let anyone sleep in his bed, right?'
Hae: 'He would. Y'all just never ask.'
Kangwon, knowing North would kill him if he ever told them about this: '...'
South Pyongan: Okay, bet. mischievous look towards Chagang
Middle of the night, knock on North's door.
North: What?
Chagang opens it, standing there with a blank expression
'Can I sleep in here?'
North: '...Fine?' baffled
North and Chagang lying on opposite sides of the futon, both in their 'military' (man dyingoftuberculosis) position, both with eyes wide open

Lights Out

Six hundred and seventy planes. One thousand five hundred and fourteen sorties. That was what it had taken to wipe out Korea's power.

North had six hydroelectric power systems, counting the Supung. Between June 23rd and June 27th, four of them had been destroyed entirely.

And it hadn't stopped there. Yuchon, Chaeryong, Haeju, Changyon, Naemokbang, Chungdae-ri, Mangyo-ri, transformer stations all across their country had been fully eliminated, systematically wiping out their power grid. Out of their thirteen power plants, only two were even capable of functioning anymore.

Over ninety percent of their electricity, the lights in their factories, in their military complexes, their communication hubs, their homes, their hospitals, gone. Extinguished.

They needed the factories to keep turning out ammunition for the army to keep the enemy away, to repair the few tractors they had that were needed to work the fields and the trucks and trains needed to get supplies to the front and places like Wonsan. They needed their telegraphs and phone lines to communicate across the country to give divisions their orders and keep people calm. They needed electricity to operate the purification stations for their drinking water and the pumping systems themselves and the life support systems in the hospital and keep their people from living in complete darkness. They needed it to live.

They had generators in the important places, hospitals and munitions factories, but not enough, not powerful enough, and if they broke they needed parts to replace them, parts they couldn't get if the machines in the factories couldn't run. And they ate through fuel they couldn't process right now because all of their refinement stations had been destroyed too, which meant they had to import it from China and CCCP because they weren't allowed to trade with anyone else, which meant the already enormous number always lurking in the back of North's mind was going to shoot higher, to astronomical proportions, above the reach of any bird or bullet or stupid fucking fighter-bomber.

As he stood on the hill above the Supung Dam with his pulse pounding in his temples, looking down at the cratered ruins of the hydroelectric station at its base, the warped and unmoving turbine blades, the twisted steel beams and scattered machinery of the transformer yards, his chest tightened, rising and falling in shallow pants, too shallow to get oxygen in. His skin itched under the burns like there were insects in it, but he knew if he scratched at it, it would slough off under his nails. There was a dreadful burning inside him, a heat forcing its way up his throat, and he felt like he was going to-

"Korea."

A hand touched his shoulder and he flinched away, spinning to stare at SH with a wide eye.

Her gaze was concerned but he couldn't see if the rest of her face was because she was swaddled in bandages, cocooned in them. The other three hydroelectric plants had all been in her province, and her entire face had become an awful blackened crisp, a death mask like any one of the tens of thousands of their people burnt to death by the napalm.

She blamed him, he could see it past the fake worry, the cold accusation in her eyes that he had promised this would be over by now, that they would be in Busan two years ago, before millions of their people had been murdered, before all of their power could be wiped out, before she knew what it felt like to truly burn alive.

"Don't touch me!" he snarled at her, his heartbeat shaking his entire body.

Two years and three days ago the war had began and two years and three days later they were still fighting it. Two years. Two years two years two years two-

"Korea." SH put her hand on his shoulder again, not letting him shrug her off, even when he bared his fangs at her.

"It's okay," she said, smiling. "We'll fix it."

As the smile pushed her cheeks up, they broke open. North watched watery red flowers bloom over the bandages that covered her crimson magnolia, and his teeth locked down.

"Look at the bright side," she said, gesturing down the hill with her other hand, the fingers all thickly wrapped. "They didn't break the dam."

North looked away from her smile, down at the Supung.

It was true. There were blast marks on the barrier that held back hundreds of thousands of tons of the Amnok River, chips and divots in the grey surface. But none of the bombs had been strong enough to penetrate the ninety-seven metre thick concrete.

Relief flooded his body so forcefully he almost shook as he finally let himself accept that the thing he'd feared most when the lights had went out in Wonsan hadn't happened.

The Supung Dam was unbroken.

The towns and dug-outs and border crossings downstream were safe. The POW camps were safe, even if the thought only eased his tension because they were held in villages next to those his civilians lived in, and his guards were there. And the farmland was safe, too.

Right. It was just electricity. Korea had survived without electricity for most of its existence, and so had they. They could fix it.

That choking feeling left his throat, melting and running back into his chest. He shrugged off SH's hand, less aggressively this time, and she let him.

"What fucking bright side?" North Hamgyong grunted from his other side. "The entire damn country's gone dark. And who's 'we?' Me and the god-lover are the ones getting sent down there." He jerked his head at North Pyongan, who was looking sadly down at the dam.

"If you like, I could help you get down there faster," China offered from a few paces away on the mountainside.

"Why the fuck are you even here?" North Hamgyong snapped.

"I'll remind you that this plant also supplied over twenty percent of the power we use in my northeast," the other country said placidly. "This is very much a joint issue."

North grit his teeth.

Liaoxi nodded, looking to Liaotung, who said for her, "We have a lot of industry in our provinces. We need this plant running again as soon as possible."

Clearly not able to resist rhyming for long, her sister added, "And even if we did not, for our comrades' sake, we would take a shot."

"And we're very grateful," SH assured her, not looking over at her brother.

"Grateful for what?" North Hamgyong growled. "The miguk-nom only targeted the dam now because they want to go to war with him." He flung a hand at China, who waved.

SH smiled at North. "Korea, tell him that since they know they can't beat us, they also want to force us to sign a ceasefire against our own interests, so this probably would have happened anyway."

A vein throbbed in North's temple and he snarled, "I'm not in the mood for either of you's nonsense! South Hamgyong, talk to him like a damn person. And you-"

He whirled to North Hamgyong.

"We wouldn't be where we are without the Chinese army," he growled, hating the words but unable to allow him to slander their comrades. "And we wouldn't be at war at all if it wasn't for America. He is the one that destroyed the Supung and our other plants and he is the one to blame. Not the people helping us win. This is the last time I'm going to tell you that."

Liaotung looked smug, and he resisted the urge to snap at her, too.

North Hamgyong's upper lip curled. "How do you think we can still win? They just hit all our fucking power plants. This thing powered our shit, but the Hamgyong ones powered the damn Soviets. That's why the Yanks spent so long being too pussy to hit them properly."

"Let's not use that word," SH said tightly.

"So now you can fucking talk to me?" her brother demanded before jerking back to North. "Vladivostok is a major Ruski hub and the Yanks just targeted part of its power supply. All bets are off the table."

He glared at North. 'You know what that means.'

He did.

"All of you, leave," North demanded, not taking his eye off his province. "North Pyongan, Liaoxi, Liaotung- down to the dam. South Hamgyong, go with them."

"But-"

"Now," he growled at her. The last thing he needed was the Hamgyongs' bullshit making him lose his temper more than he already had. He didn't even know why she had come when she clearly couldn't stand being around her brother anymore.

"Yes, Korea." He felt her glare at North Hamgyong before following the others down to meet their bodyguards

"You too, down the hill. I mean it."

China sighed, reluctantly following them down.

As soon as they were gone, North lashed out, grabbing North Hamgyong by the collar of his tunic and yanking him towards him.

"Quit your fucking fatalistic bullshit when we are around the Chinese," he growled in his province's face. "If you have a problem, take it up with me in private."

"You don't fucking listen to anything I say," North Hamgyong spat back.

"I listen," North dismissed. "I just don't agree."

"Then listen to me when I say if the Yanks are willing to bomb the Supung and destroy the Hamgyong plants, they're willing to do worse," the taller man growled. "You know they are."

"I do."

North read every foreign newspaper he could, every American sabre-rattling press release from Washington to Tokyo, received the reports of every fake nuclear run in the country. He felt the shadow of the atom bomb looming over him every day, far more keenly than his provinces and especially more than this one who barely read their own news.

"I am far more aware of our situation than you will ever be," he growled, tightening his hold hard enough to make North Hamgyong choke as he scoffed at him. "And I know they are getting desperate. That's why they would resort to this."

As much as those two years and three days burned for him, he knew they burned for America, too. North was aware that they were technologically outclassed, he had been from the start. When he'd heard the Americans had entered the war, he had known every step towards Busan would just get harder.

But the Yankee had came expecting an easy win. He'd expected them to get caught up at Osan, the moment they first engaged American forces, and if not there, then at Taejon or the Raktong.

But the Korean People's Army hadn't stopped. They'd crossed the river and almost made it to his last stronghold. They had retreated too fast for him to wipe them out the way he planned, and when they came back, they came back with a vengeance. Even if they could share the credit with the PVA, they had still Liberated Seoul again, still came back after it had fallen. They had managed to draw out a war that should have been over in a month if you looked solely at their economies, military technology, and numbers to two years and three days, and they could draw it out even longer, electricity be damned.

North had expected to struggle. America had expected to win. And only one of their expectations had been fulfilled. Now the Yankee either needed his 'easy' war with China or to settle Korea permanently in a way that made them capitulate enough to say he had won. And he needed it now.

"They aren't getting desperate," North Hamgyong retorted, choked by his fist. "They're getting tired of this shit."

"Same thing."

"And they both end up with us getting nuked."

North Hamgyong grabbed his wrist and something in North spiked, almost hoping he'd try and tear him off so they could brawl and he could get rid of the tightness still constricting his chest. But he just crushed it in his grip.

"Korea, what use does rebuilding the plants do when they're just going to get bombed again?" he asked, eyes flashing desperately. "We know they're willing to hit them now, so we know they'll do it again."

"What use does rebuilding the rail lines or the factories do when we know they're just going to get bombed again?" North challenged, tightening his hold in retaliation.

"The power plants aren't the same," his province said through gritted teeth. "We can't hide them in rail tunnels or build them underground. That's why they've been getting so fucked up, even before this. The Supung plant is always going to be part of the dam, it's always going to be a static target. And the next time the Yanks come for it, they're going to split the fucking dam."

“Then we’ll fix that, too.”

“And then it gets fucking bombed again!” his province cried, his bones grinding in his grasp. "Just like the rails!"

North welcomed the pain as his burns crackled.

“Then what do you propose we do?” he demanded, frustration peaking. “Give up?”

North Hamgyong didn’t answer, gritting his teeth.

He lowered his voice. “Do you want us to give up, North Hamgyong?”

“No!” he snapped.

“That’s right, I know you don’t.” North released his collar, wrenching his wrist free, ignoring the way the burnt skin degloved. “You never gave up against the Japanese or during the tactical retreat. I know you don’t want to see these damn Yanks or Rhee and his sell-outs running our country. So what the fuck do you want to do? Because those are our options- rebuild the power plants, get our power back, and keep fighting, or give up. There is no third option, there is no other way out."

‘None.’

“Unless you want to kill yourself,” he aggressively offered. “And if you do that, I’ll erase your province and give it all to South Hamgyong.”

“No fucking way,” his province growled, eyes flaring. “She doesn’t know how to manage Chongjin.”

“Then those are our only choices,” North repeated, fingers stabbing into his bleeding palms. “Keep fighting or lay down and roll over.”

North Hamgyong bared his teeth at him, spinning to kick at a rock before spinning. “I don’t want to give up. I’d rather we all die fucking screaming than live on our damn knees.”

“Then what’s the point of saying the things you do?” North demanded, frustrated. “What’s the fucking point of acting like it’s hopeless if you’re not going to give up?”

If South had acted the way North Hamgyong did in their prison shack, constantly moaning about how they would never be free and were going to waste away and die in there, it would have driven him crazy.

Listening to him talk about how they would make it out without ever trying almost had.

But they were trying. Every single man, woman, and child in Korea, every worker, soldier, peasant, patriotic petty bourgeois, was trying. He was trying. He had to. He had to keep trying, no matter what.

So what was the point in saying it was all useless?

North Hamgyong showed his teeth, fists clenching. Blood stained the bandages around them.

North waited, but he didn’t say anything. “If you don’t have an answer, then shut the fuck up. If you really believe this ends with us all getting murdered by an atom bomb, I don’t care. But I don’t want your incorrect views rubbing off on our people.”

Of course, he would rather his province didn’t believe that. But he had been fighting this same battle with him for over three decades now, and he wasn't in the mood to waste breath when their entire country was in a blackout and his skin was still prickling unbearably.

He spun on his heel, but before he could go down, North Hamgyong demanded, “You’re telling me you can look at this knowing we’re never going to be able to get our power production back up while this war is going on and not feel like we’re fucked?”

North looked down at the scorched dam and the decimated hydroelectric station. He could see almost the exact amounts they would need to replace it- the new turbines, the transformers, the building materials and import costs. Even with China and CCCP's engineers working for free on his end, and the soldier-builders and civilian volunteers, it was going to cost hundreds of thousands of won. Just for this one plant. And no matter how fast they worked, they could expect the blackout to last for a couple weeks. And even when it was over, their power wouldn't be anywhere close to what it had been before.

And as soon as they were finished, America could just knock it all back down.

"Yes," he said bluntly.

"Bullshit," North Hamgyong growled. "I saw the look on your face. If South Hamgyong hadn't been here to talk you down, you would've lost your shit."

North shouldn't have lost control. If he had noticed, China almost definitely had, too. And out of all his provinces, North Hamgyong was the one he needed to project firm belief in victory to the most.

"I was angry," North said coolly. "South Hamgyong stopped me from losing face in front of our comrades. That is all."

His province scowled. North didn't respond, keeping his shoulders back and straight, the image of unflinching confidence.

"Now if you're done with your temper tantrum, our engineers need to see us on the ground."

North Hamgyong's scowl turned to a glower. But his eyes said he still wanted to stay something.

"What?"

His province *'tch'*ed, breaking eye contact. "Fucking nothing."

"Then get to work. We have a power grid to fix."

North turned and marched away, not waiting for his province to follow.

He wasn't as skilled in engineering or maintenance as he could be, he needed more classes. He was just here to assess the situation in person and reassure any civilians in the area, and their soldiers and plant workers. Their handful of trained engineers and the foreign ones had it handled, but he needed to do something. He couldn't just sit in his office and read the reports coming in by lamplight.

Ssi-bal. Until they got the telegraphs working again, they'd be dependent on radio, which was too easily intercepted, or letters, which meant they would need to produce more paper, which was already difficult when almost all their mills were gone. He should get South Hamgyong and Hwang to conduct information work to get the peasants to start producing their own paper to sell. Hanji took longer to make than modern methods, but the craftsmen were harder to target in an airstrike than a paper mill. But with the damage to their forests, mulberry trees were getting scarce and-

"Korea." North Hamgyong caught up to him, and his voice was low enough that North's teeth scraped together.

"I don't want to hear it."

"I thought you fucking listened to me," his province grumbled.

North abruptly spin to face him. "What?"

He looked around before saying lowly, "You know the Yank targeted the dam to get to China. He wants war with him."

North resisted the urge to look around the mountainside. "And he won't get it," he said stoically. "Even if he did, he would be back for Korea."

North Hamgyong's jaw worked, then he nodded grimly. "So you do know he's never going to give up on us."

"I know we have a hydroelectric plant to repair. Don't open your mouth again until we're at the dam."

"Is that a Command?" his province asked acidicly.

"It will be." North outsped him, stretching his legs until the burns tore to keep ahead as they descended towards the Supung.

Before he'd gone far, someone said, "There you are."

North jolted as China appeared from nowhere, even though the hillside was scorched bare, almost completely devoid of trees or undergrowth. Had he crawled out of one of the damn craters?

'Ssi-bal.' Had he been eavesdropping? North hated that he might have overheard his province's weakness, or understood what he'd been implying after.

He couldn't begrudge North Hamgyong's lack of camaraderie. He was just looking out for their people first, the way it should be. But he wasn't going to entertain it.

"I told you to head down," he said to China, keeping his voice neutral.

He shouldn't have lost his temper. It was childish and accomplished nothing. And even though he didn't need to keep his spine straight for the foreigner the way he did for his provinces, he still had to. If your ally was weak and mewling, you wouldn't want to keep helping them.

He didn't need China's help. But his people did, even if it made his teeth ache. This blackout was going to cripple their livelihoods even more.

"I did head down," his comrade said, smiling. "We were up there, and now I'm down here."

North tried to unobtrusively search his eyes, the one bit he could see past the mask and scarf, for some hint of mockery or the slightest flick towards North Hamgyong behind him. But as usual, he couldn't read him.

Ignoring his words, North shoved past.

"You know, this could work out well for us," China noted, following.

North grit his teeth, fury flashing through him. “Explain how ninety percent of my power and almost a quarter of yours getting knocked out works ‘well’ for us.”

“It’s like the bounties,” his comrade said, easily keeping pace as they skirted blackened holes filled with bombshell shrapnel and dead earth. “The rest of the world isn’t entirely thrilled with America headhunting me, especially after I was already found innocent.”

It was true. North's report to the UN about the wanted posters for China returning had received a vague message back about it not being illegal, and them having dropped their own pamphlets back when they’d still had a functioning air force, but when a British journalist reporting on their side had sent the news back to his country, it had caused public outrage in some leftist and anti-American circles that they hadn’t been able to suppress yet.

“And when he basically commits an act of war on nations not officially involved in Korea by cutting my and CCCP’s power supply, how can that be seen as anything but headhunting?” China asked. “I hear it’s already caused a bit of a stir in Britain- our antagonist didn’t ask for his approval before doing something so drastic.”

There was that schism China had mentioned between the Imperialist nations again. But North knew it still meant nothing.

“It doesn’t matter,” he clipped, the sharp smell of gunpowder and singed power cables stinging his ‘nose’ as they neared the flattened transformer yards spread out along the riverbank. “He only cares because of his ego. His support for the war won’t wane.”

“No,” China admitted. “The old bulldog would never not support conquest. But America could be pressured into taking the talks seriously, at least for a week or so, and stop taking those three-day-long sabbaticals. We could get slightly closer to settling the POW issue. One step, one footprint.”

They shouldn’t have to take things one step at a time. America should just follow his own damn rules and give his people back.

"The other Western nations still want him to go to war with me," China noted as casually as if it wouldn't mean the mass murder of his people. "And Japan, of course. They're eager for him to butcher me up for 'them.' But they would prefer it wasn't in a situation where they have to get involved. If they think he's leading them a little too close to the slaughterhouse, they'll at least pretend to resist."

North stopped before they could reach the ruined plant, watching North Hamgyong stomp by to join the swarm of workers crawling over the rubble. China waited patiently.

"Are you going to declare war on him?" North asked when they were alone.

America had known he was knocking out China's power supply, too. North would bet he knew the exact amount of it he was. Twenty-three percent wasn't even a quarter, but when it came to industry, and more than that- an industrial hub, it was still a consequential sum. China's entire national production would be hobbled, from war materiel to agricultural supplies to daily necessities. It was far more severe than bombing a few airfields or 'accidentally' striking over the border. And while America could still deny the germ weapons he was dropping on Manchuria, he couldn't deny this.

No matter how you looked at it, bombing the Supung had been an act of war.

"I have no bearing on what my comrades back home decide to do," China lied flippantly. "But I would say no. None of us are exactly fans of giving the enemy what they want."

North had known he would say that, for the same reason he hadn't authorized a general assault after the first reactionary attack over the 38th Parallel after Liberation.

He knew how it felt to be forced to hold back, to take whatever the enemy did to you with gritted teeth because you were trying to spare your people, or someone else. It was a feeling no nation or person should have to put up with.

But China and CCCP were. For... his country.

Twenty-three percent. China was still rebuilding from his civil war, building his productive forces to usher in Socialism and trying to prove their system and himself to his people. If their industrial quota dipped, the liberal and reactionary elements in his country would use their crippled economic base as an argument against the five-year plan China had told North he wanted to implement. They'd had enough naysayers in Korea for their first one-year plan, even after it was concluded with every single sector having overfilled its quota.

North bared his teeth, stalking down the hill again.

"I'll remind you that just as it's not my fault the dam got bombed, it also isn't your fault," China said after him.

But he couldn't hide the accusing note in his voice, the same way South and North Hamgyong couldn't hide the look in their eyes. He was lying, like he always did, North knew it.

He couldn't be blamed for America wanting Korea so badly he would massacre their people by the millions for it, he couldn't be blamed for the Imperialist refusing to follow international law and stretching this bloody war out for as long as he could, or for his desire to conquer China and lay waste to his people, and he couldn't be blamed for China being here, or even being part of this war. He had came for his people, not him.

But he could be blamed that it wasn't over yet. Even if his people didn't blame him, even if he couldn't let it overwhelm him again, he knew the truth.

North couldn't be blamed for the destruction of their power plants or the suffering it would cause for both of their people.

But it was his fault.

Something major was actually supposed to happen around here (characterwise; Supung Dam bombing was definitely very major). For the longest time I had it in the outline, but the closer I got the more it felt wrong to have it happen so early, so I pushed it back. Hehe. I'll point it out when it happens and you can question how it could ever take place now. It's the only big outline change I've done, even though meddling with the outline is my joy in life.

The bombing of the Supung Dam was to 'put pressure on the peace talks' (force the North Koreans and Chinese to accept that America could violate international law if they felt like and to just sign anyway to abandon their POWs). Though considering the American side had been taking walkouts that lasted for three days since the beginning of June while the Koreans and Chinese wanted to just keep talking, perhaps they were the ones that needed pressure. Perhaps someone should have paid a visit to the Hoover Dam (though that still wouldn't be as disastrous because it doesn't power as much of America as the Supung powered for Korea).

Also no matter how you look at it, they were either desperate to end the war (on their terms) or trying for war with China. The Supung had a 'no bomb' order on it since almost the start of the war. Initially it was utilitarian since the US didn't want to damage infrastructure too much since they expected to conquer Korea, but once they'd burned the rest of the Peninsula down, that didn't matter. And we know they can't have held back because of the effect it would have on civilians since they didn't care about that in any other field. So it had to be because Truman didn't want to get China pulled into the fight officially (reminder that neither of them have declared war at this point). So for him to say 'go ahead and bomb it' now, it was either because they were so desperate to make the DPRK give up that they were willing to risk starting a real war with China or because they wanted to start a real war with China (or both). There was also a governmental inquiry on June 30th in the UK where they were hinting towards 'America was definitely trying to provoke the Chinese/Soviets, did you know they were planning on doing this?' It was clear they knew what the US was trying to do, and that it was an act of war.

Little snippet to read between the lines of. Some other Korea stuff in there if you look around.

https://api.parliament.uk/historic-hansard/commons/1952/jun/30/power-stations-attack

Also I think this is a jab. I just found it funny. If I have to make myself angry rummaging around in Imperialist reports, I will find my little joys in it.

https://api.parliament.uk/historic-hansard/commons/1952/jun/30/united-nations-aims

On Parliament Hill

America couldn't believe the Nork still wouldn't throw in the towel, even after over a week with no lights on.

Well okay, he could. Commies were crazy and North Korea was even crazier than the norm, thinking he'd had any chance against the United States of America in the first place, or that he had any right to try and bargain with him in the Panmunjom talks now.

He hadn't expected him to come crawling on his knees in time for his birthday or anything. He'd love to see it, of course, and he would before the year was out. A few days just would've been too soon for the guy that had hung on tooth and nail for two years now, even with his country in ruins around him.

But he had expected a little bit of crawling from his guys at the table. Enough to drop the audacity of thinking they deserved to have any airfields in Korea when this was over, at least.

But while it was annoying that the Norks were crazy enough not to understand that they were capital 'S' Screwed, he wasn't too put off by it. Actually, considering the other thing he'd been aiming for hadn't happened, it was a good thing they hadn't, otherwise he'd just be left with the whole POW question to hold up the talks. And while the rest of the world knew they couldn't let little things like international law get in the way of stopping the commies from butchering the guys he'd unbrainwashed, the rest of the world also wasn't in this to save Korea. If the prisoners were the only thing keeping their guys there, some of 'em might suddenly start showing an interest in following the rules.

'Probably fucking Britain.' His fingers tightened, pinching the brown skin of his cigar.

No, what really pissed him off was that the chink still wouldn't declare fucking war on him. Hundreds of thousands of Red Chinese killed, his border zone bombed, people dying left and right from germ warfare (if you were in a mind to believe what Communists spouted), and now a quarter of his productive power shut off. And still nothing but a complaint that didn't even come from him. He was radio silent, off parading around Beijing sightseeing or some shit, though America knew that had to be a trick, somehow. The bastard was in Korea and he knew it. He was ballsy enough to mosey on back after the trial just to mock America, but not enough to drop the 'volunteer' façade and hit back like a fucking man.

"So much for 'that's something we'll fight for,' or whatever," he sighed, tapping his cigar on the table as he looked out at the Rideau River.

"What?"

Oh, right.

"Sorry, forgot you were there for a sec." America turned back to the person across from him in the Parliament Hill suite. "What was that you were saying, 'Nada?"

Canada winced at the nickname, the way he always did now, thinking the American didn't see it. It pissed him off.

He'd never had a problem with it back when he was Upper Canada, the cute little kid that'd follow him around whenever he came to visit. But now it 'infringed on his sovereignty' or some crap like that. Not that he'd ever said that to his face.

'What sovereignty?'* The guy was still a British colony. Didn't matter that the Brit had let him sign a fancy piece of paper that said he had autonomy. Freedom wasn't something a guy with a damn monocle handed you- it was something America took and gave to the world.

Canada could've taken his freedom when America had offered it to him, but instead he'd thrown it away, right over his scrawny shoulder.

So yeah. If he didn't have a problem being an actual colony, he didn't have any right to make faces when America reminded him that’s what he was.

The suite on the upper floor of Parliament Hill was richly upholstered in a style that was way too European for America’s tastes. The walls transitioned from glossy oak at the bottom to pale plaster that was mostly covered up by boring paintings of Canadian landmarks, and the ceiling looked like it was held up by white pillars in each corner, melding seamlessly with cornices molded to look like foliage. Two plush chairs were set in front of a fireplace with an ornamental mantle that stopped getting touched the moment April hit, and a real bearskin rug (head and claws still attached) sprawled at their feet. The table they were sitting at was small, and the heavy wooden chairs had arched backs worked into clusters of maple leaves.

It was all pretty damn ostentatious, and nowhere near Canada’s style (except for the bearskin- all him, baby), and neither was the black double-breasted suit he was dressed in. He almost disappeared among his surroundings as he shrank down in his chair.

America’s little brother was a tall guy, a bit more muscular than he looked in the suit (the one America had sent him for his last birthday, he was pleased to see) since his arms were pretty built from chopping down trees or wrestling meese or whatever he did in his spare time. But for someone just under six foot, he sure could shrink pretty well.

“I was saying…” His eyes flicked down at his lap before he gave the condensed version of what he'd been rambling about for the past few minutes. “My Parliament doesn’t really like that you sent our army to K-Koojay Island? Without asking.”

His voice rose at the end, like it was a question. One America wasn’t going to answer. He took a long drag of his cigar instead.

“Sorry,” Canada said, like he’d known he would. “But with some of the… stuff people are saying goes on there, it sort of looks… bad for us.”

“And what kind of stuff are your newshawks saying goes on there?" America asked amicably, tapping ash on the table again.

"Could you use the ashtray, please?" Canada asked, eyeing the expensive hardwood anxiously as he took the bait.

"Whoops, sure thing." America pulled the white ceramic ashtray over, grinning. "Wouldn't want to go burning down anyone's house of governance, would we?"

Canada flinched. "Sorry."

"Water under the bridge," America assured, even thought it definitely wasn't.

His brother gave him a relieved smile, white eyes flicking down again. "But, uh, anyway, I'm sure you read the news. It's just stuff like that."

"Like what?"

Canada squirmed uncomfortably, taking a puff of his cigar that was long enough to make his cheeks start going even redder.

"You know," he said when he was done, slightly strained. "Trying to get POWs to switch sides, letting Mr. S-Singman? Rhee say he's going to send them to fight for him, and… torture."

He winced apologetically.

He was pretty much always apologetic, like South had used to be, apologizing for taking up space and daring to exist. Unlike his little Korean, America hadn't seen fit to break him of it. After all, he definitely had something to be sorry for.

He bobbed his head, blowing a smoke ring at the diamond patterns on the high ceiling. "Yeah, I've been hearing that crap from commie rags."

"It's… coming from some pretty respectable papers," Canada said awkwardly.

"What are you trying to say, 'Nada?'" America asked easily.

"Nothing," his brother quickly assured him. "Obviously I know you wouldn't let your army do anything like that. Even if a soldier did, you're in Korea. You'd handle it."

"A'course," America agreed. "But they wouldn't. That's more the truck of commies, don'cha think? What do you think's happening in their camps right now?"

"Those pictures that POW of yours was sending to the press didn't make it look too bad," Canada ventured.

That little stunt. They wouldn't let the Red Cross into their camps, so some idiot from the Associated Press had got the Reds at Panmunjom to send one of his captured reporters a camera. And since it was the perfect propaganda op, they had, shuttling him around to all the camps, taking pictures of men playing ball and posing with big ol' smiles on their faces.

Obviously it was bullshit. They'd be cherry-picking folks, forcing 'em to show their pearly whites with the threat that they'd never be able to again if they didn't. For all they knew, there could be a Doughboy getting his nails torn off right behind the cameraman's back. Anyone with half a brain knew that.

But it was still a real palookish move. Why give the commies free PR when they'd been doing half the job against it by refusing the Red Cross?

The reporter- Norm, Noem, Noel, that was it, Frank Noel- was one of his. He might have to make sure someone paid him a visit after the war was over, depending on what he said his time in the camps was like.

America gave his brother a disappointed look, not wasting words. It worked to make him shrink even more.

"Sorry," Canada muttered. "We can't trust anything coming from them, eh?

"Yep." He popped the 'p' with another smoke ring. "Some of your guys are in there, y'know. Only fair that the Norks have some looking over their boys in return. You telling me you would've said no if my guys did ask you first?"

He smiled at his brother, and Canada shook his head so fast the striped tail on his ratty coonskin hat swung side to side.

"No, the UN put you in charge," he said quickly. "It's up to you."

Exactly. And it wasn't up to him. Even if Canada had said no, his suits would've steamrolled him anyway. And he would have let them, just like he'd always let Britain tell him what to do. He might have a long spine, but strong it was not.

America amused himself by imagining his brother's back as a spaghetti noodle while he went on about how Korea was his command, and he knew those things weren't actually happening in the camps, but it was a matter of protocol and blah blah blah.

As the American was picturing him wobbling around after soaking in a Yellowstone hot spring, Canada said, "I just would've appreciated it if you told me first."

His anxious white eyes flicked down again, and America sighed, standing up and leaning over the small table. Canada yelped, sliding his chair in a way that totally wasn't suspicious at all, but it didn't stop the American from snatching the paper off his lap.

There were bullet points on it. 'Ask about situation in Korea, talk about POW camps, germ warfare? (crossed off), ask about what he said about bombing, talk about the dam,' each with little details scrawled next to it in small, cramped cursive that looked like it was trying to sink through the paper to hide underneath.

The first one was obviously the complaint his government had fed him, but the last two made heat rise in America's stomach. He knew what this was about now.

He raised his eyebrows at his brother over the edge of the paper, and Canada hid his face in his hands, the white band in the middle of his flag turning red enough to match the borders and the maple leaf in the center.

“Really, ‘Nada?’” he asked, disappointment dripping from his voice. “You’ve gotta use this crap with me?”

“You know I’m not good with political stuff,” Canada muttered into his palms.

Understatement of the year. America made sure to never visit on his ‘birthday,’ but he’d caught a speech on the radio once. He could hear the awkward pauses and little stutter that came out when he got nervous clear as day. It’d made him cringe to picture him up on stage shuffling his papers and reading his notes with no subtlety at all.

On anyone else it’d be funny, and hell, it sort of was on Canada, too. C’mon, he’d literally written something on his palm once for a UN thing, forgetting he was the kinda guy whose hands got as wet as if he’d been fondling a mermaid the moment he got even a little bit nervous. And any kind of social interaction made him nervous. He’d stared at his hand for five whole seconds, then stuttered out his answer. And it had literally just been, 'Yes, Canada votes to continue this discussion tomorrow.’ America had howled for five minutes straight after, slapping him on the back as they went for drinks.

But it was more than a little annoying when he remembered they were related, at least in the eyes of the world. Canada was never just Canada, he was always ‘your brother.’ That was fine, it kept him convenient, but when ‘your brother’ was the guy standing in the corner at Lake Success looking at every UN diplomat like they were about to bite, and spilling his water all over himself, it was fucking embarrassing. It was a good thing his Prime Minister felt the same way and kept him home half the time.

“This isn’t ‘political stuff,’” America chided. “This is supposed to be a birthday chat with your bro.”

His was tomorrow, July Fourth, and Canada’s was on the 1st, a date America knew he’d chosen to try and overshadow him. Sucked to be him, ‘cuz it had backfired majorly- ask anyone what the Fourth of July was and they’d say it was America’s Independence Day, the day he'd declared himself officially free of Britain and his laws. July 1st? That was just three days before Independence Day.

Canada's fault, really. Not just for trying to one-up him. It wasn't like Canada Day was the day he'd chosen to toss Britain off or wage war against him or anything killer diller like that. It was just the day the colonies of United Canada decided to merge into one, shoving Canada back into one body for the second time. All it had done was give the limey an easier colony to manage.

Not that Canada had ever been difficult. He'd always been the good one, the obedient one. When America had warned him to watch his mouth when he visited Britain and expect to be smacked around anyway, the kid had just tipped his head in confusion and said he'd never done that before. The whole time the American had known Upper and Lower Canada, before they'd united and aged into adults, they'd only been spanked three times between them.

Which was bullshit. All Canada ever did was trail behind his settlers and do what he was told. America had been far more successful than them, had actually done shit. But there hadn't been one trip where the old man hadn't bent him over his knee.

His stomach started to churn, heat rising in his body, the desire to teach Canada the lesson the Brit had turned too soft to teach him roiling inside him.

"But that's not why you called me here, is it?" America asked with false cheer. "You didn't invite me the last two years, didja?"

"I knew you were busy with the war," Canada said meekly, the way he said every-fucking-thing.

"Then what changed this year?"

America showed his teeth in a broad grin, and Canada looked down, forgetting his paper wasn't there.

"Britain put you up to this, didn't he?"

Canada cringed, confirming it without saying a word.

"I knew it."

America pushed his chair back with an aggressive scrape. Canada reached for him, but he just stormed to the arched window, puffing angrily on his cigar as he looked out at the Québec park across the river.

"Did you even want to see me?" he demanded, spinning back to him when he didn't want to break the chair over his head anymore. Not as much, anyway.

"I did," Canada said, sounding hurt. "America, I invite you for my birthday every year, and for today. You just never come for the first one."

"I'm a busy guy, 'Nada,'" he replied, annoyed he was trying to turn it back on him.

"I know, I wasn't accusing you," Canada quickly said. "I just mean I always want to see you. You're my brother."

"Just not today."

Canada sighed, putting his head in his hands. "Okay, fine. I wasn't going to invite you this year either because I thought you'd still want to stay in Korea."

Why the fuck would he want to stay in Korea? He had no air conditioning, no proper plumbing, no good food that hadn't been shipped over the ocean before it ended up on his plate. The only pros were the easy women and the POW camp, and he couldn't even go there this year with the bloodhound journalists sniffing around. Ottawa was a backwater little capital, but it was better than the city that was still barely any better than smoking ruins, or the one where the sky was constantly filled with smog and the two things you could smell were fish or chemicals. And that was on a good day. A bad one brought the stink of the slums into even the wealthy neighbourhood he had claimed.

Canada was still talking, not looking him in the eye. "But Father wanted me to talk with you about taking out the Chinese's power, and that thing you said about having the right to bomb places outside Korea without Security Council approval."

The word he'd used pissed America off, making him snap, “He isn’t here leaning over your shoulder, Canada. You don’t have to call him that.”

“Sorry,” he said reflexively. “Dad wanted me to.”

It wasn’t the word, actually, it was the way he’d said it.

“That man is not my dad,” America growled, storming back over to slam his hands down on the back of the empty chair. “And he isn’t yours either. He’s your damn empire.”

Canada leaned back, trying to sink into his seat. “I know you two don’t get along as much anymore, but he’s still our father. And- And I have autonomy now.”

Godddd he was an idiot.

“Your ‘Governor General’ can literally stop any law he wants from being passed,” America said, talking slow so he’d finally get it through his thick skull. “If Britain doesn’t like something you do, he can snap his fingers and put a stop to it. You don’t have ‘autonomy,’ Canada- he’s letting you play pretend.”

“It works and people are happy,” Canada mumbled.

Of course. And Britain didn’t snap his fingers because Canada never did anything he didn’t like. The reason the Canadian parliament couldn’t get the full independence at least some of them wanted was because the second they got too uppity, Britain would summon Canada and he’d fold like, you guessed it, a wet fucking noodle.

“Look, America, I don’t want you to be mad at me,” his brother said desperately. “I don’t even want to talk about this.”

The American threw his hands in the air. “Then newsflash- you don’t have to!”

Canada looked down shamefully. “You know how he is.”

And he knew how he was. A spineless wimp that couldn’t say no to whatever ‘daddy’ wanted.

America spun back to the window, grabbing on to the sill with both hands as he pulled on his cigar, the smoke clinging to the glass and obscuring the summer outside.

He had to cool it. He’d been barking up this tree for over a century, and he knew Canada’s brain was as soupy as the syrup he made. He hadn’t came around back when he’d been a wide-eyed kid listening to his big brother tell him war stories about busting their ‘father’ in the chops, and he wasn’t going to now that he could trick himself into thinking he was free.

No, this wasn't the same Canada as that one. He wasn’t the Canada that he’d played hide and seek with in the woods or went trapping with. It wasn’t the Canada that had backed away from him the day he’d told him to join him and break away from Britain, and whose men had come back to burn his White House down. It couldn’t be because if it was, he remembered, and America would have to punish him for it. And that shit didn’t fly, even if they were related, in whatever way they were.

‘Not that I couldn’t get away with it.’ Canada probably wouldn’t even tell anyone. He’d always acted like Britain was in the right for teaching him a lesson. He'd let an Injun war chief go or didn’t ship enough corn across the sea for his liking, and those were both equally his fault.

Yeah, he knew how Britain was. And he knew how Canada was.

He turned back, taking the cigar out of his mouth. “I don’t want to be mad at you either, ‘Nada. So let’s just bury the rutabaga and do birthday shit.”

Canada awkwardly fiddled with the raccoon tail, and he sighed, plunking back into his chair.

“You need an answer for him, right?” he said, letting his cigar rest in the tray.

“Yeah,” he admitted shamefully. “He’s just going to get on me if I tell him I let you make me drop it."

"I'm not making you, 'Nada." America kept his light tone. "You just said you want to drop it."

His brother bobbed his head.

"Fine. Then tell him the reason I said I reserve the right to bomb other nations without Security Council approval is because I have the right."

"I don't… think he's going to like that."

"Perfect," America said casually. "Tell him I don't have to care about what he likes anymore, just like I don't have to ask his permission before I use my arsenal."

He grit his teeth, remembering the phone call he'd got about bombing that dam. 'Oh, it's an asset for the Chinese, you shouldn't have done that!'

Like the old bag hadn't agreed to support war with China when it came. Like he didn't want North Korea and Red China exterminated, too. He didn't care that he'd cut the gooks' power or could've broken the dam or dragged the chinks into war. He didn't even care that the Ruskis could get involved because they both knew by now that Big Red was going to stay on the sidelines for as long as he could.

No. He'd been pissed because America hadn't told him first, because he hadn't asked for 'permission,' like he was still a twelve-year old who had to write a damn letter to ask if he was allowed to wipe out an Indian village, or risk being punished for taking the initiative on something he wanted him to do.

Now the lobsterback Labour Party was scrambling, launching inquiries, trying to smear Churchill and his government for 'letting' it happen, like they still had any control over what America did. And since he didn't want Britain to get another pinko in office, he'd have to get Acheson to step in and take responsibility to save the Tories.

Britain knew he didn't have to ask permission anymore, he knew he didn't even have to tell him. America could do whatever he wanted, he had earned that right.

And still, he knew the fucking limey would be smug when Acheson 'admitted' they should have notified him. Like him letting Canada play pretend that he was free, he could play pretend that he still had any influence in the world, any control over America.

Rage swirling in his stomach, America said, "You gave me the right to do what I need to when you all voted for me to save Korea." He had taken it. "Where do you think the gooks' weapons come from, 'Nada? Because it sure as shit ain't Korea. I've burnt that place to the ground."

Canada winced, looking around like someone was hiding behind the curtains. "Maybe you shouldn't say that."

"Why not?" he demanded. "That's what you wanted me to do. That's what all of you wanted me to do- liberate Korea from the Communists. Two years, two years, they've clung on for dear life and the only thing that's let them do it is the shit the chinks ship over for 'em, and the airfields they use to launch their jets."

The leaf on Canada's face paled slightly. "You're… not actually going to bomb China, though, are you?"

He was going to do more than that. But there was no need to talk his brother into war with Red China. Britain had already agreed, and if Britain agreed, Canada did, too. Even if he didn't.

"I don't want to, 'Nada," America said more soberly. "That's why I took out his electricity- so I wouldn't have to. But if the only other option is watching him conquer the world, then I will. You don't want commies running you, do you?"

He shook his head right away. "No."

America relaxed slightly.

Canada had never been as against the tyranny of Communism as he pretended. He was like one of the idiots that heard about all the fairytale shit they promised- free food, all the races of the world holding hands in equality, everything being owned by workers- and believed it, not realizing that even if they hadn't been lying through their teeth, that all that shit went against the very foundations they'd been built on. If everyone owned everything, then no one did. If everyone had power, then no one had power.

Including them.

But the Canadian government had taken in the anti-Communist Soviet patriots that had fought against Communism in World War II, so he'd probably been getting a few nice Ukrainian and Baltic sob stories over the last few years, helping him see the truth- fairytales came at a cost.

Good. His brain might be syrup, but at least he was smart enough to know who the enemy was.

"Neither do I," America assured him, winning another award for understatement of the century.

The Communists couldn't conquer the world. God had promised it to him. It was his, his destiny, denied to him by North Korea and Red China for two fucking years.

"And I'll do whatever I can to stop them."

He stood up again, leaning over the table to look at his brother through his aviators.

"I'm saving the world, Canada. And if I have to bomb a commie nation waging war against freedom and democracy to do it, I will. And I don't need to ask Britain for permission. I don't need to ask anyone."

"Right," he said, squirming again. "Sorry. I know."

"Good." America nodded in satisfaction, snatching the paper off the table and adjusting his aviators as he read it, bouncing back to cheerful. "So, what else is on the agenda? You asked for the sit-rep when I first got here, we've gone over the camps, the statement, the dam."

Canada flushed, hiding his face again. “Kill me.”

America laughed. “Don’t think your Prime Minister would be too happy with that. Plus it’s not on the list.” He eyed the paper again. “Germ warfare?”

“I know you’re not doing that,” Canada said quickly. “I was just going to ask about the Security Council meeting, but I realized it won’t be over until later.”

It was taking place right now, at good old Lake Success. America wasn’t going to attend, since he didn’t need to entertain obvious commie propaganda, but he knew how it was going to go. Big Red had charged like a bear right into the trap, aaaas usual.

America put two forefingers on his temple, screwing his face up as he put on a fake gypsy accent (still better than those broads in the ‘fortune telling’ shops). “Reading the future I am, and I predict the Soviet Union is going to veto.”

Canada’s laugh was relieved, clearly glad they weren’t fighting anymore.

Okay, the Canadian actually hadn’t been fighting. That was kind of the problem with him. Not that America wanted him to fight him.

Dropping the accent and picking up the stub of his cigar, he said, “There’s no way he’s letting the Red Cross in. Then they’d find out he's been bullshitting us. I mean, really- chicken feathers and voles falling out of the sky?” He snorted in amusement.

“Yeah,” Canada said, his smile fading somewhat as he sucked at his cigar.

It was good he hadn’t let the commies fill his head with lies. If he tried to come after America for using biowarfare when he’d been perfectly fine with Britain using it against the Indians…

His jaw tensed, but he made himself take another drag.

He hadn’t. And this Canada hadn’t been around for that. Not really.

"I wonder if you should've let the Koreans and Chinese in?" his brother asked, finishing off his cigar and placing the butt in the ashtray. "To the meeting, not the UN. Wouldn't it look better if we did, then CCCP still vetoed?"

"I'm not letting those commies pretend they've got even an inch more of legitimacy than they do," America dismissed, savouring his cigar more slowly. "And they're already being loud enough, don'cha think?"

That stupid little commission they had going on in China right now. He'd deal with it if they decided to butter their bread on the wrong side. The war would be over soon anyhow, and anything they had to say would be swallowed up in the aftermath. Korea would be free, and everyone would agree that whatever cost it had taken to get it that way was an acceptable one, like usual.

"Yeah," Canada said, fiddling with his raccoon tail.

"You know I can still make those, right?" America asked, not for the first time. "Not a lost art, and I think that thing's starting to smell like the coon what died to make it."

He should know how to make 'em, too. Why had he spent the effort teaching him if he was just going to wear the thing to tatters?

Canada clutched the striped tail protectively to his shoulder. "I like this one. And I wash it once a month."

"Suit yourself." Even if it made it a smidge harder to pretend he wasn't the Canada that had never been taught his lesson.

Maybe… Nah. The thing was like his brother's protective blanky. If something happened to it, he'd probably keel over the next time he was dragged in front of an audience. Or just into downtown Ottawa. He'd stick to hiding it around the place when he was over.

"So, now that you've been a good little messenger pigeon…" Cigar finally done, America flicked it into the ashtray and rubbed his hands together eagerly. "Present time?"

Canada wasn't like South, where he'd watch him like a hawk as he examined the gift he'd given him, and probably cast himself from the window straight into the Rideau River if he said he didn't like it, but he did still twiddle his fingers anxiously and watch from the corner of his eye as America unwrapped his presents.

"Fuck yeah," he crowed, pulling out the Jack Daniels bottle and holding it up to the chandelier on the ceiling.

To the untrained eye, it looked like suspiciously thick, dark alcohol. But America knew it was full of maple syrup from Canada's farm.

"We had a really good harvest this year," his brother said, trying to act casual, but clearly thrilled he liked it. "On top of all the syrup, I got around three tins of candy out of the trees."

"I'll take 'em all," America said, already having popped open his blue tin and shoved a maple leaf-shaped sugar chunk in his mouth, moaning in satisfaction.

Pure sugary bliss. He had maple syrup from Vermont, but Canada made it like no other.

Well, America could make it better, if he was up to the sugar farming biz. But he didn't have time to traipse around in the woods, while Canada practically lived out there.

Canada laughed. "I already gave the other ones to Mr. Laurent and, uh…"

He scratched the fur on his hat awkwardly, and America rolled his eyes.

"I'm not gonna throw you in the fireplace and strike a match just for saying his name."

Even if it did make his knuckles whiten around the cookie tin. The geezer didn't even like sweets. They were 'childish.'

"Well I gave it to him," Canada said sheepishly. "But I made sure you got the most. Eat them quick so they don't go stale."

“Don’t worry, these aren’t lasting the plane ride back to Korea.”

Actually, he’d try and save one or two for South. The kid loved sugar, and this stuff was sickeningly sweet.

He shoved another one in his mouth, closing his eyes as it melted on his tongue.

‘Probably only one.’

Canada gave him another watch for his collection, too. It had a sturdy leather strap, probably from one of his kills, and the watch face was made up to look like his flag. The points on the hands were shaped like delicate flint arrowheads, and when he shook it, little gold flecks inside flew around like snow.

“And here I thought the Gold Rush drained you dry,” America said, still shaking it.

“I found some while I was hunting up in the Territories,” Canada proudly told him. “Do you like it?”

“It’s definitely the tackiest watch I own now,” America praised, strapping it next to his Rolex. “It’s getting a place of honour on the shelf.”

He didn't mind when his brother didn’t sell the house for his presents, since he made up for it economically. Natural gas, fresh water, precious metals. He was a veritable mine. Plus they had trade deals worked out since they were right next to each other and shared such a long border.

Honesty, he didn’t even mind when Grace got him cheap presents, since she wasn’t exactly rollin’ in dough. Just not a fucking card. She better have something real ace ready for him tomorrow.

Canada tried, that was the point. He didn’t just grab whatever, taking him for granted. He wanted to please him, and he did his best to, as he should. There were plenty of folks that could learn from him. Truman, for example.

Canada opened his presents next- a box of quality cigars, a good compass, and a rifle. His eyes lit up as he tore the paper on the last one, making up for all the effort America had went through making his girl wrap it to look like a broom.

"What is this?" he asked, sighting down the scope at a painting of Niagara Falls on the wall.

"Chang Kai-shek rifle," America told him around another maple candy. "Type 79, I think the Red Chinese call it. Thought you might want to try it out."

He'd done a little shopping in the captured enemy weapons before Rhee could clear them out for his 'recruits.'

Canada lowered the rifle, looking a little guilty. "They don't really like when you give me guns."

"C'mon, 'Nada, live a little," he sighed, leaning on an elbow. "You ditched the registration when the war ended and you never had to follow it in the first place. If 'they-'" He put finger quotes around the word. "Try to give you trouble, remind 'em you're a Countryhuman, and if you want to get a new gun, you'll damn well get a new gun."

He knew the lily-livered sumbitch wouldn't do that, but he still sighted down the rifle again.

"Yeah," he said, definitely planning to smuggle it out to his cabin and never tell anyone. "Thanks. I can't wait to try this out. Hunting trip next time you're free?"

"Sure thing."

Any other country would have to be an idiot to go hunting with another Countryhuman, giving them access to firearms and the excuse of a hunting accident. But America knew his brother would never shoot him. He didn't have the moxie.

'Or the spine.'

Gift exchange done with, America eyed their presents, nodding in satisfaction.

Canada had got him two things, and he'd got him three. And while he'd actually pulled gold out of his ass this year, luckily the American had coincidentally chosen to go with gold plate for his new compass. He was still winning.

They shot the shit for a little longer, smoking more cigars- good ones, fresh from his tobacco plantation in Cuba- before America checked his new watch and sighed.

"Well, 'Nada, I gots to get back to the old ball and chain."

Canada frowned before realizing what he meant. "Korea?"

"Yep." He'd seen the little flicker that went through his eyes, thinking America had a wife he didn't know about.

He laughed silently, wondering if the idea of it being that broad from back then had crossed his mind.

"Actually, I was wondering if maybe you wanted to spend the night?" Canada asked hopefully. "I know if you're actually going to be on the continent for your birthday, you probably want to spend it at home, but you could catch a plane tomorrow?"

"Sorry, 'Nada. I promised Southie I'd spend it with him." He paused deliberately. "Whoops, that's South Korea."

He watched his brother's jaw feather, hurt flashing across his eyes.

Countryhumans didn't just hand out nicknames to other countries. Canada might resent his now for whatever stupid reason, but he couldn't hide that it hit like an Indian arrow to know he wasn't the only nation America had graced with one anymore.

"Oh," he said, trying to sound upbeat and falling flat.

"Yeah." America packed up his stuff, snatching one more maple candy. "He's a good kid. A lot like you actually, but a little more… Y'know."

He see-sawed his hand, leaving Canada to guess what 'y'know' meant. Less spineless? Less socially awkward? Less embarrassing?

The answer would have been 'no, no, and no' a little bit ago, but you know what? America could say that wasn't true anymore. South was gaining his feet, learning how to act normal, in public at least. A few days ago, he'd even managed to look at Rhee like he was gum on the bottom of his shoe instead of dog shit. He didn't apologize for nothing anymore, or burst into tears every other day, or start screaming his fool head off.

Or flinch from what needed to be done.

And honestly, with the whole Taejon freak out he'd had in the first year of the war, it was clear he'd always had more fight in him than Canada. Low bar, yeah. But still a bar.

Yep, his Southie was coming along just swell. He'd be even more swell when he got North's more appealing traits mixed in.

He let a proud smile twist his lips, and Canada's grip on the rifle tightened.

"Cool," he said, mustering a smile.

"I can't wait to introduce you two," America said chipperly, pretending he didn't hear his tone. "I bet you'll get along great."

"Can't wait."

"By next year I'll have won the war," he said, throwing his brother a bone. "I'll stay over then. We can go clubbing or something. Maybe I'll help you pick up a new girl. It's been awhile since you've had one, hasn't it?"

A shutter slammed over Canada's eyes, and he put the rifle on the table.

"Yeah," he said mechanically, not bringing up the last and only one, like America had known he wouldn't.

The American nodded. "We can get some drinks, pick up chicks. You don't mind sharing, right? The drinks that is."

Canada looked down at his lap, hands balled on his thighs. "No," he said quietly after a second. “I don’t mind.”

Of course he didn’t. He hadn’t even gotten mad when America had told him.

Canada got to his feet. He was taller than America by just an inch, but he hunched so much he stood lower. He didn’t talk much as he went for the door.

As ace as his gifts had been, and as eager as he’d been to drop the subject of the war earlier, he had still needed to be punished for tricking America here on Britain’s order. He might still be a colony, but the United States of America wasn’t. He’d told Britain he didn’t come when called anymore and he had meant it. Not for him and not for the person who had chosen him over America.

The American smirked, stubbing his cigar out, grinding it into the maple leaf on the bottom of the ash tray.

Canada didn’t talk until they were down by his car, and he was about to get in.

“Hey, America?” he asked, fiddling with his coon tail again.

“Yeah?”

“Even if you don’t see Britain as your dad anymore, we’re… still related, right?”

He straightened up, gifts safely stowed in the passenger seat. “Of course, ‘Nada. We’re the only North American countries. Who else’s couch am I supposed to sleep on when I’m dodging Republicans?”

Canada wasn’t a big fan of that side of his aisle, so the joke made his lips twitch.

“Okay. Good. Thanks.”

America crossed his arms. “You know you don’t have to be his son.”

Canada shrugged helplessly. “He’s my father.”

It was pointless, but he tried barking one last time.

"He doesn't have to be. We can just be brothers, no crooked-toothed limeys involved."

Canada looked down at his shoes, shuffling them on the paved drive.

'Of course.' He wouldn't choose him over Britain. He never had.

"See you around, 'Nada." He turned for the car.

"W-Wait," Canada said nervously. "Hug?"

They were alone on the side drive, so none of the reporters swarming the front of the property would see them.

America sighed, but stepped in and clapped him on the back in a manly embrace, refusing to inhale in case he caught a whiff of the hat. He didn't care how often he washed it, that thing was over a hundred years dead.

He pulled back after a few seconds. He wanted to end things on a high note so Canada wouldn't get any ideas, but you had to be careful when newshounds were baying at the gates. They'd sniff around for any hint of deeper meaning in how you handled another country. Leaned back 'cuz they'd had onions for lunch? Your trade deal had fallen through, obviously. Leaned a little too close because the room was crowded and you couldn't hear shit they were saying? You were hosting secret sessions in the middle of the UN floor, plotting. Someone caught you with your hand on Philippines' shoulder? You had to be exploiting her (not that he'd be against that, the girl was a dish, but he was always careful not to give CCCP any fuel for his propaganda flames, so it seemed a little unfair to accuse a man who hadn't even had a taste of the fruits, so to speak).

And if he got caught on camera hugging Canada, the press would be full of headlines about their 'brotherly bond.' That was good for their countries, and for getting what he wanted out of the Canadian.

But if he was Canada's brother, then he had to be Britain's son. That was how the press would see it anyway. And Britain. And he wasn't. He wasn't anyone's son or anyone's brother, even if Canada had to be his.

He was America.

The big buildings, city streets, and distant rumble of the crowd made Canada nervous. He'd be wanting to flee back to his cottage in the woods on the edge of Ottawa as soon as possible. He slunk inside, not watching America drive off. The American snorted bitterly.

But his brother really was Britain's son.

Behind the wheel of the black Cadillac Canada had sent to the airfield for him, America took off his aviators, scrubbing a hand over his face. He didn't look at the car mirror until they were back on, white eyes covered by black glass. When he did, he grinned at his reflection.

Well! Back to Korea. He had to haul ass if he wanted to get there before tomorrow was over. He'd had Texas cook up some BBQ (so he wouldn't be subjected to more of Grace's mashed potatoes) and fly it across the border to meet him here, and while it wasn't as good as fresh, he wanted to make sure him and South had time to eat it before he took him to the front to watch the bombs fall.

America snagged one more maple candy for the road, then pulled out of the private drive and around the side of the sprawling Parliament Hill building.

Seriously, the size of the thing made him suspect his bro was overcompensating for something. It'd been the largest construction project in North America at one point (though obviously America had way more, way bigger ones now).

The main lane leading from the enormous tower (not that big) at the front split two rolling green lawns in half, sprinklers having put in a lot of work to keep the grass emerald in the summer heat. The sight of the car turning the corner to head down the driveway made the people on the grass swarm, redoubling the cries they'd been screaming themselves hoarse with since before he'd even got here.

America kept his smile fixed as he drove for the gates, the protesters crowding in. Not wide enough that he'd be accused of 'revelling in war' or some shit by the reporters in the crowd, but not so small that they'd think he gave a damn about them and their moronic signs.

They waved them over their heads like flags, everything from professional signboard to roughly cut squares of cardboard. 'US OUT OF KOREA, HANDS OFF KOREA, NO WAR WITH CHINA, NO WAR.'

America's hands tightened around the wheel, pretending it was one of their sweaty throats he was gripping.

'No war.' How the fuck did they think things got done? Would he be free of Britain if he hadn't gone to war? Would the Krauts and the Japs have gotten their teeth kicked in if he didn't go to war? He could see a few Indians in the crowd, did the white folks think they could be so close to each other without one side getting scalped if it hadn't been for the crusade he'd lead against them? War was what had ensured they could get along together, and that he didn't have to eradicate them all.

It wasn't him they needed to show those signs to. It was North Korea, who'd been cocky enough to think he stood a chance against America, and still did. It was Red China, violating international law to whisper into his 'ear' in person and openly taunting them all at his trial. And it was CCCP who had brought the disease of Communism into the world in the first place, making the little people think they deserved things they didn't, that they hadn't worked for. He was the one puppeteering all the lesser nations into going against the natural order of the world, he was the one brainwashing good men into turning against their nations, and he was the one trying to claim America's destiny. He was the one that wanted war, the one giving America no choice. The Communists were bringing war to the world and no one wanted them to stop. No one but him.

'No war.' Just like Upper Canada back then, when his people had actually pulled up their bootstraps and started to rebel. Too little, too late, but at least they'd been standing up to the limey. Unlike Canada.

'I can't go to war with Father. I don't want to go to war with anyone, Mer. I just want us to be-' Even after America had put his fucking pride on the line by offering him a second chance, something no traitor had ever gotten from him before.

And what had happened? The rebellion had been crushed. America had to waste money funding militias to teach him a lesson, the limey oligarchs stayed in power, and Canada remained a colony to this day.

Each and every one of these fucking Canucks, white, negro, redskin, gook, all of them were just like their Countryhuman- a spineless coward who didn't know what was good for him. They couldn't see that they needed war. He needed to crush everyone that stood against them, just like he'd crushed the Indians, the Nazis, the Jap, Britain. The United States of America wouldn't be the greatest country in the world if it wasn't for his wars against them.

God had given him a destiny and the only way to manifest it was through war.

His leg quivered with tension as his boot pressed down on the gas. He'd been mostly joking when he'd thought about turning the newshawks and Doughboys outside the Eighth Army Headquarters into speedbumps, but these chumps? Yeah, he'd gun 'em down in a heartbeat.

They swarmed like sharks, not even the shiny black Cadillac enough to keep them back. The only thing that saved the man that stumbled into the side was the fact it was borrowed. They shoved their signs into his windshield, 'REFUSE TO DIE FOR YANKEE BANKERS, CEASEFIRE NOW, CANADA OUT OF KOJE PRISON,' gaping red mouths and patchy red skin and wild Red eyes and America felt his cheek start to tic.

These fucking people, acting like he was a monster for hitting a military target or trying to unbrainwash Korean commies, just like the fucking nations that'd turned down the Geoje visit. They didn't give a damn what was happening in the camps, they just didn't want to tarnish their precious reputations, leaving all the dirt to him because he was the only one with the guts to do it, he was the only one who knew what it took to defeat Communism and why they had to, just like he was the only one that'd been brave enough to take up a gun against their father.

So what if a few commies died in the camps, so what if he was using germ warfare- if Communism won in Korea it would spread across the world, and how many people would die then? Who did these fucking yuppies think the Nork and Red China would come for first? They wouldn't care that they were 'conscientious objectors' if their little commie POWs had the chance to tell them what the Canuck army was doing on Geoje. Reds were bloodthirsty, savage, they wouldn't make any distinction between the guy holding the gun and the bitch back home and like America had gone for the limey bastards the first chance he'd got, they would come for them.

They didn't see that he was trying to save them, none of them did.

He raised his foot off the gas, about to slam it down and take out at least one of the idiots trying to throw themselves in front of his car, give them what they wanted as they screamed at him to stop doing what they needed.

Then startled shrieks rang out and the protestors went stumbling back, using their signs to shield each other as water showered over them.

The sprinklers had came on, rotating peacefully as they watered the lawn, maintaining its glossy green pelt.

America took the moment of distraction as they staggered back from the road to slam the gas, not speeding enough for some Red to claim he was fleeing, but fast enough to break free from the crowd.

"Always a pleasure, folks!" he called out the window he'd rolled down, sticking his arm out.

Good thing he'd slipped that Canuck maintenance guy a twenty. That was what- a hundred bucks Canadian?

‘Took him long enough, though,’ he thought irritably.

He snuck a look back at the Parliament Hill grounds as he shot down the hill, security trying to break up the protest. A few losers were doggedly running after him, one waving a red-painted sign that read ‘NO GERM WEAPONS ANYWHERE IN THE WORLD.'

America turned the corner out the gates, losing sight of him. But he liked to imagine he’d tripped and fallen on his face, like CCCP would at the Security Council today.

He sighed, back on the peaceful road, no commie crazies to be seen.

That was the bad thing about almost always visiting Canada on July 3rd- every shark in the sea knew he’d be here, and crawled out of the woodwork like a Jew scenting a penny, rubbing their hands together and voicing whatever complaint they had against him this year.

His lips pressed thin as he navigated the broad Ottawa streets.

There’d been a few more than usual today, though. Usually it was just a handful, a couple old men still bearing a cross from the War of 1812, or a few Beat Generation types that thought being anti-American was trendy. But back on the lawn had been a few dozen people, maybe around a hundred. So around eighty if you subtracted the outright Communist agents. They didn’t need numbers, even one commie was enough for the infection to spread to honest men.

America drummed his striped fingers on the wheel, wondering how many of them would have been cheering him on two years ago.

The war in Korea was getting unpopular, he knew that, even if you didn’t count the Red spies working their dark magic. Because people were stupid and short-sighted. And hey, he couldn’t begrudge them for that. It was just another part of human nature.

But they were. They couldn’t see that so long as the Reds refused to surrender, they had to keep fighting. They couldn't see that by letting them sign an armistice now, letting them have their airfields and take their prisoners home, they'd be letting them think they had served as a real villain against America, like he couldn't just turn their shithole countries into smoking holes in the ground if he wanted to.

They would be letting them think they had won.

And they hadn't. They couldn't. The only reason North Korea and Red China were still capable of spreading their lies and drawing breath at all was because America was holding himself back to use their counties the way he deserved. If the Nork wanted to thrash and struggle on the line and refuse to be reeled in even after his lights had gone out, that was fine, because one day soon, he would be being served up on the frying pan, whether that was before or after Red China had been dealt with. He could keep dragging himself over the torched remains of his country and clawing at America's ankles thinking he could make him leave because he couldn't.

The only way America was leaving Korea was if he was heading to China. And if that was before the Nork bent the knee, he would be back.

There was no substitute for victory.

But the war was getting unpopular. Like, 'down to barely fifty percent approval' unpopular, even if his folks weren't being as knuckleheaded as Canada's about it. America knew it was mostly the result of CCCP's agents manipulating the polls, and the numbers weren't that low, but hey, he was an honest guy, he could admit when some of his people were fucking idiots making mountains out of molehills. Geoje Island was a whole mess folks wouldn't shut up about because the commie prisoners wouldn't just quit their shit and switch sides, the stalling in the talks he had to do to make North submit or lure Red China into a real war was making some of the mouthier nations start to gripe about how long it was taking, Rhee openly blustering that he'd send former Red POWs out to fight and locking assemblymen up willy-nilly (and also everything else he did) didn't look so good when he was there watching it go down, the fuss Big Red was raising about biowarfare, while obviously no one believed it, had started to attract flies, and bombing the Sui-ho Dam hadn't been quite as popular outside his government as he'd expected.

So yeah, it was getting really unpopular. Not because people actually cared what happened to the commies in Korea, but because 'Oh, it costs too much money, it's taking too long, we've had too many casualties.' Not seeing that it was also making America money, which was the entire reason the steel dolts could complain about their bosses not paying them more, that this would have been over ages ago if they'd just understand the value of a well-placed nuclear bomb, and that those soldiers were his. They had chosen to fight for him, they had signed on to advance his destiny, and he could use them the way he wanted. They said they couldn't be defending their country when they were all the way across the Pacific Ocean, too blind to realize that if they didn't defend it there, one day the infection would spread to their own shores. That it already was, infecting the weak-minded rubes first, like that Puerto Rican soldier and his little pals, and the idiots in the factories, but sure to come for the rest of America if it had time.

Threats had to be smothered in the cradle, or one day they would hold a pillow over your face instead. Just ask Britain. Even if that smothering made you li'l bit unpopular.

Or a lot'a bit, for Truman. His approval had dipped to just over twenty percent in the latest polls, toootally not helped along by America suggesting he seize the steel mills to raise wages and prevent a strike, stealing a page from the commies' books. Except he was a free country, so the companies were free to sue to get them back, winning, of course, and firmly cementing ole Prez Pinko as unreliable to the workers and an enemy to the corporations. Even if he had a mind to run again after four years, America could use his mystical gypsy fortune-telling powers to predict he wouldn't be winning another term. Now everyone had it out for Truman almost as much as his Countryhuman did.

But, more annoyingly, his approval had dropped, too. Just a little. Big Business was miffed he hadn't been there to smack Truman on the wrist (not knowing he'd set it up to help them out, but hey, no good deed went- got rewarded), and Big Labour was pissed he hadn't been there to tell BB to raise their wages (which he wouldn't have done, but he'd definitely have pretended to look into it).

But the drop being small didn't change the fact that it had dropped. And as the workers had gone ahead and started their strike at the beginning of June, it continued to. Tiiiny increments. But still too much. He usually hovered around a ninety since WWII, but now he was down to eight-five.

And more importantly, kindofnotreally- steel wasn't getting made. Exports had been slammed shut, meaning he couldn't rake in the cash from the Japs and the others, Defense was clinging to what they had refusing to sell to Consumer, and his plants were shutting down one by one, his arsenal going with them. Even their stockpiles were getting dangerously low.

The reminder made the heat in America's stomach start to rise again, and he sped a little faster through the streets, taking corners sharper than he had to.

Didn't they realize he had a war to fight, a war to defend them? Did they think he used the shit they made for fun? He was using it to save them, to save the world. And they were denying it from their army, from him, over a couple of fucking cents, because they thought they deserved the money their bosses made.

It was the entitlement he couldn't stand, the same entitlement Britain had always had, thinking he was owed what America made, what America had worked for. Fucking entitled union commies, thinking they were owed whatever they wanted, fucking entitled foreigners, thinking they didn't have to lift a finger to help America defend them, fucking entitled Britain thinking he had any say over what happened in Korea, let alone anything America did.

The surge of fire and brimstone felt good, burning away the cobwebs and getting his motor runnin' again, something he hadn't felt in awhile. Because more than the war starting to get a little too unpopular on the homefront…

Korea was starting to get boring.

South had been well-behaved recently, especially after the little demonstration with the deafie, and even if that was great, America didn't get the same rush from watching movies and chatting with him as he did making him believe what he needed to. Grace had been boring for awhile now, taking whatever he gave her without complaint, drifting around like she was half a ghost already; the combat at the front was still at a stalemate with no signs of changing, limited to probing actions from the commies and counterattacks to take back the hills America's Doughboys had claimed and annoyingly couldn't seem to keep; he'd given up on getting anything about Red China out of the stuttering cripple; and honestly he was sick of Korean food. Rice, radish, and that fermented cabbage, that was what he was stuck with when his imported groceries ran out. And Grace's fucking mashed potatoes. It was good, but a man needed variety. Canada's maple candy had damn near brought him to tears, the first blast of real sugar he'd had in way too long.

He couldn't even visit the camps or find himself a one-time girl to have a bit of fun with because there was always a dirt-digger following him around, looking for some new scoop, and would just love to lap up a story about a missing Korean whore, like a thousand of 'em didn't go missing every day, or more sensationalist Geoje crap for CCCP's propagandists.

He wanted to eat Texas barbeque right off the grill, not heated up in a wok. He wanted to kick his heels up on the desk at his plantation house while he still could and try to break his record on smoke rings, and visit the babes in California, finally introduce himself to that Marilyn chick, who was getting just as popular as he'd known she would. And he wanted to wake up in the morning whenever he wanted and suck in a deep breath of fresh air, with no traces of jet engine fuel or filthy refugees to be found.

America let a wry smile twist his lips.

Aw shucks, he was actually getting homesick. He'd never been away from the USA long enough to get that way before. Even as often as he'd visited Southie during the trusteeship, he'd been back and forth enough not to. He guessed it was the boredom that'd done it, though really, who wouldn't want to head back to the greatest country on Earth?

He knew he could trust South to stay loyal. He'd seen the truth of the Communists, of Red China and CCCP and Kim Il-sung, and even if he still didn't want to believe the truth about North, that was fine. He understood that he wouldn't get his brother back until he was crushed and Communism in Korea was no more.

And even if he hadn't, America had more than enough material for him to understand that there wouldn't be any switching sides. He'd seen it in his eyes that day in the police station, and even before that, on the day he'd ordered Seoul to be burned.

Communists were crazy. They saw no value in God or borders or the natural order of the world. No value in family. There was nothing they wouldn't destroy. South knew that now. He knew that he would win this war with America, or he would be torn apart. Those were the only options.

No, his Korea wasn't anything like Canada anymore.

The war in Korea would be over before Christmas, and the war in China would have begun. A fresh new venture to raise his people's spirits, and a Korea as thankful as his Southie and as persuasive as North to assure everyone that he was so glad America had stayed in his county for so long, so glad he'd saved him, and that he wanted to see Red China's people be granted freedom and democracy just like his, and would be willing to fight for it. But for now…

Korea had grown a little stale.

America lifted the foot not on the gas onto the leather seat, leaning his leg against the door as he looked out the window, watching a plane take off from the Uplands airfield as he turned onto the road to it.

Yep. He was just about done in Korea. He had a few loose ends to tie up, then he'd hurry home to clean up Truman's mess, get ready for the elections, and raise his approval rating back up to ninety so he could watch it rocket to a hundred after he won the war, just like after he'd bombed Japan in the last one.

But in order to do that, there was one loose end in particular he had to get rid of. A piece of baggage he couldn't risk bringing back to the States.

The American Countryhuman was leaving Korea, wiping the slate clean for the blind and dumb and brainwashed.

Which meant it was time for Gracie to go.

Chewing on the parallels. They are crunchy like bone.

A clarification- the reason one sign calls Geoje 'Koje' (and why Canada says 'Koo-jay') is because that was the romaji for it back then. Also the thing about the Canadian government taking in 'anti-Communist Soviet patriots that fought Communism in WWII' is real. Canada imported UPA types that had worked with the Nazis to pogrom Soviet Jews, Communists, and such when parts of the CCCP were occupied to 'save them from the Soviets' (so they wouldn't be prosecuted with their crimes, gods forbid a Nazi actually pays for being a Nazi) and fight Communism in Canada.

If Canada seems different here than in Warring Pyongyang, it's for a few reasons. His social anxiety was still manageable back then, and didn't get crippling until around the late 1990s (it rises with the height of buildings. and also America's boredom level), and his mental break and withdrawal are very responsible for his stutter and general behaviour. This is Canada in a (mostly okay) state of mind.

Reading about the American steel strike is so funny. 'Steel manufacturers told everyone that the union wanting raised wages and eight holidays a year would lead to inefficiency, which would drive workers towards radicalism and Communism.' Would you… like to know… what actually drives workers towards radicalism and Communism…? Take a seat before your legs give out. NOT BEING PAID A LIVING WAGE. Aiya.

Saving Grace

There was a door. It was red. It was getting closer.

There was a door. Her ma had let her paint the last stroke, the brush clutched right in her chubby little fist. As it drew nearer, she could see the raised edges sticking out from the smooth coat of paint. The neighbour's corn rustled in the breeze, a hound dog barked in the distance, the sun was warm and the door was getting closer.

There was a door. Behind it was nothing, nothing nothing nothing, and then that spot of dried red and then him, shining and star-spangled, and no matter how much she screamed at herself to stop walking, to run back down the lane and leave it for someone else, it was all getting closer.

There was a door. And Grace was going to open it. She couldn't not open it. The curse drove her on, lifted her hand, placed it on the worn handle, opened it to that red nothing and her own rosy red nothing.

Gracie's eyes shot open, her breath catching in her throat, crushing the whispering whine that had been leaking from it. She twitched, but didn't lurch up. Her body told her to stay still, be good, Gracie.

So she held still, not even breathing, even though the pressure strained her ribs, still bruised up and sore from the last lesson she'd had to learn.

The room was dark, only a little bit of light from the high window making its way in. The heavy breathing beside her stayed even.

Her own breath escaped in a silent exhale, her lungs deflating, settling down inside her and putting weight on her bruised spine.

America had flown all the way to Canada and back, then hosted his birthday party and taken that Korean kid out to celebrate. He'd been working hard, and deserved a good rest. If Gracie woke him up just because she was having nightmares again, that would make her bad. And bad girls got punished.

She'd been good for awhile. America hadn't had to punish her. She had been a good girl, wearing the pretty clothes and jewellery he got her, losing weight, always having dinner ready when he got back. Keeping her head down, saying 'yes please,' never 'no.' He hadn't liked that she'd been near that teahouse that day her hopes had poofed away like smoke. So Gracie had been trying to be good for him.

But she couldn't. She didn't mean to be bad, but she kept screwing up. She made too many mashed potatoes or talked too much or said something stupid and wrong or didn't dye her hair before her roots started showing and America had to punish her. He had to punish her a lot lately, more and more, almost every day. But she still couldn't seem to get better.

Gracie wasn't a bad girl. America told her all the time she was a real good girl. She just did bad things that needed to be corrected, like when she used to write with her left hand and her pa would slap her on the wrist until she learned to write with the proper one. And it was a good thing he'd done that because otherwise all her coursework would have ended up smeared in nursing school, and her medical charts would be all messed up.

It had been awhile since she had seen a patient. Besides herself.

Pretty white eyes and snowy white skin.

It had been awhile since she had seen anyone.

Gracie had thought she had been good today. She'd had a meat-and-three cooking when America had got back. A nice roast beef she had worked real hard on, with turnip greens she managed to get at the market, and cornbread. And mashed potatoes, of course. She had tried to recreate her ma's old recipe for the cornbread, but with Korean flair, adding some of that weird salty paste they used. She'd thought it tasted pretty good, and America had been asking for some for awhile now. And even though he had brought back that barbeque, they could still have it as leftovers. He'd seemed happy with it, and with her gift- a pair of aviators she had begged the requisition officer for, promising to find ‘some way’ to pay him back. She couldn’t go there anymore, but that was okay.

She didn’t want to go outside. She hadn’t in months.

And America had liked the sturdy glasses. They weren’t gold, but she thought he could wear them when he went to visit the POW camps or other dirty places, so his good ones wouldn’t get ruined. He’d been so mad after his last pair got broken that he’d had to take it out on her. He had said it was thoughtful. He had said she’d done good, and kissed her on the cheek.

But she still had to be punished. Something about Britain and Canada. Countries she had never been to. Men she had never met. They had made him do it. If they had just been good like her, she wouldn’t have had to get hurt again.

Grace turned over slightly, her eyes tracing the contours of America’s face, lit by the moonlight coming in through the window, counting the maroon and white stripes, and the stars in the navy sky. Forty-eight, one of them hers. Far away and across the sea, almost as distant as a real star. The little prairie house with the red door that she’d never see again.

She liked watching him sleep. It was the only time he ever took his aviators off. He looked so innocent with his short black lashes resting on his cheeks, lids flickering, breath sighing out of parted lips. Harmless.

‘When the war’s over, we’ll get hitched. I’ll buy you a car, and all the fancy clothes and jewellery you want, and a nice house with a big kitchen so you can cook mashed potatoes for me all day. You like the sound of that?’

She did. It was what Gracie had always wanted. A big house in the city, a closet full of clothes that had never had to be mended over and over, sparkly jewellery and a sparklier life, like the ones she saw in the catalogues. A good man.

He was going to kill her soon.

Gracie slid out of bed, moving carefully. The wood was cool under her bare feet as she grabbed one of the blankets that had fallen to floor during their lovemaking, wrapping it around her shoulders. She hurt too much to get dressed. He had been rough tonight. Rougher than usual.

She drew the sheet over her chest, slipping out of the room and padding down the hall to the powder room. The lamp clicked on, orange light filling the small space. She had thought she needed to pee, but she just stood in front of the sink, staring at the mirror above it.

Gracie stared back at her. Big, cornflower blue eyes, freshly-dyed blonde hair that curled over her shoulders and down her back, tousled in a sexy way, scalp aching from how hard it had been pulled on, pink blush and Rosy Future lips, lightly smeared.

She was pretty. Everyone had always said so, from the postman to the army boys. America said it all the time. She was pretty when she smiled, prettier when she cried. She could've been an actress, but she'd never had the money. Gracie wasn't too bright or too tough or too useful. But she was pretty.

Too pretty to die.

Then again, her ma had been pretty, too, with her long loamy tresses and dark blue eyes. So had her nana, she'd realized when she was cleaning out her parents' things. When she was little, the woman had been a little scary with all her wrinkles and drooping skin. But her smile in that old photo had been so bright, her pop-pop's arm around her.

And now they were both gone.

She wondered what would happen to those boxes in the apartment America had rented for her. Where her family photos would end up.

She reached out, fingers brushing against Gracie's smooth glass skin, cupping her face. The reflection leaned into the touch as she ran her thumb across the purple bruise on her cheek.

Who would want to kill such a pretty girl?

Maybe he didn't. Maybe he really loved her, and wanted to bring her home, to circle her and give her the life she'd dreamed of, the life he had promised. The American Dream.

But even if he did, the curse would make him do it. He could say it was Britain or North Korea or the Soviet Union, or even her, but Gracie knew what would really ring her dinner bell. The same thing that had made her pop-pop get behind the wheel that day, and made her pa do what he'd done.

She had seen it in his eyes the night he promised her a life. Through the side of his aviators, she had seen the curse lurking in their depths the same way it had lurked in her pa's after he'd come back from the war, following him home all the way from the Pacific like a stay dog whose brains had gone bad.

America had said she was lucky she was late that day. Gracie had never felt that way. Some part of her had known, ever since she returned after the clean-up to see that rusty red splotch on the white cupboards her mama had always kept so pristine, that she hadn't been spared by luck. It still just hadn't been her time yet.

It was coming now. And it was her own fault.

'It's not your fault,' on the message as he stared across the crowded room, looking at her directly for the first time they'd started doing this with an expression that had become as foreign as the country and people around her.

It was a pretty sentiment. Maybe Mr. Kim was right, and Gracie really wasn't a bad girl. Maybe it really wasn't her fault. Not all of it. For a moment, as she had passed him that note with shaky hands- 'I want to leave.'- she had felt that could be true.

But in the end, it wasn't. The women in her family were cursed to die at the hands of the men they loved. Gracie knew that. She should have thanked America for his condolences and shut the door on him that day. But instead she had gone to the movies with him. How could she not? He was her country. She'd loved him before they even met.

But that didn't make it any less her fault.

She had never learned Mr. Kim's real name. He'd said he would tell her when they were in North Korea. But he had been kind, when she had been starting to forget the word. He'd reminded her of her pa, before the war, back when he still knew how to smile. It had felt exciting to tie her hair up in a scarf and put on her little white sunglasses to pass notes with him in cafes and parks, and whisper together right under her guards' noses. Like she was a spy in one of the movies America liked. It was how she'd imagined Korea would be like when she first got here- adventure, intrigue, fun, and her a dashing war heroine saving their brave boys in khaki in the middle of it all.

It hadn't been fun for awhile now.

Now Mr. Kim was dead because she had been foolish enough to think she could escape the curse. Dumb, dumb Gracie. Silly little southern hick, thinking she was any smarter than her ma and nana.

She'd seen the curse in her pa's eyes as he stood behind the woman in the entryway, beer in hand, as she told Gracie to come visit next weekend and she'd make her famous roast and taters. She just hadn't known what it meant. Surely her ma had seen it, too. He'd kept the shotgun on top of the kitchen cupboard. She had to have seen him getting it down as she mashed those potatoes until they were smooth as buttermilk.

And she was still dead.

Just because Gracie was the first person in her family to go to school didn't mean she was smart. Not smart enough to escape a curse.

'There's no such thing as curses.'

Gracie's fingers slid away from the reflection, down to her side.

The words still didn't feel quite real. Whispered in her ear as she left the house for the first time in weeks to get stuff for dinner, pointing at the turnip greens on the square of fabric. 'How much?' in Korean, one of the few words she knew now. The answer had come in English, too quiet for the armed men behind her to hear.

'Hannah says there's no such thing as curses. We are all masters of our own destiny.'

When she'd asked, 'What?' in shock, the farmer woman had just given her an extraordinarily high price, like she hadn't even said anything.

Gracie had thought maybe she hadn't. Maybe she was going loony like her pa, like America always joked about. She'd bought the turnip greens and gone home to make him supper like the good girl she was.

She hadn't got to eat any of it. Or much of the BBQ. Meat was bad for her figure. Her stomach ached like every other part of her.

But as she let the words creep back out now that America wouldn't somehow sense them, she was sure she'd heard right. It couldn't have come from her own head. Gracie didn't have thoughts anymore. There wasn't anything good to think about.

Hannah had sent her a message. She hadn't forgotten about her.

Gracie hadn't forgotten her either. It was hard to when America would bring her up sometimes when he was teaching her a lesson. He wanted her to learn her lesson, too. Gracie had been sad when she'd left, wishing her friend could come with them to Busan, that maybe they could talk again. But she was glad she hadn't now.

And she had been kind. Even if Gracie couldn't understand her. And even if she had used her for that map.

'Please, my family.' The foreign state had been filled with a desperation Gracie knew well. It had filled her chest and tore her throat raw as she screamed at the ceiling, begging God to bring her family back.

Unlike Him, Gracie couldn't not answer.

She hoped it had helped when the Communists raided the camp. Maybe that was why they'd been able to pull it off as smooth as America had said while he was beating her after. She wasn't a traitor, but she was glad Hannah had got her family back. She was glad she'd been able to.

She hoped the paper she had dropped for that agent had helped, too. She would feel awful if Mr. Kim had died for nothing. Even if she hadn't been able to get away like he wanted.

She had thought about it for a moment on that day. Trying to catch the attention of the man he had said would be waiting for them. To run to him and hope he could spirit her away.

But America had been on edge, and her guards were on high alert. And even if they hadn't been…

Gracie couldn't escape. She was cursed.

It didn't surprise her that Hannah didn't believe in curses. A woman like her wouldn't. Her brother had shot her in the chest and she hadn't even seemed to care. She'd never flinched when Gracie treated her, or quailed away from America. She had killed a man and fled from her window like a bird, taking off into the winter mountains with the sun still in the sky. Gracie thought she might even be the reason America's aviators had broke, and why when he'd taken her that night, he'd kept his shirt on and bled even more than her. And why she had to be careful not to look too closely at his cheek for a few days.

Gracie couldn't even imagine that. Every time he was on top of her, she was aware of how absolutely powerful her country was. Bigger than her, stronger than her. Invincible. She'd thought it was hot, at first. Now she just knew that it meant even if she wanted to, even if she tried, she couldn't stop him from doing what he wanted.

Her brother had always told her that if a man ever raised his hand to her, she should raise hers right back, then call him so he could kick his ass. But he was gone, like everyone else. And Gracie couldn't fight back. She wasn't like Hannah. She was just a normal girl. And she believed that curses were real.

They had to be. If they weren't, then why had her pop-pop called them to the car that day? Why had her pa splattered her ma's brains out all over her mashed potatahs and clean white cupboards then turned the gun on himself?

Why was America going to kill her?

They loved them, hadn't they? When her pop-pop would get the door for her nana like he had that day, wasn't that love? When her pa built her ma those flowerbed boxes for the windows, wasn't that love? When America bought her nice dresses and expensive jewellery and put her through nursing school and told her she was beautiful and funny and weird, the whole damn dish, wasn't that love?

So why did he want to hurt her? She didn't want to hurt him. Even after everything, all the broken bones, all the tears, all the ugly bruises and her nose that would never be quite straight again, even knowing he was going to kill her, she didn't want to hurt him back. She loved him. She would love him even as he wrapped his hands around her neck or used the pistol in his office to blow her brains out as she mashed potatoes or however he was going to do it because he was her country. She had loved him from the day she was born and would love him even after the day she died at his hands.

She didn't want to. She hadn't wanted to run away and leave him, she just hadn't wanted the curse to force him to kill her. She didn't want to end up like the other women in her family, she didn't want him to kill her. She wanted him to love her. He was her country, he was supposed to love her.

Gracie stared back at her in the mirror, pale, hollow cheeks, the blue in her eyes swallowed up by blown-out pupils as they peered through wild blonde hair, purple-black bruises mottling her breasts in the shape of fingers and teeth. Rosy Red lips.

And she didn't want to wear this stupid lipstick. It was so not her colour, it washed her out and drew attention away from her eyes, her best feature, which she'd told America when he said she should wear it more often, and she wanted it off.

Gracie rubbed at her mouth with her wrist, harder and harder until she was crushing her lips into her teeth, the familiar sharp tang of copper staining her tongue, awakening the constant hunger inside her and making her stomach roar. She clawed at her mouth with her manicured nails like she'd clawed at America's back, crimson residue coming off under them, blood welling in their tracks.

When she was done, she gripped the edge of the counter with one hand, the other picking up the paper she usually kept hidden with her 'that time of the month' stuff, the one place she knew America wouldn't look, shakily smoothing it on the edge of the sink. She held it up to the lamplight, leaning towards the mirror, but not looking at it, fixated on the drawing.

It was her. Her the way Hannah had seen her. In black and white, her blonde hair tucked into the bun she kept it in back when she'd actually had work to do, her eyes and lips curved up in an expression her face hadn't done anything but fake in half a year. And that pretty red flower tucked behind her ear, the same one Hannah had on her flag.

What had she been trying to say to her that day, the one after Gracie's first lesson? When she'd looked at her so desperately and spoke in her strange language. Had she been calling her an idiot, telling her she was stupid for ever thinking her country could love her, that she could escape the curse? Or had she been telling her what she'd said in that message- that she could?

The picture was more familiar than the girl with the red lips was. Her, back when she'd still known how to smile.

She trembled as she looked from her to the reflection in the mirror, staring into its eyes.

It looked awful. Its hair was even messier now, like the tumbleweed folks that had used to blow through town, clinging to its damp face. Long weals stretched across its mouth and cheeks, droplets of blood glistening where her nails had broken through. Red smeared the lower half of its face around its swollen lips. Its blue eyes gleamed with tears, the first that had fallen in months.

And it was her.

Grace squeezed her eyes shut, pressing the drawing to her heart.

'Ah don't want to die.'

It was so unfair. She was so young, she had her whole life ahead of her, her ma had always said so. She had wanted to do things, she'd wanted to be an actress and a news reporter and a mortician and a nurse. She wanted to make enough money to donate to charity so girls like her could be the first in their families to go to school, too, she wanted to earn a medal and be a war hero, she wanted to help people. That was what Grace had always wanted. She wanted to be someone. That's why she'd became a nurse, that's why she had got tangled up with America in the first place, so she could afford to.

She just wanted to be good, she tried to be good, but it was never enough. She'd told Hannah she didn't want to get in trouble again after that first time, but it just kept happening, no matter what she did, there was always some lesson she had to learn or punishment she had to take and now she was going to die. She was going to die without ever having done anythin', without ever making her family proud or savin' anyone. She was going to die alone in a foreign country with the only person left who loved her, the man that would kill her, and it was probably goin' to be on a goddamn empty stomach.

Grace shoved off of the counter, marching out into the hall. She didn't care much about the noise she was making. America was a deep sleeper unless he sensed a threat. And he knew Grace wasn't one.

She stumbled into the dark kitchen, falling to her knees in front of the tiny electric refrigerator. Yanking the door open, she grabbed her bowl of mashed potatoes and set it on the floor. She reached into it with her bare hands, scooping out a mass of cold congealed goop and shoving it into her mouth, then another, not taking time to chew. She'd made them the way her ma had, buttermilk smooth, and they went down that way until her mouth was too full to swallow and they dribbled down her chin. The potatoes squished between her fingers as she grabbed another handful, forcing it in until the sensation was too much and she doubled over, puke splattering on the tile floor.

She didn't want to clean it. She didn't want to miss a spot and have to learn another lesson, she didn't want to scoop the rest of the potatoes into the trash and take it to the garbage dump, she didn't want America to see her like this, disgusting and messy and ugly.

She din't want to die.

Grace reached for the drawing again, holding it in hands that were shaking as much as the rest of her, getting blood and tears and potato on it, trying to see herself as Hannah had seen her again. The Grace that had a chance.

'We are the masters of our own destiny.'

She crammed the paper in her mouth. It was thick and suffocating as she folded it in, crushing down on it with her teeth, gnashing it into paste, pushing it down as her gag reflex tried to reject it. It didn't want to go down her throat, but she made it, massaging her esophagus the way she'd been taught in nursing school. For a moment it was stuck, blocking her windpipe, and she felt a surge of panic before she remembered she was going to die anyway. She forced it down, taking a ragged gasp of air when it went.

She could still feel it, a lump in her upper chest that made every breath hurt, but felt a vicious surge of satisfaction even stronger.

America couldn't get rid of it now when she was gone. It was the one thing here that was hers, not his, and it was hers forever now. Hannah would want that, she thought.

And she wanted her to stop believing in curses and master her own destiny.

Grace couldn't do it. Curses were real. Her ma and nana had been murdered by the men they loved because they were cursed, because how could you kill someone you loved if they weren't cursed? It ran in the family, like that blockhead cop had said.

But maybe she could do that second part.

She staggered to her feet, wiping her arm across her mouth. Leaving the sheet behind, she went back to the bedroom, sneaking over to where America had tossed his suit jacket when he'd started in on her. She reached into the pocket, pulling out a set of keys, the same ones she'd used to get those troop positions for Mr. Kim. America didn't hide anything. Grace was a good girl. He didn't expect her to ever fix to do anythin' real bad. It was the only reason she hadn't had to be punished when he'd heard she was near the teahouse during the shootout.

It was unfair that the curse had killed Mr. Kim. He'd said he had a family, a daughter, around her age. Grace should have done this a long time ago.

She looked back into the dark of the room. The moon had slid out of sight. America was just a dark shadow on the bed, sleeping like a kid.

"Ah love you, daddy-o," she whispered.

She did. He was her country. He was the greatest country in the world and he was hers.

She just wished they had never came to Korea.

There was a door. It was coming closer. Grace drove herself on, lifted her hand, unlocked it, opening it with her own power. She gazed into the darkness of the office.

'Master of my own destiny.' No one else, not her pop-pop or her pa or America or some curse. Her.

There was no freedom for her. No escape. Grace's American Dream had ended in 1950. This only ended one way.

He should've hidden the keys. He shouldn't have let her see where he kept it. He'd said it himself, hadn't he? A curse wasn't the only thing that ran in her family. Something else did, too.

Crazy.

The woman stepped over the threshold, her hands steady and her head clear for the first time in months. In years.

If Grace Hartman couldn't escape her curse…

'Maybe ah can break it.'

—

South shot up off the floor, reaching for North as the door burst open with a 'bang!' curling into a ball as he waited for his brother to throw himself at Japan, for the next punishment.

Nothing.

Right. He wasn't there anymore. He was in Busan. Alone. No Japan, no prison shack. No North.

He sat up, holding a hand to his burnt torso as his heart pounded. The door was closed, the house was silent. He didn't know what had woken him. He held his breath as he waited for something, he didn't know what, every hair on his body prickling. Then-

'BANG.'

His heart stopped as the blood drained from his face, freezing him more than the floorboards were able to. All his organs dropped out of place, his legs going weak as for a moment, he was back in that tiny cement room, blood pooling on the floor and his brother staring at him like he'd just done something unforgivable.

A gunshot.

South surged up, throwing on the clothes he'd tossed to the floor, staggering out of the room and down the hall.

He should stay, he should hide under the covers and wait for whatever it was to be handled.

But the shot had come from America's house.

The Communists, it had to be. North, no one else would be crazy enough to try and take him out. His brother was here, he'd killed America or America had killed him and he needed to know, needed to get to his brother before they could make him disappear if it was the second one, and if it was the first one he needed to get to him too.

His brother was here. He'd come to-

South could hear voices outside as he ran from the depths of the house, bursting out the front door and straight into Wesson, bowling him over.

"Back inside!" Ku Cheol-moo barked, hauling him up.

Men swarmed on the next property, spotlights lighting up the night as their boots pounded down the drive. Down the street, lights had come on in the provinces' manors, faces peeking out the windows as their guards ran towards the commotion.

"What's going on?" South demanded, trying to sound authoritative instead of shrill.

"None of your business," Smith clipped, his gun drawn as he stood by the gate.

"I just heard a gunshot come from America's house!" he cried, incredulous. "How isn't that my business?!"

"False alarm!" a voice called and South's breath caught.

The American didn't sound alarmed or angry, like he would if something had happened to America. So that meant-

'No. Nonononononono.'

South tore out of his guard's grasp, sprinting for the gate. They chased him, but didn't seem to care much about catching him now.

He shot down the road, heart beating in his throat, stomach sloshing. The little bit of hangover he'd had left was gone, blasted away with that shot, the shot that could've been-

He burst through America's gate, slipping between the dispersing soldiers, running up the path. A man caught him before he could get through the door, swinging him around.

"Let me in!" South demanded, struggling, unable to get free.

If it was North, if he was hurt, he had to get to him, America had to know he knew he had him. And if he was dead- If he was dead-

"South Korea's here, sir!" the man holding him called into the house. "Should I let him in?"

"Yeah," a voice called back after a moment. "Send him in."

It was America. He was alive.

South's chest tightened as the man let him go, and he stumbled into the house, every light blazing. The open door at the end of the hall gaped like a mouth, repelling him. He wanted to walk slow, to push back the truth for another second, but he'd never been able to stand waiting for anything, good or bad. He ran towards the maw, bare feet slapping on the wood.

Maybe it wasn't North, maybe it was just some random commie who was stupid enough to try and off America to make North proud. Commies were crazy, crazy enough to try and assassinate the most powerful country on earth, one with atom bombs and hundreds of thousands of soldiers already in their country.

But who else but North would be able to make it past America's security, who else but the man that had killed over four hundred in Seoul almost on his own? Who else but South's brother?

North couldn't be dead, he couldn't, South didn't want him dead, even if he knew he had to be punished, even if he'd hurt him if he found out what he'd done, even if his brother would never forgive him for it, he didn't want him dead. He'd be alone when they were Korea, but at least he'd still have some part of him. If he died he would have nothing and no one. He'd never be fixed, he'd be left scared and cowardly and hated and his brother would be gone.

South skidded to a stop in the doorway of America's room, his eyes widening in horror.

The first thing he saw was the blood, sprayed over the far wall like a crimson flower. The bed was askew, the sheets rumpled and spread out like there'd been a struggle.

And America kneeled on the floor, a body in his arms.

Relief burst through him so strongly that he almost fell to his own knees, before the horror welled back up.

It wasn't North.

It was Grace.

Her head lay in America's lap like she was sleeping. But she wasn't. Blood stained the long blonde hair that cascaded over the Countryhuman's legs like a waterfall, and more spotted the white sheet that covered her body. Her blue eyes were wide open, staring sightlessly up at the ceiling, and what looked like bloody claw marks scored across her mouth.

America looked up. South couldn't see his eyes past his aviators, but he sounded stunned as he said, "She fucking killed herself."

South blinked, unable to understand. "What?"

America looked back down at his dead girlfriend. "I woke up with her standing in the middle of the room, holding my pistol to her head. I tried to stop her, but she just…"

South stared at the blood staining her temple. He couldn't see the bullet wound through her thick golden hair, but the spray of blood said, yeah, she'd shot herself.

"Why?" he asked, baffled.

America's aviators were locked on her pale face. “How am I supposed to know?”

“Were there… Were there any signs?” South asked, thinking of the day he’d helped her with the door. “Did you know she was going to-?”

“Don’t you think if I knew I would have stopped her, South?” America demanded, and he flinched.

“Sorry, I didn’t mean- I just can’t believe she’d do that.”

Grace had been sick lately, yeah. America said she hadn’t been up to leaving the house. But sick enough to kill herself?

The tension went out of America’s shoulders, and he sighed. “She’s always been a little fucked in the head, kid. Her grandpa crashed the car with her and her grandma in it when she was like, five. She was the only survivor. Then her dad kicked her mom's bucket, then his own. Blew their brains out with a shotgun on a Sunday afternoon. She was the one to find the bodies. If she was an hour earlier, he probably would’ve killed her, too.”

“Jesus Christ.” South was stunned, looking at the dead woman with new eyes.

He’d always thought she was a little ditzy, with nothing in her head but America. He couldn’t have imagined something like that had happened to her.

It gave him a little hope. Maybe even after everything that had happened to him, people could think he was normal, too.

‘Even if you know the truth.’

‘Shut it.’

“Yeah,” America said. “Stuff like that screws a broad up. She was always a little crazy. It ran in her family, clearly. That was why I wanted her in the first place.” He looked down at her as he stroked his hand across her cheek. “But I never thought she’d do something like this. Guess Korea was just too much for her.”

South winced guiltily. As he did, he noticed something on the ceiling. A bullet hole. He frowned.

"Did she just shoot herself in the head?"

"Jesus fucking Christ, South," America snapped, suddenly angry. "Can't you see I've practically got my girl's brains in my lap?"

The Korean flinched. Okay, yeah, that had been kind of insensitive.

"Sorry," he quickly apologized, rubbing his arm. "Do you… want me to do something for her? Like… a funeral or something?"

He didn't know what the protocol was for your friend's girlfriend killing herself in your country.

"Naw, I'll handle it." America's grip tightened on her corpse, then he sighed. "Take this as a lesson, Southie- the hot ones are always a little crazy. This is just the price you gotta pay for a good time."

That was… also a little insensitive. South knew America wasn't a sensitive guy, but he thought he would probably be bawling his eyes out if his girlfriend would rather kill herself than be with him. But he'd never had a girlfriend before, so maybe he wouldn't. You never knew how you'd handle something until you had to.

'Like whipping Gangwon?'

'You should kill yourself, too.'

And that obviously wasn't why Grace had committed suicide. She'd been with America, for God's sake. She'd had even more of his attention than South, and he showered her with presents. South had seen all the jewellery and make-up he bought her that she always covered herself in. She had been courting the strongest country in the world, someone who could give her everything she could ever want, and she'd still killed herself. On his birthday, no less.

South tracked the nail marks over her face, like she'd been trying to claw her skin off.

‘Definitely crazy.’

“Want to skedaddle, Southie?” America prompted. “My girl left me a bit of a mess to find someone to clean up.”

“Oh yeah, sorry.” South lingered for a second. “See you tomorrow?”

“Of course, kid. There’s a roast in the fridge- we can make some sandwiches for lunch, maybe put some syrup on them. Have a little celebration of life for her. No one else will.”

South sagged in relief. From the way he’d been talking earlier when they went to watch the bombings, he was a little worried his friend had wanted to stay in Canada for his birthday. With Canada. But he sounded excited for the sandwiches, and had brought him that really good maple sugar thing.

“Okay, cool.” He turned, then turned back. “Oh, and… sorry about Grace.”

He really was. Even if she’d barely ever even looked at him. She hadn’t deserved to die.

“Yeah,” America said quietly, his fingers sinking into her bruised cheek. “Me too.”

South was glad it was just a crazy broad, not a crazy commie. North was safe. So was America. His brother hadn’t come in on some insane ‘rescue’ mission to try and kill him, and spirit South away.

‘Of course he didn’t. He never came to save you from Japan, did he?’

No. Of course it wasn’t him.

So why did he feel disappointed?

South took one last look at Grace. Her fair skin and golden hair and big blue eyes. She really had been pretty.

He shook his head, heading off down the hall.

And crazy. Because as he looked at her lips, scratched so hard they were a bright, tender pink, stained with blood…

He almost could have sworn she was smiling.

You can’t, you can’t catch me now.

Did Grace try to break the curse by ‘killing’ America, only to fail? Or did she succeed the way she meant to from the start? No one will ever know but America. And he’ll never tell.

She's still buried somewhere in Korea. No one was waiting for her to come home.

Me and You

1924

Despite everything, Hwang had been eager to start teaching. When his proposal had been accepted by Japan, he'd thrown himself into study, learning everything he could as quickly as he could, even knowing he was just supposed to be an assistant. Even after finding out how restricted what the schools were allowed to teach was, he'd simply resolved to use any chances he had to inculcate what he could as thoroughly as possible, hoping he could kindle a desire to learn in his students that would drive them to seek out more diverse topics themselves. On the first day he'd been called in to cover a class, the only anxiety he had felt was anxiousness for the school to open its doors so he could begin.

That had changed towards the later years. As the censorship waxed, his enthusiasm waned. He'd still wanted to teach, but he no longer looked forward to the classes. He knew as he stood in front of the blackboard he would face ridicule and apathy, and for nothing, as he wasn't even able to teach the students how he wanted. They wouldn't want to learn it if he could. The Japanese students' superiority was only reinforced year after year. They looked at him with contempt, the Korean students looked at him with disdain, and they both strove to show that they held less respect for him than the other. Deep down the older Korean children had started to realize that they would never be equal to their peers, so they fought to be even more outwardly devoted to Japan, and even more dismissive of their native country. And its province.

He had kept an eye out for more students like Choi Jung-nam, but as discontentment with the Occupation rose outside, the wealthy students only hunkered down to avoid being lumped in with the malcontents, and to keep the cold, merciless eyes of Japan off them, the way Hwang almost had before extending his extracurricular offer to the boy. Their essays became more rote, and their responses when asked what they thought of the Occupation rarely strayed from what was acceptable.

Perhaps they might've, had Hwang told them why he was asking-not to affirm their loyalty to Japan, but to sleuth out those with likeminded views that were quite the opposite.

But he hadn't been able to. As far as they knew, he was asking their opinions because he was loyal to Japan and wanted to ascertain that they also were. And as far as he knew, they answered the way they did, mocked him the way they did, because they were.

Being ordered to fill in a class became something that made his hands tremble and his stomach twist itself into knots, especially when it was one Choi Jung-nam wasn't in. Going over the coursework changed from being a chance to internalize information he could impart on others to a shield to protect him from some of the students' mind games. The better he knew the work, the less of a chance they had to convince him that he didn't. And when he was learning by mechanically memorizing what the other teachers and textbooks said, it didn't feel much like learning at all.

Something he'd used to love had turned into something he dreaded. The only classes he looked forward to in that final year were the ones he snuck out to with Choi Jung-nam and Suzuki Yoshi.

Since joining Korea, he hadn't felt that way. They'd only started their night classes in this village, as he'd wanted them to attain literacy themselves before teaching anyone, and later added an understanding of theory to that requirement once he got his hands on their works about Marxism. But Hwang hadn't felt any nervousness before the class he'd held here, and if it hadn't been for what happened after, he still wouldn't, even with the less than positive reception.

He could tell that even when his words escaped the peasants, they still paid rapt attention. They held a certain respect for him as one of their Provincehumans, despite his youthful appearance. The working men and women of this village felt nothing but hatred for the country stealing their harvests for his own, and felt no need to degrade their own nation to prove themselves loyal colonial subjects. They may not understand what he was trying to say, but they listened, all of them, in a way he wasn't used to. It was thrilling.

But tonight, he was nervous. Quite nervous indeed.

"Are you sure I shouldn't observe for another day?" he fretted.

"Nope!" Hae said confidently, not lowering her voice.

They were outside the village house that had turned into a permanent nighttime classroom. Hwang winced, knowing her voice would carry through the thin clay and rice straw walls to those waiting inside. He could hear their quiet conversations well enough.

"It might be best," he attempted, gesturing for her to lower her voice (a sign she knew from their close calls with the Kempeitei). "A few more days of watching you speak with them could prove useful."

The night classes were held every night, after the day's work was done, and mostly by Hae. Learning to read was a daily endeavour, and that was the main goal of them. It was just a happy accident that the only writings they had to practice with were their political works, which allowed the provinces to slip in little discussions on the idea of land reform or a society where each person contributed what they could and received what they needed, something his cousins all echoed Korea's enthusiasm for now.

The more classes he'd observed, the more Hwang had to admit that Korea was right- the people here already had a certain intrinsic grasp of Socialist-adjacent ideas. They knew they were the ones who did the hard toil of working the land (very hard toil; their unit had been helping with spring planting for a week, and also Hwang was firmly on both North Hamgyong and now- to his great dismay- South Chungcheong's 'shit lists'), and they knew the were the ones who deserved to see the spoils of it. Not Japan and not some landlord. And they could apply those same ideas to the proletariat in the cities easily enough.

Hwang couldn't yet see them as the desired hard core of the Revolution Korea wanted them to be, but he could admit that they weren't quite as far below the intellectual class as he'd assumed.

Had that sounded insensitive? He was being careful to moderate the language he used for the people around them, ever since his talk with Hae under the sansuyu tree.

He thought that was okay to say. He had assumed they were below the intellectual class on an intellectual level, just like he'd assumed Hae hadn't taken offense over his comments about the peasant class or her illiteracy. Both errors he never should've committed as an intellectual.

At least they weren't fatal. That Hae was trying to coax him inside now was proof of that.

"No more watchin'," Hae declared, lowering her voice as much as she ever did (which wasn't much at all). "You've got'a do what Korea says an' 'learn by essperience.'"

"Perhaps we could finish our catalogue of books first?" he asked meekly.

He'd been doing as planned and rereading every tome and article they'd collected so far, making sure to internalize the information correctly this time. Hae had been helping. Every chance they had to snatch a few minutes of rest in the fields or before dinner, they would sit between the rows or head out to the cornus officinalis to read together, him helping her understand the more theoretical concepts and her making sure he could explain those concepts in ways someone of her educational level could make sense of.

It was taking longer than it should have. In a week, they'd only managed to get through Marx's 'The Communist Manifesto' and 'Socialism: Utopian and Scientific,' neither of which were particularly long works. Even with the limited time they had between working (and Hwang truly understood why most peasants didn't have the time to pick up a book and teach themselves to read now), he still could've finished their collection by himself. But stopping to explain a word to Hae or elaborate on a piece of information and how European conditions contrasted with theirs ate into their progress.

Hwang had thought he might find it slightly frustrating, the way he had when Hae had been taking forever to learn her characters, but was pleasantly surprised to find that he didn't. In fact, it was far more enjoyable than reading on his own. He got to teach her while learning himself, and didn't just learn from Marx and Engels, but from Hae, too. And the shortcomings in her writing weren't mirrored in studying. Even when she still couldn't read their Korean translations very well, or the untranslated texts at all, once he read a sentence to her, she could repeat it back verbatim, even if she didn't know what it meant. It was his job to explain it so she did, and it was one he found more fulfilling than teaching at the Seoul school had ever been.

But their speed had left him feeling vastly unprepared for hosting his first night class since Korea and Hae had reprimanded him.

"I just think-"

"No thinkin'!" Hae decreed, grabbing him by the thin wrist. "Doin'!"

Before Hwang could protest again, she'd dragged him through the door and in front of half the village.

The chatter cut off as the villagers rose from the floor to greet them.

"Comrade Hwang," the village elder said, bowing. "An' the li'l lady."

The elderly man had become used to using the term 'comrade' to address them, but not Hae's name. Korea didn't approve, but it didn't seem to bother the province.

"Howdy," she chirped. "Hwang's goin' to be teachin' tonight. An' he's goin' to make sense this time."

A laugh rippled through the packed room, making Hwang flush. But it wasn't like the cruel laughter of the students at the school. It was more amused than mocking.

"That would be much appreciated," the elder said, stroking his long black beard. "Though I reckon you were makin' enough sense as it were."

The comment had been addressed to Hae, not him. When an old rural patriarch was more willing to listen to a girl than you, that was when you knew you were in dire straits.

"Ah'm still here," Hae assured him, taking Hwang's wrist again and dragging him over to the front of the room. "If Hwang says somethin' that don't make sense, ah can essplain it for ya."

Hwang bit his tongue on correcting her 'don't' right now, knowing it was a speech quirk many of those with the Jeolla dialect shared.

"Yes," he said, clearing his throat. "Hae is here to translate for me, so to speak."

Ironic, considering her grasp of Korean was still so poor. Objectively. He wasn't judging.

He paused as he saw a man pull his cushion out from under himself and set it next to the one already waiting for his sister. There weren't enough in the house to seat everyone, even with some brought from other houses, so most were sitting directly on the raised clay floor, not even ondol flooring. If the village was raided, the Kempeitei would likely go to one of the larger chosonjips first, not this weathered chogajip, giving the night class attendees time to flee, hopefully.

He supposed he'd noticed it before, peripherally, while standing in the corner watching Hae orate, but…

Hwang slid his eyes to peek at the men and scattering of women packed like papers in a filing cabinet in the sparse house.

They all looked worn and exhausted, drained from spending the entire day weeding, planting, conducting repairs, and tending to someone else's land. The villagers were sacrificing their comfort and much-needed rest to attend these classes, some of the women fighting tooth and nail with their husbands to come. One even had a babe cradled in her arms, rocking him perfunctorily to keep him from waking.

And still, every day someone gave up a cushion for whoever was holding the class. And two of them had given up theirs for him and his sister.

Hwang preferred to stand when lecturing, but he folded his legs under himself and sat on the cushion. He would've insisted the villagers take it, but he knew rejecting hospitality was tantamount to a slight for those with little. He was fairly certain he'd seen Korea come close to getting beaten for trying to turn down dinner one night.

Hae flopped down, legs splayed out, before she peeked at him and copied his pose, shaking her shoulders out as she tried to look like a dignified observer.

Hwang had ran out of paper long ago. The teaching materials the villagers had were homemade pulpy sheets with the fibres visible, and stubs of charcoal saved from the fire. Some of them already had blacks stains on their fingers from practicing on their breaks and before he'd arrived.

And they were all looking at him raptly, just as eager to learn as he was to teach. Despite the lines drawn at the corners of their eyes, there was a light in their earthy depths that he was familiar with from those first years at the high school. He'd seen it in the mirror.

Ah. Maybe that was it.

Aside from Choi Jung-nam and Suzuki Yoshi, most of his students had never looked at him that way. They were the sons of landlords and businessmen, those few that could afford education, and they'd taken it for granted. Waking up early, sitting in class, doing homework, were all inconveniences in their easy lives. Schooling was just an item on the checklist in the life their parents wanted for them.

But to the peasant class, even reading was a right denied to them. Japan purposefully drove the price of paper and pencils up, refusing to manufacture writing tools in the country, and the landlords worked them too hard for self-study. They didn't take chances to learn for granted because they couldn't, even when they knew that learning to be literate wouldn't miraculously provide a new life for them. There were more barriers than literacy between them and a life where they didn't have to slave away in the fields for someone else's sake. But they still wanted to learn how to read and write, even just so they could one day teach their children how to.

They wanted to learn.

With the eyes of the class on him, Hwang lowered his head in a half-bow.

"I'm sorry for any confusion with my teaching style before," he said, aiming for polite, but more like how he was learning to apologize to Hae than to a school board.

And biting his tongue on the excuse that he was used to teaching more learned students. Even if it was objectively true, he felt it would be one of those comments that could hurt.

"It's no trouble," the elderly wife of the village chief (one of the women that had fought to be here) assured him. "We just ain't used to city folks 'round these parts. Seoul dialect is hard to parse, so ta speak."

Ah. Yes. Speaking of, Hwang should really be making an effort to switch back to Hwanghae dialect, now that he wouldn't be mocked for it anymore. He would work on that.

"Thank you for your patience regardless."

He looked sideways at Hae, who beamed encouragingly at him, then straightened his back, pushing his glasses up on his face and summoning his orating voice.

"Let's begin."

Since paper had to be withheld for writing practice instead of sample sentences, they were using 'The Agrarian Programme of Russian Social Democracy,' which they'd been translating themselves, Hwang (who had grasped the fundamentals of Russian by now) reading it out loud for Korea so he could copy the words he heard and write them between the Cyrillic lines. His province had offered to do it himself to save his Countryhuman the effort, but he insisted on being the one to scribe.

The villagers passed it around the room, taking turns reading paragraphs out loud, squinting at their Countryhuman's handwriting.

Hwang had seen him practicing it back when their own reading lessons first began, after Gyeonggi had said it was hard to read. He'd accidentally caught him out in the woods pressing charcoal into a boulder, hunched over to see better in the moonlight. And though Korea had quickly moved in front of it, he'd caught a glimpse of the characters he was writing, trying to tame his scratchy handwriting into something more legible with the lyrics of a song Hwang had never heard before, something about a man trying to convince the woman he loved to dance with him, which seemed... uncharacteristic to say the least.

It had been a scandalizing reminder that his Countryhuman had been formed illiterate, and it had also worked. As small as Korea's writing was, crammed in between Lenin's lines, it was still quite easy to read, plain and unstylized. Though Hwang could tell by the way some of the men buried their noses in the thin pamphlet that they needed glasses they couldn't afford.

Whenever they would finish a passage, he would explain what he knew of the conditions in Russia at the time it had been written, and what Lenin intended with it, so that they didn't just understand the words, but what they meant. He made sure to speak slowly, to not let himself get carried away, and to pause if it looked like someone was struggling with comprehension.

He couldn't lecture. He didn't just want them to listen- he wanted then to understand.

Occasionally, his mouth would get ahead of him as his mind raced, thinking of the Soviet Union and all they had already accomplished, badly wanting to discuss what he'd heard from the Soviet traders in the north and travellers in the south, and what Korea could accomplish once they were free from Japan. But Hae was there to nudge him and get him back on track. And when he just couldn't find a way to convey what he wanted to, she was there to explain it in simpler terms. It didn't have to happen often, as Korea was right, and Lenin wrote clearly for his intended audience. But his intended audience in this case had been those with already a modicum of political education. There were also some Russian nuances and references to events and people that even Hwang didn't know about. He'd never actually read the agrarian program Lenin was elaborating on, for example.

'Yet.' They should be turning north once they were done here, after having spent over a year mapping the south. There would be more Soviets and Koreans that had lived in or been to the Soviet Union up in the Hamgyongs, with more books and pamphlets to collect, more ideas to refine.

At first Hwang waited anxiously for Korea to barge in and drag him out again, but gradually he gained more confidence, enough that the class ran long, making it through a good chunk of the article. But no one bowed out. They were too caught up in reading. Even if some didn't care about the words or meaning, they cared that they could understand them.

But he eventually knew it was time to start winding down when Hae's eyelids starting to droop. If even she was tired, the farmers must be as well.

"As you can see, our peasantry differs quite a bit from the Russian peasantry in the early 1900s," Hwang said, coming to a close. "Peasants make up the vast majority of our population, and the ratio of tenants to landlords is even more skewed in our nation. Our own system of 'serfdom' was also abolished far longer ago with the nobi system, and we have our colonial relations to contend with, not solely feudal ones."

"We've got to worry about Japan on top'a the landlords," Hae clarified.

Hwang nodded. "But you share the common conditions of living in bondage, suffering under the rent system, and living at the mercy of landlords."

He could see by their darkened eyes and clenched jaws that they were well aware of that.

Korea's Socialist revolution was far in the future- they had the Occupation to deal with first. As such, they had to rally every patriotic member of every social class. Hwang had met with several of the minor landlords in the area to do just that. A couple had been quite pleasant. They weren't hugely landed, this village being small and poor. Each one only had a few acres, one or two renters.

Yet if that rent wasn't paid on time, if the summer brought a drought or floods and the harvest was poor, those renters could lose the land they lived on. They and their families would become homeless, doomed to drift until they could either carve a new life out in the city or on another farm, or perished.

It didn't matter how friendly some of the landlords were, or if they felt any neighbourly bond with their renters and wouldn't just evict them. They could. Or the sons who inherited the land could evict the sons of the peasants that inherited the rent.

Korean peasants owned little, as the single-room house around them could demonstrate with its sparse collection of kitchenware and threadbare dividing sheet. They didn't truly own their harvests or their houses or their land. During his time at the school, Hwang could say that the only thing he owned was himself, his mind and body. Their peasants couldn't even say that. The only things they owned were their minds. And the ones who owned their bodies made sure they were so worn down that they couldn't even use those to their full potential.

"None of it is right," Hwang told them what they already knew. "And the peasants in the nations under the Russian Empire knew that, too. They've managed to overthrow those who oppressed them, and now the Soviet peasants have claimed the land for themselves with their Decree on Land. We believe we can do something like that for ourselves in Korea, too."

"We can do more," Hae said, puffing our her chest. "'Cuz we're better than any stuffy ol' Soviets."

Hwang hid a wince. That was another quote from Korea that bordered on direct. Best not to share that, though.

"We can do more," he did agree, adjusting his glasses as he looked out at the house full of peasants. "But... the Soviet Union has only been able to accomplish what they have because of their peasants. So if Korea is to cast off the chains not just of Japan, but of our own unfair systems..."

He glanced at Hae, then back at his class.

"We're going to need you."

Whether the Soviet peasant-worker uprising was a fluke or not was yet to be seen. But even if it had been, they would need their peasants regardless.

And Hwang was slowly becoming certain that if anyone could recreate a once-in-a-lifetime fluke, it was Korea.

Hae wrapped around his arm, and he could feel her grin light up the room more than the lantern hanging from the ceiling beam. But he kept his eyes on the class.

The villagers looked to their elder to speak for them. He gazed around at them, chewing on nothing, then nodded to himself.

"I reckon you've got us," he said, running his fingers along his beard. "I may be one of the landowners yer talkin' about, but I like to think I'm a fair sort. Nothin' like those land-grabbers comin' in and buyin' everythin' up."

He got a few nods from his neighbours.

"Iffin this carries on, we'll all end up tenants."

"To the Japs," another man muttered.

The elder bobbed his head, his old eyes weary. "I ain't never had a problem with the way things work. But it's about clear that if they carry on like this..."

"We can't," the woman with the babe murmured, her eyes half-lidded with exhaustion in her dust-streaked face.

The old man nodded in resignation, turning back to Hwang. "So your Comrade Korea has us. For whatever a bunch of bent-backed peasants are worth."

"You can't put a price on people," Hae told him, and Hwang agreed, though it wasn't quite true.

You could put a price on people. From the nobi system to the current one, their peasants had always had a price on them. How much they could sell, how much they could make for their masters, how much value their labour could produce. You shouldn't be able to put a price on people. But those with far more power had.

They were tasked with removing that price. Or rather, putting their value into their own hands.

"Then I'm glad to call you all comrades." Hwang cleared his throat, attempting a less sober tone. "Now, do you have any questions about what we discussed today?"

To his delight, they did. A few tired men took their leave, but unlike his students back when he'd asked that question, the rest crowded around, voicing theirs, including the woman with a baby.

Hwang thrummed with satisfaction, even as Hae had to occasionally interject to translate for him.

'No, not translate,' he thought, looking around at their faces, glowing despite their weariness, exhausted, but still wanting to learn. It was the wrong word, and he shouldn't have used it earlier.

They all spoke the same language, after all.

Later, as the class ended and they trickled away, he and Hae bid the homeowner a good night and left the house. Even with the moonlight casting a silver glow over it, the village seemed much darker than inside, until Hae's smile illuminated it as she threw herself at him.

"Ya did it, Hwang!" she cheered, crushing his ribs. "Ah knew ya could!"

"Naturally," he sniffed, adjusting his glasses around her head. "An intellectual can do anything he sets his mind to."

She puffed her cheeks at him, making him smile.

"And I couldn't have done it without your assistance," he admitted.

Her grin consumed the lower half of her face again. "Nope! You should give me your kimchi when we get back."

"Extorter," he accused, before looking out at the small village.

The villagers were meandering off, some only having to walk next door, while others plodded out of the village together, off to their more distant farmhouses. A man with a cowcart pulled up next to a group of them, and they got in.

As he tapped his lash against the ox's broad flank, Hwang could hear those in the back eagerly discussing the night class past yawns. It filled his thin chest with a warm glow.

"I suppose that's the potential Korea sees in you all," he said to Hae, noting that now he was classifying her with the peasants as well. "You don't know anything."

Hae- still plastered to his side- squinted up at him.

"I mean no offense," Hwang said quickly. "I simply mean that intellectuals have received education already, and some of them let themselves think that means they know everything."

Like the students in his old classes. Not even adults, but already convinced there was nothing else of value they could be taught.

"But the people here know they know nothing," he continued, watching the cowcart leave the village. "And they want to."

He knew there were plenty of intellectuals like him that wanted to see them free, and some that would fight for it. But Korea was right that they'd been taught under Japanese and feudal ideals. And it was hard for someone to unlearn something they'd been taught. Often they would actively reject it, refusing to intake anything new.

But if you had never received an education, like the majority of their peasants, you had less to unlearn. Their peasant class had learned by experience only. And it had taught them that life shouldn't have to be this way, short and hard and miserable.

Hwang wanted to apologize for his rigidity before, and any of his unintentionally unkind comments. But he knew it could reflect on Korea poorly if the villagers knew one of his provinces held biases like that. So he would just work on unlearning them himself, and continuing to learn.

And to help Korea make sure their lives wouldn't always have to be this way.

"They want to learn," he murmured.

"Okay!" Hae said enthusiastically. "That's good! Ayuh?"

"'Ayuh,'" he made himself echo.

She saw the way his face scrunched, and pouted. "You don't like my words."

"I do," he corrected sheepishly. "That one just isn't for me. But your words were very helpful tonight."

Hae considered this, then nodded decisively, tilting her chin up. "Prob'ly 'cuz they make more sense than yours."

Hwang sighed.

"Don't worry," she assured him, skipping towards the earthen todam wall around the house. "Ah'll give Hwang lots more words. An' you can teach me yours."

"I'm looking forward to it," Hwang padded after her. "Once we get rid of your atrocious Japanese accent."

"Mah accent isn't at- atroc- at-ro-sh-i-oos." Hae hung her head. "Danggit."

Hwang smiled. "I'll teach you that, too."

As they started down the road towards the village chief's house, there was a noise from behind them. He looked over, seeing Korea emerge from the darkness behind the chogajip.

'Eavesdropping again.'

Hae immediately started to vibrate. "Korea!"

She threw herself at him, her forehead slamming into his palm before she could slam into him. It didn't stop her, her legs churning as he held her back with one hand.

Ever since she'd recovered from her imprisonment, their Countryhuman had been more stringent with the 'no hugging' rule. This dissuaded her not at all.

As Hae finally bounced back, she asked, "Did ah do a good job, Korea?"

"You ask me this after every class," Korea complained, walking by her. "The answer doesn't change."

She pouted, but said, "What about Hwang? He's been workin' real hard, an' everyone understood him tonight. You should tell him he did a good job."

"Why should I congratulate him for correcting an attitude he shouldn't have had in the first place?" Korea asked coolly.

"I need no congratulations," Hwang said quickly. "You're quite right- I allowed myself to fall into prejudices I shouldn't have."

He didn't want to be like those who thought they already knew everything. He was a true intellectual, a Marxist. He knew if Marx himself had lived to see the Bolshevik Revolution, he would've changed his own opinions, so he couldn't cling to his. Dogmatism was the death of revolution.

Hae pouted up at Korea, sagging against his arm with a sound like someone had inflated a pig intestine with air, then jabbed a needle into it.

Their Countryhuman sighed. "You both did well," he grudgingly praised.

"Ura!" Hae shot up with a cheer that echoed over the village. "Didja hear that, Hwang? Korea says we did a good job!"

He was already polishing his glasses, vigorously.

"Shh!" Korea sharply hushed her. "People are trying to sleep."

"Oops," Hae whispered. "Ah mean 'Ura, Korea says we did a good job.'"

Hwang shook his head, bemused.

"We're leaving in two days," Korea suddenly announced, not looking back as he strode off. "This village has awakened. South Hamgyong, South Chungcheong, and I have written out copies of our books for the people here. Now that they know the basics, they should be able to teach themselves the rest."

Hwang felt a pang of sadness. Even when he hadn't connected as well with the peasants as his sister had, it had been nice to stay in one place for awhile. He loved travelling and seeing all the sights of their country as they mapped it, but he'd also enjoyed getting to know the people here, and learning how they lived their lives. And clearly that experience had been even more valuable.

But he didn't protest. The Kempeitei were always on their trail. They couldn't let it lead them here.

"But plantin' season's not over yet," Hae protested.

"They've worked this land with their own hands for decades," Korea said. "They'll be fine. We need to work to make sure it's their land they're planting. And we've stayed too long."

He looked out across the plains beyond the village, like he could see Japanese soldiers somewhere beyond the darkened horizon.

"We'll go north," he told them. "We'll stop in Seoul, then head up to finish mapping South Pyongan and work our way northeast, then down to the Amnok."

Hwang blinked in surprise. "Seoul? Are we visiting Suzuki Yoshi?"

He'd like to. He hadn't seen her since the mission to retrieve South Chungcheong. He wanted to know if she had heard from Choi Jung-nam at all, and find out if he'd left for Japan.

If he had, it meant he had been there for the Kanto Carnage last year.

"I'll see if that contact she gave us can find out if she has any news for us," Korea clipped, not looking back.

Hwang frowned.

"We'll scout what we can of Bukhan Mountain while moving through," the other boy continued. "Try to make up for a full survey near the capital being too risky."

Hae perked up. "Ah get to see Seoul?"

"From a distance," Korea replied. "It's too dangerous for you to head into the city."

But not him, evidently.

"Korea," Hwang tried. "What do you need to do there?"

"Try and get in contact with your... student."

It was nice that he'd made an effort not to call her 'your Jap,' but Hwang was still curious. The way he'd said it before made it sound like that wasn't his main goal.

But Hae was already chattering enthusiastically about finally seeing their capital, eating up any silence he could've asked questions into.

She went on to tell Korea every little thing that had transpired in the night class, though it was quite obvious he'd heard it all. Still, he didn't tell her to shut up until they reached the chosonjip, and he went to talk with the old village chief smoking on his stoop.

"We made a good team today," Hwang said, inhaling the scent of tobacco.

"Ayuh." Hae nodded vigorously. "Hwang an' Hae are the best teachers ever!"

They really did cover each other's shortcomings.

"I suppose it makes sense we work well together," he said idly, fingers itching for his pipe. "We're supposed to be one person, after all. We will be after the literacy gap closes, most likely."

It had taken awhile for Hae to understand that they were going to be one person someday, once the root problem causing two of them to form was solved. Truthfully it had taken Hwang some time to wrap his head around it as well. He hadn't known there were two Hwanghaes. In his mind, and in all his predictions of the future after Japan was gone and their country was free, he would always be himself.

He knew now that wasn't true.

"Mhm," Hae said, more subdued.

Hwang pushed the thought away. It still troubled him, but there wasn't anything to be done for it. All he could do was- All they could do was educate each other so that when it came, the merge would be seamless.

"Hwang." Hae caught his sleeve before he could go attempt to wheedle tobacco off the elder.

"Yes?"

She looked at him as close to seriously as her round face could get. "Ah don't think you're like those in-tell-ec-tu-als that think they know everythin' an' don't got'a learn nomore. You're doin' a real good job at learnin' how to make sense. An' how to be my brother."

Hwang's heart squeezed, and he reached over to hold the hand clutching his sleeve. "Thank you," he said, touched.

Hae smiled.

"But it's 'anymore.'"

"Mrgh!" She slapped him on the chest. But her pout was hiding another big grin.

Her brother smiled fondly, looking up. Korea met his eyes from the stoop, giving him a single nod.

Hwang felt a flush of accomplishment, though he didn't let himself think it was the accomplishment of success. There was no 'success' with learning, no final stop. It was an unending road, one he hoped to have all their people walking someday, alongside him.

And he would look forward to every step.

—

1952

"Thank you for the help, Comrades Hwang and Hae." The factory manager dipped his head to them.

"Thank you for your efforts," Hwang's said, returning the head bow and watching the man incline himself so his was slightly deeper.

Unlike Korea, he had no desire to stifle the instinctive expression of gratitude and respect, so he let it stand. Even though his brows crinkled at the look of pain on the man's face.

"And thanks for lettin' me spin your big fan," Hae said happily.

Hwang had to look away from her. They were at the new location of the Hwanghae Ironworks, an essential factory whose production was incredibly hampered by the blackout. In order to keep the conveyor belts with the raw ore on them moving, and the cupola of molten iron turning, they had to spin the fans by hand, an incredibly arduous task.

One his sister was very enthusiastic about. Unlike him, she enjoyed repetitive tasks that didn't require much thought. She'd been turning one of the fans for nearly the entire two hours they'd been at the factory, and was covered head to toe in grime. Her hands were smeared with it, and her habit of mopping her brow with her arm, combined with the powder dust that had been floating in the air, had left her bandages and flag streaked with dirt, only two circles around her large white eyes saved by the protective eyewear she'd been wearing.

But there were still burns there, red and black and creeping out of the dressings.
Even when the Chaeryong Power Station in their province had been spared any new damage, Hwanghae's transformers had been utterly destroyed.

"It's our honour, Comrade Hae," the manager said, bowing to her. "Would you like to use our bathhouse...?"

"Ah'm alright," she assured him. "We've got information work to do."

Hwang checked his thin watch. "And we're due in an hour."

"We'll let you get to it then."

There was a weariness in the manager's brown eyes, one mirrored in his coworkers as he trudged back over to them, his back slightly bent as he tried to mask his pain in a way that was all too familiar to Hwang.

Before they could leave, Hae squared her shoulders and braced her hands behind her back in as she called for their attention again.

"We're real proud of how hard you're all workin', comrades," she told the group seriously. "Ah know it's real tough operatin' everythin' by hand."

Indeed, all the workers in Songnim looked far more exhausted than they had when they visited previously, and far more dirtied.

They'd been fighting hard to mechanize their production so that their labourers would no longer have to carry heavy loads on their backs and expend all their energy at work, leaving them unable to study or enjoy their personal lives. But the blackout had practically sent them back to just after Liberation.

"That's why you need to make sure your procure those pushcarts," he said to the woman that led the ironworks' Party cell. "Your pig iron is essential for our steelworks to increase our military production, not to mention daily necessities. But we can't let the enemy reduce our workers' conditions to those we had under Japan."

"We'll make sure our comrades have what they need," the woman said determinedly, her filthy fist over her heart.

She couldn't force their suppliers to conjure pushcarts out of thin air, but Hwang was convinced she wasn't one of those that would pay lip service to the idea, then not take any concrete action towards it. The Party organization here had been taking too much command of production before the war, instead of helping the manager play his full role, but had rectified their mistakes after being criticized. And while membership had been cut drastically by the massacres during the tactical retreat, and was now swelled with new members, the Hwanghae Ironworks cell had been remaining dedicated to the Party line. She would try, at least. For what good it was worth.

"Excellent," he said to her. "And our comrades will work on restoring power."

Not that that would truly help. Their original plant had been utterly devastated, all of their blast furnaces and coking ovens destroyed. They hadn't had even a quarter of it restored in this hilly ravine. Even before the power went out, there were too many tasks being done by hand.

"Until then, keep workin' hard," Hae ordered. "If you encounter any difficulties, ah know you can overcome 'em by workin' together. And if you can't, send a letter to me or Hwang, and we'll see if we can."

Right. They weren't truly back to those days after Liberation, with their country in shambles. Their workers had more protections and rights, and finally owned what they made, whether directly or through the State. They had the Worker's Party cells to guide and organize them.

And they had them. Even if Hwang felt all too small in the face of it all.

Hae stopped imitating Korea, putting her hands on her hips as she beamed at their exhausted comrades. "Korea's real proud of y'all. So keep up the good work!"

The factory manager's lip quivered slightly, and his spine unbent as he raised his hand to his brow in a salute, the rest of the workers mimicking them. Though they weren't military, Hwang and Hae saluted back, and they filed back into the dark factory, already discussing how to implement the changes for adapting to the blackout the provinces had discussed with them.

That was the most important thing they had now. Their workers weren't simply going to work to make money to try and survive, each one dwelling inside himself until his shift ended. They were working for the survival of their country, and they were working together.

Hwang took a single deep breath of the summer air, his ribs crackling as the skin across them stretched painfully. Then he exhaled, ridding his lungs of the choking miasma from the factory.

He could see Hae doing the same, more greedily. She didn’t like the claustrophobic underground factories, though she never hesitated to enter with the eyes of their workers on her. It was even worse with the dim bulbs on the ceilings no longer lighting the way.

Mind cleared, Hwang started briskly for Songnim proper, skimming his report for their next task. "Your work with the fan was excellent," he told his sister. "Hopefully it will convince the men to let women take more active roles."

Women nearly outnumbered men in the factory now, but some of the latter wanted to spare the former from more physical tasks. But while spinning a fan was physically exhausting, it was doable for a woman that didn't have much muscle mass, unlike some of the more strenuous jobs. 'Sparing' the women from the tasks they were capable of would just leave them idle or doing busywork, while the men neglected work their musculature was needed for, which was entirely unacceptable for fighting a protracted war.

"That's what ah was thinkin'," Hae said proudly, skipping down the road. "SH said to make sure all the women were gettin' involved how they should."

Hwang watched dust puff off her white (grey) skin every time her heels met the ground. "Are you sure you don't want to bathe?"

"Nope!" Hae cheerily reaffirmed. "If everyone sees me all dusty, they'll know we're workin' just as hard as them."

"You look like a coal miner."

"And coal miners are hard-workin'!"

Hwang shook his head as they cleared the hills, what was left of Songnim coming into sight. He could see the ruins of the proper Hwanghae Ironworks spread next to the Taedong River. None of the blast furnaces remained, but one had crumbled in a way that left it half-standing, the titanic structure of blackened metal pipes and charred scaffolding twisted together like interlaced ribs.

Blast Furnace Number 3, the first one they'd restored after the Japanese had razed the plant to the ground on their flight from Korea. It had taken two years to repair it, fighting against enemy sabotage and their lack of engineers and technicians. Now far more of their factories were gone, reduced to rubble in a way even Japan hadn't been able to accomplish.

It was hard not to view the destruction of the Supung Power Station as a temporary thing, another issue their workers would resolve in a few days' time, as with their rail and train repairs. But the truth was...

Hae followed his gaze, her own hardening slightly as she stared at the skeletal factory.

"Hwang," she said quietly. "Do you think everyone we met in there was good?"

She was thinking of the sabotage they'd faced during the rebuilding, too. He'd disliked seeing the look of shock and disbelief that would cross her face every time they were told about it back then, but now... He wished it would return. He despised that this new look wasn't foreign anymore.

"There's no way of knowing," he told her, adjusting his glasses.

There were thousands of workers at the Hwanghae Ironworks, even with its reduced size. Statistically speaking, there were probably at least a handful of those that wouldn't mind seeing the destruction of everything they'd worked for. He knew he didn't need to tell his sister that, though.

"But I'd like to think that everyone we spoke with personally today was." He tried to sound confident.

"But they could not be. They could be evil."

Hwang once again bit down on telling her there wasn't truly such a thing. Her gaze had moved past the factory now, over the Taedong and southwest across the plains, towards Sincheon.

"They could be infiltrators," he admitted. "All we can do is make sure our Party organs are conducting proper ideological work and intensifying the struggle against reactionary elements."

Hae nodded wordlessly, tearing her eyes away from horizon.

Part of that struggle was making sure their people were keenly aware of every decision the State and Worker's Party made, and all their policies. The basis of making their country truly democratic was connecting their masses with those governing them, not alienating them from their system the way capitalism did. Their democratic publicity halls played a great role in that. They were where many discussions on candidates for their elections had been held, along with explanations of their policies to the voters. They were hubs for disseminating advanced farming techniques to peasants, motivating them and their workers to increase production, and reinforcing support for the front. They were, as the Premier had said in his address to the Party Organization Committee a few days ago, their base for mass education.

Hwang, as one of those who'd been responsible for workshopping and organizing them, was quite proud of that. But like all things, they could be improved, as had also been ordered at the meeting of the Organization Committee (and wasn't it strange to see South Pyongan at that, especially when she hadn't told any of them she was a card-carrying member now until she'd taken her seat next to him, smirking).

The publicity hall in Songnim was ran by Oh Pan-jin, a peasant from a nearby farm. They met her at her facilities- a long, low hall rebuilt outside the demolished city center- while she explained to them how she was managing it.

"Ah know it's a bit sloppy," the middle-aged woman sighed when they were done, standing next to the main doors. "Ah'm only a part-time chief- ah spend the rest of the day in the field."

"Important work," Hwang assured her. "Naturally the full-time chiefs have more time it devote to running their halls, and don't need to worry about coordination. But the democratic publicity hall is the base of democracy. We can't allow it to be run in a lacklustre manner."

"We're not sayin' a new chief's goin' to be set up," Hae interjected, letting him know he'd been a bit too blunt. "We're just here to help you figure out how to run it..."

"More smoothly," Hwang said, saving her from having to say 'better.'

"Ah really want to," the peasant woman sighed, slumping onto one of the plain wooden benches lining the hall. "Ah've always wanted to be a teacher, but ah can't just abandon the farm. Ah thought ah could have my tteok an' eat it too with this."

"If you have the tteok, why can't ya eat it?" Hae asked curiously.

Oh Pan-jin didn't realize she was questioning the expression, not matching it. "Ah've got my kids. Even when ah'm done workin', ah've got to get them fed an' taken care of. And it's hard to meet up with Comrade Yun- he's the other part-time chief- to set up lectures an' such when ah've got the rascals clingin' to my skirts, let alone attend them."

Hae frowned, and Hwang pondered the conundrum.

That was the case with many of the publicity halls. Most of the men were gone, leaving only the women to run them. On one hand, you had men in local organs that tolerated several mediocre male part-timers instead of appointing one good female chief, and on the other, you had female chiefs that could run their halls well, but had home responsibilities to deal with.

"Ah do understand if you have to appoint another chief." Oh Pan-jin was trying to appear professional, but Hwang could see the flicker of dismay the idea brought her.

He disliked the idea of someone that genuinely wanted to educate being turned away from it, but they couldn't sabotage the functioning of a democratic publicity hall, especially in a factory town like Songnim, just for someone's dream.

"How old are your kids?" Hae asked, plunking down next to her on the bench.

"Three and five," the woman replied. "Ah had an eldest, but..." Her hands balled in her white skirts.

Songnim had been hit hard early on in the war as the Americans sought to destroy their ironworks. Its neighbouring Hwangju had been razed almost completely, along with the villages and farms between them. The Hwanghaes already had the burns by the time they'd reached the Raktong.

That was to say, Hwang didn't need to ask what had happened.

Hae leaned into her, but her voice didn't dull. "That's plenty old enough to bring 'em with you."

The woman looked a bit scandalized. "Ah couldn't bring them to a lecture! My Bong-tak's a crier. If he interrupted, ah'd be embarrassed enough to pitch a fit."

"No, Comrade Hae has a point." Hwang quickly rifled though his mental filing cabinet. "A few of the halls in the more isolated villages have set aside spaces for the peasant women with children to care for. You certainly have the room to do that here. And I'm certain you could find someone to observe them."

Hae nodded vigorously. "And if there's childcare, more women with kids'll want to come, too. Then you've just got'a find people to help out when you're workin'. Songnim's still got lots of folks left around, so ah bet you can find more women to help out part-time."

"There are a few girls that want to help," the older woman said, fiddling with her goreum. "But ah think they need more study first."

"Is their political level high?" Hwang inquired.

"Mm. But their intellectual one is a little behind."

"That's fine," he assured her. "It's not as if you're asking them to be lecturers. So long as they have a correct understanding of our People's Democracy, their other levels can be raised while they work."

Hae beamed up at him. "Ayuh."

"But is it really okay to have women come here just for childcare?" Oh Pan-jin fretted.

"Of course," Hwang said, examining his report. "That plays into the other item you need to improve here. You're holding a satisfactory amount of lectures and meetings, but those aren't enough- you need to increase the entertainment value of the hall."

The woman's thick brows furrowed. "The comrade who inspected my work before told me that, but ah don't really understand. Aren't we supposed to be teachin' here?"

"Ayuh," Hae said. "But that can't be all you're doin'."

Hwang nodded. "If you simply invite lecturers to teach classes, the only ones who show up will be those who already want to learn. But if you invite war veterans or soldiers from the nearby units, or singers or teachers–"

"Or older peasants with stories to tell," Hae added.

"-you'll attract a wider audience."

"But doesn't everyone want to learn?" Oh Pan-jin asked, perplexed.

Hwang wished it were so.

"Some of them aren't aware they wish to learn," he told her. "It's the task of the democratic publicity halls to make them see that they do."

"If you get lots of books an' paint an' stuff, people will want to come," Hae said, kicking her heels. "Then you just teach 'em while they're havin' fun."

"You lure them in with supplies and experiences that are difficult to procure at home right now, give them a place to spend their free time with a background of Socialist instruction, and before they know it, they'll be learning regardless," Hwang explained, pushing his glasses up. "A school dog can recite a poem after three years."

"Except 'lure' makes it sound scary." Hae eyed him, and he coughed. "You're just givin' folks a place to be, and talkin' while they're there. Like church, but better."

That was how the Premier had described it, drawing on his background coming from a Protestant family. Many people hadn't started attending church because they were devout Christians- they'd been driven there to get a taste of music, or for housewives to experience community they wouldn't otherwise be able to. They just became religious by rote after being exposed to the ideas for so long. Ideally, the democratic publicity halls should operate like this, but far more usefully, as they were making sure rural citizens stayed informed, and teaching political theory and production methods instead of scripture. And here, once they learned by rote, they would be driven to learn for real.

Oh Pan-jin considered this, and the light slowly dawned in her eyes again. "So get some of the locals girls to help out, arrange for childcare here, and find some supplies an' entertainment. Ayuh, ah think that could work. Ah'll definitely still need Comrade Yun's help, but ah think ah could manage my share much smoother."

"I think Hae could find you your first storyteller," Hwang said, looking to her. "Is Ms. Kim Myeong-sil still well?"

Hae lit up. "Ayuh! She used to work at the Pyongwon Rubber Factory," she told Oh Pan-jin. "She was part'a the big strike when she was young, and she doesn't live too far from here now. She used to know Kang Ju-ryong."

She was a worker at the factory that had climbed onto the roof of the historic Ulmil Pavilion (now destroyed by bombing) to protest against the wage cuts female workers were receiving, until police had knocked her down against her will. Her and her fellow workers had later gone on to hunger strike, and even more impactfully, forcibly prevent anyone from breaking the working strike. She'd been arrested for joining a Socialist labour union, and died after being released from prison.

"Ah've heard'a her," Oh Pan-jin enthused. "Ah'm sure if Ms. Kim knew her, folks would come to hear what she had to say."

"You should arrange for a soldier or two to speak as well," Hwang suggested again. "War stories will bring in more young men, and demonstrate how ardently our People's Army is repelling the enemy."

"You should get a PVA soldier to come, too," Hae said unexpectedly. "Ah bet if you ask one of the units around real nice, they'll send someone."

Hwang raised an eyebrow at her, and she crossed her arms proudly.

"The Chinese are workin' real hard to help us. The more people that know that, the more they'll help their soldiers out how they help ours."

Her slightly furrowed brows asked, 'Do ya think Korea'll be okay with that?'

"A good idea," Hwang replied out loud. "If they talk about their experience with their own Japanese occupation, and in this war, our peasants will realize how closely our countries are linked."

Now that Korea wouldn't like. The wording, that was. Well, possibly all of it.

"They'll be even more willing to render assistance." There were mostly Chinese units manning the Hwanghae sector of the front, so the deeper the camaraderie that ran between them and the peasants and other civilians along the supply line, the better.

"And ah'm sure people would want to come see a foreign soldier," Hae added.

Hwang twitched an eyebrow at her this time. 'So long as they bring candy, yes?'

His sister tilted her chin.

"That could be good." Oh Pan-jin stood up like she didn't realize she was doing it. "Ah know a few more people ah could invite, too."

"Don't rush it," Hwang advised. "Make sure you have a solid foundation for what you build on it."

"A'course, a'course, ah'll start local before ah spread out." Oh Pan-jin was deep in thought, already heading for the door. "Ah bet ah can talk to Miss Pak today, and she'll jump to help out. If ah don't have to worry about intellectual level, ah can get-"

She whirled around just as her hand touched the door, dipping into a deep bow.

"Oh, pardon me, Comrade Hwanghaes. Is it okay if ah take my leave? Ah've got work to do."

Hwang dipped his head. "Get to it. And good luck teaching, Comrade Oh Pan-jin."

Her smile deepened her wrinkles. "The next time the Party sends someone, ah'll have this place runnin' like water."

With that, she darted off, running herself, Hwang could see before the wooden door closed after her.

"Ura!" Hae cheered when they were alone, jumping up. "Another problem solved!"

"Not solved," Hwang corrected. "Another problem course-corrected. We'll see how she does."

Hae stuck her lower lip out.

He sighed. "But I believe we did a good job."

He was certain Oh Pan-jin had the drive to succeed. It wasn't the teaching she had trouble with, only finding a way out of her own problems. They'd given her a helping hand with that, and freed her up to start solving those of the the publicity hall's.

His sister grinned, attaching herself to his side as he tried to hobble for the exit. "Hae and Hwang make the best team," she sing-songed.

"That we do," he said, then paused before they could leave.

He looked down at his sister. The hall was dim, the electricity obviously off, but he could see fine with the late afternoon light filtering through the high windows. She tipped her head up at him.

"Hae," he began awkwardly. "Do you... remember what I said to you when you were in your recuperative coma? Did you hear it?"

She had said those words to him, but he didn't know how conscious she'd been. Or if she heard everything.

Hae let go of him to clasp her hands at her waist, looking down.

"'Ah want to be warm like you,'" she murmured. "'But ah don't want to be merged with you.'"

He wondered if that meant she'd heard what he said about Choi Jung-nam as well. For safety's sake, he wouldn't ask, though his family was safe in the Soviet Union by now.

Hwang bit his lip, pushing his glasses up, feeling them scrape against his burnt skin. "You... feel the same way, don't you?"

His sister had frequently said she did. She'd wanted to say it that day in the hospital. But she heard the weight in his voice and didn't answer immediately this time. She looked down at her boots for a long while, then raised her head, nodding.

"Ah want to be more like you, too," she told him, dust motes swirling by her bandaged face. "But ah want to be me. Ah don't... Ah don't want to not be me." Her eyes dropped, her knuckles tightening around each other. "And ah don't..."

"I don't want to lose you."

It wasn't about whether they would be better as one person or not, whether they would function more proficiently or fix each other's shortcomings. It wasn't even about himself, even though he didn't want to not be him, either. He didn't want steamed three-grains to stop being his favourite food, he didn't want classical Western string music to become 'borin" to him, he didn't want to lose the ability to stare at a book for hours. Even if he and Hae shared the core qualities that mattered- a love of learning, a desire to teach, boundless curiosity and love for their people, he didn't want to lose those little unimportant things he enjoyed. He didn't even want to lose his glasses.

But even more than that, he didn't want to lose her. He didn't want to live in a world without his sunbeam of a sister in it, even if his sister was still in him.

Hae's eyes glistened in the light as she nodded mutely. "Ah don't want to lose you, either. And ah don't want ta lose the others. Or..."

The way their cousins treated them would change if they merged, just like the way they treated North and South Kangwon had changed since they split. They would still be family, still love them, but it would be different. Even more different than the Kangwons. The way South Pyongan 'bullied' him, the jabs he exchanged with North Hamgyong as they smoked, discussing history with South Chungcheong were all things he didn't want to lose. He knew Hae had plenty of the same.

And he couldn't lose the way Korea stared seriously at him as he explained something from history or a theoretical concept he couldn't quite grasp, drinking in his answer even though he hadn't wanted to ask and Hwang wasn't allowed to tell anyone he had, just as he couldn't afford to lose Hae sneaking into his room and curling up against his side with all his blankets.

Change was good. Society couldn't progress without it. Hwang loved change, tracking patterns, analyzing what brought it about, what it would lead to.

But he didn't want his relationship with his family to change. He didn't want his sister to change. He didn't want to change. Not like this.

He laid a hand on Hae's shoulder, letting her know he understood what she'd been going to say.

"I think..." He drew in a breath. "I think we should tell Korea to separate our province."

"Ah already asked if he would," Hae glumly reminded him. "And you know he doesn't like when we bug him about stuff over an' over."

No, he didn't.

"He's goin' to make us our own provinces," she said, trying to perk up. "Ah know it. He said he'd make the right decision."

And merging them couldn't possibly be right.

Hwang didn't think it was. Hwanghae was large, large enough that leaving it whole didn't lend itself well to administration. Kangwon and Gangwon had said Korea planned to leave them apart for that very reason. And even if the Hwanghaes would be far more efficient as one person, he felt like the convenience of having an extra set of hands outweighed that, considering they were both efficient in their own fields. Surely it was better to have one person who could till an entire field in one day and one who could get an entire essay for a magazine written and edited in that same time than to have one person who could do both equally well, but only had the time to do one. When you looked at it logically, the case that it was better for their country to make the division of Hwanghae official was a sound one. But...

The more Korea rejected what they had to say about his brother, the more he denied that he'd been the one responsible for cutting out his eye, and the more he doubled down on refusing to discuss what had happened to the provinces in the holding camp under the South's purview, and what he had been letting happen to their people...

Their Countryhuman liked to pretend he made decisions solely based on logic. But that wasn't true. It was why Hwang hadn't told him about Hae and Sincheon on the strategic retreat, and why he still wouldn't if it happened again, criticism be damned. Staying in Seoul hadn't been logical. Neither had visiting it all those times during the Occupation or heading to Chorweon or storming Seodaemun or going after Japan on his own or withholding the South’s existence from them for over a decade. And sometimes that was fine. 'Logic' didn't always win wars or save people- emotion did.

But as more time went by, the more Hwang worried that he would make this decision with emotion. And not the one he felt letting Hwang talk his ear slits off or Hae crawl into his futon.

"I don't think we should ask him again," he said to his sister. "I think we should tell him that we want to be our own provinces."

Hae's eyes widened. "What if he says no?"

"Then we argue." Hwang shoved his glasses back into place. "But he won't be able to. We'll gather our proof, present our reasoning, and he'll have to accept it."

And if he didn't, he would have to accept why he didn't. He couldn't pretend it was simply logical.

“Well go to the Premier if we have to.” Even if he left the Provincehumans personally to Korea, surely he would step in for their province's sake.

He was prepared for Hae to say she didn't want to argue with their Countryhuman, but she just wiggled her shoulders, then nodded.

"Okay," she said determinedly. "But what's our proof?"

Hwang was tempted to wage psychological warfare by telling her to get him to let her sleep in his room every night, but Korea could be touchy. There was a very good chance that if he thought he was being seen as too affectionate towards Hae, he would merge them just to prove he wasn't. It was the same reason he couldn't simply feel content letting Hae's wide eyes and gap-toothed existence do the convincing for them.

Plus he couldn't see him letting her in to cuddle when China was there.

"Aside from our current catalogue of accomplishments, including today's," he began. "The Information and Publicity Department needs to get those short-term training courses for rural committees, chiefs, and chairmen ready by winter. They need to be clear and free of jargon to match their current intellectual level."

Hae brightened. "So you're goin' to need my words."

"As always," he said without shame. "We'll work vigorously on it, make it as comprehensive and clear as possible, and get much more work done in the meantime, work that couldn't be accomplished by just one person. And I-" He proudly adjusted his lapels. "Will write a persuasive essay."

Hae puffed out her cheeks. "Hwang just wants to write an essay."

"For a good cause." He wrung his hands, blisters popping. "Do you approve?"

His sister kept her cheeks inflated, then blew out a puff of air, nodding. "Ayuh. Ah know Korea's goin' to make the right decision, but..." She brightened. "If we make the right decision first, maybe he'll be proud of us!"

'Whichever thought process helps.'

"Then it's agreed. We demand that Korea divides our province."

They locked eyes, and for a second, the look in hers didn't quite match her expression.

He wondered if feeling this way felt like a betrayal to Korea for her, too.

He held out his hand to clasp her forearm, but Hae bypassed it to wrap her arms around him, burying her face in his chest. He felt her squeeze his ribs like she was about to lift him, but his boots stayed on the floor. She still hadn't regained all her strength from dy- her illness. She wouldn't unless the war was won and they had enough to eat.

Hwang's hands didn't flutter. He knew how to hug his sister by now. He rested them on her back, careful not to disturb the burns he could feel radiating heat under her uniform, and leaned into her, the throbbing in his skin easing, but not as much as the ache.

It would be strange not to feel it anymore. But entirely worth it, so long as he still had his sister to hug.

"Ah'll help ya with the Peasant Newspaper an' Political Knowledge, too." Her words were muffled by his tunic. "The next issues'll be done before the short course stuff, and Comrade Pan-jin can keep copies here."

"I wouldn't have it any other way."

Something that had never changed was that if a hug from Hae had to end, you had to back away first. But this time she did, slightly.

"Hwang, do you think..." She didn't meet his eyes as she asked the question, her voice lowered like it was a shameful one. "Korea ever thinks about not Reunifyin' with the Southern One?"

Hwang stiffened slightly. "...He has to," he said after a moment. "Our country isn't like our province. It can't remain Divided."

"Ah know." Hae was almost muttering now. "Ah don't want it to. Ah meant..."

She trailed off, eyes still fixed on the floor, hunching like she was going to be scolded by Korea. She didn't finish her thought, but she didn't need to.

"No," he said to her, just as quiet. "I don't think he ever does think about it."

That was what worried him.

Hae nodded, her hands clasped together again.

"And that's good," Hwang said louder, wanting to steer her away from the topic. "We don't know why there are two Koreas, so we don't know what would happen if one were allowed to fade away or- Ahem."

According to Korea's grudging answer, both he and his brother had been equally illiterate at formation, and had no great differences in common sense. Whatever had created two of them, Hwang suspected it was different than what had formed he and his sister.

"There ain't two Koreas," Hae said defiantly, looking him in the eyes again. "There's only one Korea an' he's ours."

"That will be true soon." He smoothly pivoted to, "Let's set out. We have a few more places to visit before Haeju, and we need to get back by the 7th for the meeting of the Political Committee."

Hae's head dipped, but when it came back up, she had a smile on her face again. "Ayuh! Ah want to take Comrade Pong-ju to see his sister, too. He's worried about how she's takin' the blackout."

Hwang assured her they could do that, and she asked, "Could we visit Kaesong, too? Ah want to see how the kids are doin'."

"I already asked Korea," Hwang admitted, making his sister puff her chest out.

"See? Hwang's worried about the kids 'Merica hurt," she said almost proudly. "Plenty warm."

The words- fully lucid now- touched him a little more than he'd like to admit, and he quickly removed his glasses to clean them.

"Yes, well," he coughed. "He said it's too close to the front. He wants us to wait until he can accompany us."

And with their current problems, it might be awhile.

Hae pouted, but only briefly. "That's okay. Korea says the war's goin' to be over soon. Then we can visit all we want without botherin' him."

Hwang's smile didn't stay on his face long. He gently steered her out of the publicity hall, switching the topic to the factories they still had to visit to assess for how they were dealing with the blackout, even farther away from the topic of merging and Reunifying.

He didn't want the same possibility that had been plaguing him since last year to haunt his sister. Not when she carried such strong negative feelings towards the South, and such great love for Korea. He would've been surprised she hadn't already asked him about it, if the thought hadn't even flickered across his mind until Kangwon brought it up at the secret vote, despite their parallels.

Unlike them, the Koreas' merge was something that had to happen. There was no argument against it that wouldn't also come from a place of emotion. Even some of the logical ones brought up by North Hamgyong at the vote could be countered by the simple fact that had helped decide how Hwang had cast both of his- they didn't know what would happen if they lost one of the Korean Countryhumans. Whichever natural laws governed them didn't care if the provinces only saw one Korea, and didn't want to lose who they saw. They couldn't care, they couldn't decide. They could only react along whatever inscrutable principles they followed that not even science could yet explain. And if those principles truly had a bearing on a country's lifespan after its Countryhuman fell, then they couldn't risk finding out how they would react to losing a Korea. And as for a simple fading away...

Hwang knew there was no chance of that happening.

The merge was best for their country. So it would happen. And perhaps nothing would change, so there wouldn't have been a use in Hae fretting over it. Or perhaps it would, and there still wasn't any reason to make her possibly bring it up to Korea, forcing his hand the way some of his cousins feared, and bringing about a change worse than the one he was trying to prevent.

But Hwang didn't think he would try.

Change might not come for them, if they could argue their point well enough. But it would come. And like the destruction of their power system, that wasn't always something to look forward to.

He didn't want Hae to feel the way he did, watching it creeping towards them.

While trying to think of a title for this chapter, I found this Bible verse (wasn't looking for them this time): Two are better than one, because they have a good return for their labor / If either of them falls down, one can help the other up / But pity anyone who falls and has no one to help them up / Also, if two lie down together, they will keep warm / But how can one keep warm alone? / Though one may be overpowered, two can defend themselves / A cord of three strands is not quickly broken.

I think the third strand is supposed to be god or something so that's unimportant, but the rest of it... my Hwanghaelings...

A notice that the name of Sui-ho Dam is changing to Supung Dam because it used to be called the Sui-ho (Sui Lake) Dam before becoming Supung. I knew this, but couldn't find the exact time it changed. But I know at this point it's Supung Power Station and Supung Lake, so the more I think about it, why would just the dam still be called Sui? I've edited the past occurrences, this is just a notification for future chapters- Sui-ho = Supung.

Also to clarify, village elders would have also been landlords, but the old man in the flashback is a bit of an exception. Like he tells Korea and Hwang in an earlier flashback, his extended family works his land. So he has renters, they're just family branches (and then some of those branches have renters). So the idea of land redistribution doesn't quite threaten his class interests in the same way it would another landlord (plus the bigger landlords monopolizing land thing). He's also an okay guy. Just to be clear that not every village elder has been happy with the provinces strolling in and telling them they're going to abolish landlords one day.

All of the provinces can speak all Korean dialects if they choose, it's just that their dialect is most natural to them (though Seoul dialect is more natural for Hwang in the early Occupation years because he forced it, and South Chungcheong speaks... South Chungcheong). All of the dialects are equally natural to North. But he usually just speaks Seoul dialect until 1964 where he switches to Pyongyang dialect (Munhwao), prepping for it becoming standardized in two years. If he was like China and America where they mirror their speech to whoever they're with, one could imagine North speaking with Hae or the Jeollas' patterns. Unfortunately he's not a chameleon so we are deprived of 'Ah reckon ah ain't never seen somethin' like this before' North.

I Looked, But I Didn't See

The heavens above the Supung Dam were dark, moonlight reflecting off the black waters of the reservoir on one side, and harsh white spotlights powered by portable generators illuminating the other, lighting up the bottom portion of the massive concrete barrier.

North Pyongan sat on the crest, a safe distance from the edge, his legs folded under him, and his bodyguards a respectful length away along the walkway. Pain washed through his body in waves, courtesy of the customary increased air strikes July 4th had brought. He tried to rock with them rather than let them sweep him away.

Down below, he could see their handful of engineers working with the Soviets and Chinese, examining schematics as military and civilian porters carried in supplies on their backs or in carts. The distant sound of shouting and whistles made its way up to him, with no mighty crashing of water to drown it out. The gates below him had been shut, along with the sluice gate, leaving the downstream Amnok dry so they could work on repairs.

It hurt North Pyongan's heart to see his river reduced to patches of water in a muddy channel, but it was better than what could have happened.

He had been in his province when the attack came, accompanying the Premier as he visited to speak with the staff and students of the Central Higher Cadres Training School. He had seen the planes flying in upstream, and felt his heart sink into his stomach as new burns spread over his cobalt skin.

He hadn't been able to stay, needing to keep the Premier safe on his journey back to Pyongyang, and Korea had forbidden him from returning until he got back from Wonsan. He had spent the entire night feeling useless and afraid, wishing he could be in his province, only able to tell South Pyongan what had happened (and only because Korea knew it was easier to let him).

It annoyed some of his cousins (and especially his sister) when their Countryhuman held his tongue on information until he was ready, as with the Incheon landing. But if North Pyongan didn't already understand that he just wanted to spare them from the nervous dread that filled him all night, he did now.

The power had already been going out in places, but he was sheltering in the City Hall shelter with civilians during a minor bombing raid when the last of it had gone for good. Halos had flared around the dim bulbs above before they went dark all at once. Those with him were all used to it by now, assuming that a power line had been cut or a local transformer substation had been hit.

But North Pyongan had known the truth. And even though he knew it would do no good, he couldn't help but pray that it was 'just' the hydroelectric station that had been destroyed.

It was. Thank God. There wasn't anything else to thank, except maybe the poor aim of a pilot, or luck. Their anti-aircraft guns had been overwhelmed by the hundreds of planes.

North Pyongan knew he couldn't depend on God anymore, but he chose to believe it was Him that had spared their dam. Because the alternative, that the only reason their farmland and villages hadn't been wiped away by a great flood was because of luck, made his stomach churn like the waters that should have been turning the turbines below.

Because luck ran out.

"There you be. You were starting to worry me."

North Pyongan looked up, seeing Liaoxi padding along the edge of the dam. His guards knew her, so they hadn't seen fit to alert him, but he still would have scolded himself for not realizing he wasn't alone on this stretch anymore, if he didn't know it was simply because his comrade moved so silently. And with the amount of Chinese specialists around, she was moving even more silently than usual, trying not to be recognized.

"Do they need me?" he asked, half-rising, the skin on the back of his legs tearing.

He didn't have any practical engineering skills, more theoretical. He knew how dams and hydroelectric systems functioned and how to fix them. He just couldn't do it himself, something that was supposed to be fixed in the classes Korea had drawn up for them. He was here for planning, consultation, and translation. And to make up for North Hamgyong's lack of morale.

Liaoxi shook her head, perching next to him on the edge, sliding her legs over it. "I said it was me that felt worry, but 'twas more your kin. I came to save my sister's skin."

Internally, he apologized to Liaotung, though he knew she did work North Hamgyong up on purpose sometimes. He should have told his cousin he was heading up here, but he was preoccupied with the same decision that had been bothering him for over a week.

"North Hamgyong can get difficult to deal with when he's worried," he said apologetically, settling back down with a wince.

Something shared by another member of their family.

Liaoxi raised her brows knowingly. "And only then, I ken."

She turned on the heavy-duty flashlight strapped to her waist, flashing it twice to signal 'all's well' before returning it to her side.

North Pyongan squinted down, trying to spot North Hamgyong operating on the turbines. But it was too far. Everyone was just little shapes.

He had always wondered how God saw them. He knew Heaven was almost definitely a spiritual realm, not actually hovering far above the earth. The clouds and ascending were metaphorical.

But the Lord was omnipotent, He knew everything that went on in their hearts and in His world. Their world. It made sense that He had some way to look upon them. Would He walk among them unseen, or was it easier to look down from above, where they were all just forms and virtues?

'Or sins.' The question that had driven him up here bore down on his shoulders.

"I must know," Liaoxi began, her keen eyes picking up on the way he slumped. "What troubles you so? Even since before this tragedy, it feels like you were plagued by a malady."

"Right now I'm troubled by how close you are to falling off this dam." North Pyongan eyed her legs anxiously, dangling over the void.

The Supung was over a hundred metres tall. Even if she fell far enough to land in the mud instead of smashing off the wall or machinery down below, the recuperative coma to heal every bone in her body would take months. And that was if it didn't count as a suicide.

His fingers twitched to cross himself, but he denied them. If she fell, he would grab her.

"It's a habit, I must confess. But I wouldn't want to add to your stress." Liaoxi drew her legs in, then looked to her side. "But someone else will, it seems."

North Pyongan leaned back to see past her, seeing someone tall and broad stomping along the dam, coming from the abutment. He briefly stopped to talk with the men working on the cable tower on the top.

"North Hamgyong," he noted.

"I guess he wasn't reassured by my beams."

"I think…" North Pyongan awkwardly scratched his cheek. "He might just want to stop us from being alone."

Most of the workers and engineers were sleeping in temporary barracks while they worked on the hydroelectric station, including him and his cousin. But the Hamgyong had been very insistent that Liaoxi and Liaotung get their own dug-out. Ostensibly because they were women, so it was the chivalrous thing to do, which North Pyongan completely agreed with. He had been going to bring it up before he had.

But his cousin had also mysteriously been taking his break every time North Pyongan and Liaoxi did, when usually he would refuse and keep working. Never to talk, just to grunt and glare at Liaoxi.

'I'm not sure what he expects us to do.'

They had… shared more kisses since the night he had read his poem for her, but it wasn't like they were going to do that when there were people around, and they were both constantly exhausted.

The Chinese woman gaped in mock dismay at his words, covering her masked mouth with her hand. "Are you telling me he doesn't approve of us? I never would have thought thus!"

North Pyongan bit his lip, half-amused and half-guilty. "I'm sorry he's still being rude to you and Comrade Liaotung."

You would think after nearly two years fighting by their side, North Hamgyong would trust them, or at least be slightly more courteous.

'Then again,' he thought. 'We'll have fought together for thirty-three years soon, and he still calls me 'God-lover.''

Liaoxi waved her hand. "Quite used to it by now are we."

"You shouldn't have to be." Just like China probably shouldn't be so used to how Korea treated him. North Pyongan had heard his Countryhuman tell him to end his own life himself now. Three weeks ago. Twice.

"I… don't like to think you're both tolerating him treating you poorly just because you feel like you have to perform," he ventured.

He had been being careful not to bring up what she had told him about her and her Countryhuman on their way to Guk Island. She had confessed it in a moment of confidence, and he didn't want to make her regret it.

But he also didn't like to think her and her sister were genuinely hurt by some of the things North Hamgyong said, but felt like they had to hide it for their alliance.

Liaoxi looked away from him, out at the darkness beyond the work area.

"We truly don't mind," she said after a moment. "Not everyone can be kind. And when you're used to understanding your own emotions…"

She trailed off, closing her eyes and tilting her head back.

"I can't finish it," North Pyongan apologized. "I don't know what you're going to say."

Her mask moved as her lips pursed.

"…Those of others become clear as oceans," she finished triumphantly after a few seconds.

"Oceans aren't very clear."

"Too honest again."

North Pyongan chuckled. "Alright. As long as neither of you are truly bothered."

"Liaotung may be a bit irked," Liaoxi confessed. "But it looks like if he says anything else to her, by Korea his neck might get…"

"Jerked?" North Pyongan finished, fishing the Mandarin word out of his mind.

She sighed. "I really didn't want to say that one."

He laughed again, but worry plucked at him.

This wasn't the first time her rhymes had been a bit clunky. Since they got here a week ago, they had both been working from as soon as the sun set to long into the day, only stopping when enemy planes came too close, but he didn't think that was what was affecting her. Her cí had never wavered on the battlefield after all, even after days without sleep.

He thought it might be the bombs. The American jets had been crossing the border more often lately, and while the incidents of germ warfare had coincidentally waned slightly in China now that the International Scientific Commission has arrived there, the regular raids had only gotten worse, targeting the airfields.

He almost never saw Liaoxi in anything other than her uniform, and she couldn't even take off her jacket with all these people around. But even before the attack on the dam, he had noticed she didn't roll up the sleeves of her undershirt while she wrote poetry at dinner anymore, even when she was mopping sweat from her citrine brow with a cloth in the stifling summer heat.

She had told him she was alright, but not that she wasn't burned. Even when he asked directly.

"I'm sorry you got caught up in all this," he murmured before he could stop himself.

"Let that sorry be done," Liaoxi said without pause. "Because none of us are. If we were, we wouldn't have came so far."

Two years, for both of them soon. The darkness from both sides of the Amnok weighed heavy on his soul.

"Like you said," she added. "If our nations must be in the fire, then to burn together is my desire."

Her eyes gleamed, and North Pyongan flushed, ducking his head. It made the back of his neck make a sound like pork crackling.

"By the way," he murmured, making sure his voice wouldn't carry to North Hamgyong as he stomped closer. "I didn't get a chance to say you looked nice yesterday."

China wasn't acknowledging the destruction of the Supung Power Station himself, to try and keep America and the war at a distance, but with over twenty percent of their provinces' power gone, Liaoxi and Liaotung had to for image's sake. Yesterday, they had snuck over the dry riverbed before dawn, then 'arrived' on the far side of the dam to survey it. They hadn't set foot on the titanic structure, staying on Chinese soil. But North Pyongan and North Hamgyong had walked over to 'meet' them.

It had felt strange to exchange formal bows and politely thank the women for their continued help in the war and with fixing the hydroelectric plant when he had shared countless meals with them both. And was trying not to look like he was drinking in the sight of one of them out of uniform for the first time.

Liaotung had been in a workshirt the colour of the sky with a long crimson scarf wrapped around her head, twined into two braids that trailed over her shoulders in imitation of the hairstyle many of the female Chinese soldiers wore, but it was Liaoxi he had to keep his eyes from straying to, dressed in a knee-length collared outfit that looked like a dress, but actually had two wide legs. It had been dyed a vivid orange, and combined with her pastel yellow skin and the red scarf around her neck that he thought might conceal the burns her uniform usually did, it made her look like a sunset in full flush.

She had told him she was used to more subdued clothes, like the ones their peasants wore, or in a military cut. But they had needed to look as removed from war as possible, without wearing the sort of suits that implied a professional visit America could somehow use against them.

Since that was the case, North Pyongan supposed he could thank her and her Countryhuman's performing talents that he had got to see her in it.

"Oh?" Liaoxi asked innocently. "I think chances you've had many."

His face warmed under the burns. "I didn't take any," he corrected himself. "But I am now. You looked… very good."

For a poet, he should be able to think of better words. Especially now that the poem he had written for Liaoxi had knocked his poetic block free. But even something like ‘beautiful’ wouldn’t be enough to capture her. And North Hamgyong was too close to compare her to the golden light that graced the waters lapping at the other side of the dam at sunset.

Liaoxi tilted her face away. “Thank you,” she said, sounding pleased. “And for you, the words would also be true.”

“I was in the same clothes I always am.” North Pyongan plucked at his drab general’s tunic, sweat-stained and covered in mud and grime from working around the river.

Liaoxi’s eyes squinched up as she nodded. “And you looked quite handsome.”

North Hamgyong was almost here, and the moon was nearly a full disc in the sky, illuminating them clearly. He subtly rubbed his cheeks, trying to get rid of the blush he felt on them, before realizing it probably couldn't be seen past the bandages. Blood trickled out, brought forth by even the light touch.

“But your acting was slightly like you were being held for ransom.”

He hung his head. “I know.”

He hadn’t quite been able to pretend he didn’t know her or Liaotung when they had been fighting at each other’s side for so long. Or when she had kissed him on the cheek before she left that morning. Even when he had been careful to use high courtesy, it still sounded too familiar.

“No need to feel low,” she said. “No cameras were there. And even when you’re criticizing my rhymes, I find your honesty fair.” Her eyes slid sideways. “And at least you were trying to make a show.”

“Just because you’re poets doesn’t mean you get away with being fucking lazy, you know,” North Hamgyong called as he stopped over.

Liaoxi's eyes lit up as he finished her rhyme by accident, cracking her neck towards North Pyongan, who couldn't hide his smile. They burst into giggles.

"What the fuck are you laughing at?" his cousin demanded, stopping behind them.

"Not you," North Pyongan assured him semi-truthfully, stifling his amusement.

"What is there to laugh about at all?" North Hamgyong crossed his arms. "We're no closer to getting the fucking lights back on."

"We are," North Pyongan corrected, shifting to face him. "You and Comrade Vasilev said that if we keep going at this pace, we should have power working again in another week or so."

"When we all add wood, the flames burn good," Liaoxi said pointedly.

"One more rhyme and I'm pushing you off," North Hamgyong growled.

"If you did that, Liaotung would not lightly scoff," Liaoxi said with perfect innocence.

"Cousin," North Pyongan scolded as North Hamgyong's lip curled, reaching instinctively for the woman's hand.

The other man watched the gesture with narrowed eyes before glowering at his face. "We'll have some power working in another week. If we don't get bombed again in the middle of repairs."

"That still means we're closer to having the lights back on."

His cousin opened his mouth, glanced at Liaoxi, then *'tch'*ed. "Whatever. Get your ass down to the powerhouse. Once the Soviets are off break, they're testing the generator with our guys. I don't want our translator to fuck it up."

North Pyongan could see that one of the Soviet crews had just put down their tools to rest. He clearly just didn't want him having a private moment with Liaoxi.

But he needed to get back to work anyhow. He had came up here to examine how much Supung Lake had expanded now that it wasn't being drained, and to take another paranoid look at the gates and examine the crest for cracks while he took his break, but the dam was as sturdy as it was the last time he checked, and time was up.

And he wasn't any closer to finding an answer for what he should do.

He stood, black spots swarming his vision like a school of minnows. He swayed slightly, and North Hamgyong shot out an arm, gripping him on the shoulder and jerking him away from the edge.

"Thank you," North Pyongan said as his cousin quickly released him, scowling.

The Pyongan shook the darkness away, dusting himself off and helping Liaoxi up.

"Well, you successfully distracted me from finding out what with you is wrong," Liaoxi said, adjusting her gold-patterned scarf. "You smooth-talker, I give you aplomb."

He winced. "I didn't mean to."

North Hamgyong glowered at him. "Are you seriously stressing over that fucking trial?"

"Trial?" Liaoxi perked up.

North Pyongan sighed. Korea hadn't said not to tell her. And it did involve her, in a way.

"Pak Chae-eun's trial is coming up."

Korea had told them the morning before the Supung bombing began.

The Chinese woman raised her brows. “I thought you were waiting for the war to end.”

North Hamgyong made a bitter noise in his throat, and North Pyongan placed a hand on his shoulder that was immediately shrugged off.

“We’re economizing,” he explained, the word weighting his heart with like a stone. “We can’t afford to keep feeding prisoners who might get the death sentence. If they won’t, we can factor them into the prison supply plan, but if they do…”

“Then they need to be offed before they can waste any more of our food,” North Hamgyong grunted. “Not that it’ll help.”

North Pyongan hung his head. “And Pak Chae-eun is old.”

He couldn’t even work like a younger, healthier prisoner. Honestly, if you considered that, and how soon after committing their crimes most reactionaries had been tried, whether the verdict was innocent, a pardon by the voluntary surrender, prison, or guilty enough for the death penalty, he felt like Korea may have had a hand in delaying Pak Chae-eun’s judgement. He had thought he wanted him to just waste away in prison, but…

“I’m sorry,” Liaoxi said. “I know you saw him as a friend.”

“He tried to get him fucking kidnapped,” North Hamgyong growled. “He almost succeeded.”

“But he did used to be a friend.” North Pyongan sighed. “Korea wants to know if I’ll testify against him.”

“Ah,” Liaoxi said softly. He could see she knew what it meant.

Pak Chae-eun had committed espionage, working for the enemy in wartime. And turning a Provincehuman over to them was an act of highest treason. He hadn’t surrendered himself or even cooperated with Korea when he tried to find out where North Pyongan had been taken. There was almost no chance he wouldn’t be found guilty and executed.

But there was a chance. His niece was the only witness. And while she had been cooperative, if she had a change of heart and decided she didn't want to see her only living family killed, they would have nothing. Or like he had told his sister, if a people's jury didn't think they had enough information to convict, or took pity on an elderly man who probably only had a few years left in him anyways, they could ask for leniency. He could be kept imprisoned, or even found innocent.

But if North Pyongan testified, it would take that chance away. Korea was right. There were people they were guiding who saw they were leading and thought that meant they were following. And that they should follow unquestioningly. He knew if he got up in front of a people's court and told them how Pak Chae-eun had betrayed him, they would find him guilty.

He would be signing his writ of execution himself.

"What will you do?" Liaoxi asked. "Will you?"

'Do you think I should?' North Pyongan bit the question, the same one he had wanted to ask his sister, back.

It wasn't either of their decisions. And it wasn't God's either. He hadn't came up here to be closer to the heavens, but to be alone to search inside himself.

Korea had told him he had to testify, back when they had returned to Seoul. But he hadn't repeated it when he told the provinces about the upcoming trial. He hadn't even looked at North Pyongan, like the news had equal weight for all of them.

He didn't know if this as a test. Did his Countryhuman see testifying against Pak Chae-eun as him prying the final nail out of his faith in God? Or did this, too, have nothing to do with the man? Perhaps he wanted to see North Pyongan acknowledge that harming him was harming their people, and to place them above his personal feelings by guiding them towards sentencing the former priest to justice. Or perhaps he wanted him to fight back. He knew North Pyongan hadn't been enthusiastic about the idea of executing him, but he had given in anyways, the way he used to give in to everything. Did he want him to push back and refuse, even if the outcome would still be the same?

He didn't know. The only thing he knew for sure was that Korea wanted Pak Chae-eun dead.

"You fucking better," North Hamgyong cut in. "The bastard fucked you over."

"It isn't that simple." Nowhere near it.

"Would you be saying that if it was your precious fucking sister that he tried to hand to the Yank?" his cousin growled.

Korea had said something similar. 'Would you call it a 'mistake' if it was your sister he did this to? Or South Hwanghae? Or me?'

It hadn't been a mistake. Pak Chae-eun had done it intentionally. He was a traitor, a collaborator, a criminal. And he deserved to see justice for it.

But he had helped him, once. He had kept him and his sister alive. If it hadn't been for the priest, they would have died in that blizzard and been handed over to Japan long before they ever met Korea. Betraying him last year didn't make that not true.

The man hadn't thought America would hurt him. He believed the lie that the nation was Christian, that he followed the same God as them, like North Pyongan had felt better leaving his sister with South knowing he believed. And that he was Korea's brother.

Pak Chae-eun had been blind. He had looked at all of the destruction America had wrought on their nation, the burnt husk of Seoul, the bodies they had pulled out of the mountains, his own brother and his family murdered by American bombs, and refused to see the evil that it was, and that God wouldn't want it. Whether it was money or unquestioning faith that had set the scales on his eyes, they were there. He had thought he was doing the right thing, like he had all those years ago. It felt wrong for North Pyongan to want to punish him for that, like he was seeking vengeance.

Yet he knew if it had been his sister, or Hae, or Korea, or North

Hamgyong himself, he wouldn't be hesitating. Even though he still wouldn't want the man dead, he would want his family to get justice. He wanted the guerrillas that had died saving him to get justice, though he knew a court couldn't try for cause and effect that way.

If they could, they would have to try him, too.

He looked down at his boots, clasping his hands, and North Hamgyong *'tch'*ed.

"Exactly," he said. "So have some damn outrage for yourself. Get the bastard put up on the wall. Better yet, pull the trigger yourself."

"I would execute him," Liaoxi agreed, running a hand along her rifle. "But you don't need to follow another's whim. I know your heart will clear your vision, and you'll come to your own decision."

"What the fuck does that even mean?" North Hamgyong griped.

North Pyongan understood, though, and smiled at her thankfully as she turned around.

"It means I will leave you to talk, and alone down the dam, I will now walk." Liaoxi delicately stepped away, swaggering enough that North Pyongan was sure she was pleased by her own rhyme.

"I hate the Chinese," North Hamgyong grumbled as she left.

"No you don't," North Pyongan sighed, then fear shot through him as he heard the drone of a jet engine.

Their heads both jerked towards the sky as their bodyguards took half-steps towards them.

It was only one of their own reconnaissance planes coming back, heading for Manchuria.

"Ssi-bal." North Hamgyong bared his teeth at the sky. "What's the fucking point of those things if they couldn't keep the dam safe the one fucking time it gets targeted?!"

"It wasn't their fault," North Pyongan said, rubbing his chest, his heart still racing. "The weather wasn't clear in China. Most of them couldn't take off. And the ones that already did had to prioritize the airfields."

North Hamgyong *'tch'*ed. "Of course they prioritize their shit."

"Our pilots are with them, you know," he pointed out. "And if the airfields are damaged, no planes will be able to take off. We'll be completely vulnerable."

"We're already completely vulnerable," North Hamgyong hissed, thrusting a bandaged hand down at the bottom of the dam. "Look what they fucking did! How can you be so damn cheerful when our entire power system is fucked?!"

"Lower your voice," North Pyongan advised, keenly aware of his guards behind him, and how their voices carried along the crest.

"Why?" North Hamgyong demanded, lowering it anyway. "Everyone here knows damn well we're setting a tower of blocks up so the Yanks can knock it down again. You think once we get this place running, they'll just let it end there? How can you be up here fucking flirting with a Chinese with no fucks in the world when you know damn well we're never going to get our power back?"

North Pyongan knew that he was right. Now that the Supung was an acceptable target, their repairs wouldn't go unpunished, so long as enemy planes still flew their skies. While they did, their power production would never be allowed to return to what it had been.

"We'll be able to work on it in peace and restore it fully after the war is over."

North Hamgyong stared at him from under his heavy black brows, saying something to him with his desperate eyes.

North Pyongan refused to understand it, ignoring the unease that rippled through him, and turned to look down at the workers at the bottom of the dam.

"Everyone is working hard to fix this," he told his cousin. "All of our comrades, and us. Our people are depending on us to get their power back. They believe in us, and that we can. We need to believe that, too."

"Belief isn't going to save us," North Hamgyong snapped. "Your 'god' can't fix this."

"No," North Pyongan agreed. "But we can."

He tilted his head back to look at the stars scattered across the black velvet sky like moonlight glinting off waves, a dark mirror to Supung Lake, but far most vast. Endless, perhaps.

Korea had told him before that if God was real, he was either unable to control anything, and thus useless, or capable of it, but chose not to. And that would make him cruel.

North Pyongan couldn't believe the second one. He believed Heaven was a different realm, one God could watch on from, but not truly reach across. Any time He did, it came in the form of manifestations to guide instruments of His will, what they called miracles.

He had used to think that maybe God could change things directly, but had blessed them with free will, and so didn't. He left it up to them. He had thought that was good. Especially when North Pyongan knew if He did take an active role in the world, trying to control them and their fates, Korea would probably find the idea unacceptable and rebel against Him.

It had become more and more difficult to stomach that lately. The idea that perhaps God could change the world, yet chose not to. Free will was one thing, the freedom to choose good or evil. But what free will was given to a girl forced to bed a man with a gun who had already killed her friend's family, or to a Chinese elementary school teacher that contracted anthrax from American-dropped insects, or a child doused in napalm? None of them had chosen that. Someone else had chosen it for them.

North Pyongan would stop it all in a heartbeat if he could. He would turn their power on, he would have stopped it from being destroyed in the first place, stopped the war and Reunified Korea. If he had been able to save Oh Tae-min and Hyun Han-jin's families, he would have, so they could live on to make their own choices. The idea that God could, that he watched all the suffering in all the world and could stop it, but just didn't…

He couldn't stomach that. He couldn't believe that. If there was a God, He loved them as much as North Pyongan and Korea loved their people. If he didn't save them, it was for the same reason they didn't- because He couldn't.

Maybe one day they would be able to head up onto that endless black and find that it did end. That somewhere above the clouds was Heaven. That God was above them, looking down, watching every cruel, vicious thing that was done to innocents, and the only reason He didn't stop it was because they were all so small as to be faceless to Him, and He only cared to save them once they were dead. Maybe He was the eye-for-an-eye, vengeful deity some said He was, and there would have to be an accounting.

But for now, North Pyongan had to believe God loved them. And he had to believe that they could fix their power system and win this war.

"We're here on Earth," he said to North Hamgyong, turning back to him now that he could bear the weight of the message in his eyes. "We are the ones that have to fix this."

Unlike God, he and Korea and all his cousins could save their people. Not all of them, not entirely. They couldn't knock every jet out of the sky or stop the Supung from being bombed again. But they could set up more anti-aircraft positions, they could repair the turbines and transformers, they could carry supplies on their backs and make torches and turn the fans in factories by hand.

They could end the war. And before that, they could take care of the ones who believed in them as best as they could.

They didn't guide though miracles- they guided through action. They and their people could affect the world around them and they would.

“And we need to believe for them.” North Pyongan touched the burnt tips of his forefinger and thumb together, circling their engineers down below.

They were who he had to make his decision on Pak Chae-eun for, too. Not for Korea, or South Pyongan, or Liaoxi or North Hamgyong. Not even for their government, to make the former priest an example on what happened to those who caused harm to the masses, even with intentions they thought were right. And not for himself.

He still didn't know what he should do yet. What the fate of the man that had shaped his life should be. But he knew it would be what his people wanted, and what he thought was best for them.

“Belief is what got us this far, cousin,” he said, smiling at North Hamgyong. “It will get us through this. This, too, shall pass.”

They would make it so.

It was North Hamgyong’s turn to look away from his silent message. His head lowered like a hound’s, his lips peeling back from his teeth. It made fresh blood well along his cheeks, crimson on pine.

“You don’t have to be so damn happy about it,” he muttered, kicking at the concrete dam.

“I’m not happy.”

The sorrow North Pyongan held for the workers having to break their backs like the old days to keep their factories running, for the men and women that might die tomorrow that wouldn’t receive the messages meant for them on time, and the engineers, theirs and their comrades’, that were working themselves to the bone with the weight of Korea on their backs, was fathomless.

And for Korea, and the emotion he had seen in his eye on the day they arrived.

“I’m grieving just as much as you over this,” he said, ignoring his cousin’s protest. “I just can’t let it dampen the joy I feel in the meantime.”

Even when his sister had been gone, there had still been small moments of happiness. Seeing Korea and his cousins again, finding out the Premier was safe, getting to know Liaoxi, meeting up with comrades that had survived the occupation, Liberating Pyongyang. Even when that pearl of worry had been rolling in his mind, and the weight of her absence crushing down on him like he was at the bottom of the sea, it only stifled those moments, didn’t drown them out entirely.

He felt for his cousin, for whom it did. He let the grief of losing someone outweigh the joy of knowing them, and so didn’t let himself feel it at all. And he let the greater sorrow around them douse even the possibility of fishing snatches of happiness from this war.

“You might try seeing things the same way,” he said gently. “The Occupation took enough from us, and this war is taking even more. Don’t let it take your bright moments, too.”

North Hamgyong avoided his gaze, shoving his hands in his pockets as he turned his back on him. “Enough bullshit. We have a fucking block tower to fix.”

“We all do care for you, North Hamgyong,” North Pyongan told him, something he should have done sooner.

It was true he had treated his sister worse for far longer, but SH also knew his insults were false. He wasn’t sure his male cousin did.

“I don’t want to see you lose anything else.”

North Hamgyong didn’t answer, continuing to stomp away, his back bent.

North Pyongan sighed. He knew by now that was one sail he couldn’t mend. It was up to the boaters.

He took one look back down at the riverbed below. He held out his hand, covering up the people scurrying over it with construction tools and schematics, putting a scorched cobalt shield between them and the sky.

He had to believe. In a kind God, in their dam's strength, in their people, and in Korea. And in himself. He had to believe they could win this war.

His hand returned to his side, and he hurried after his cousin, returning to making sure their people believed just as deeply.

The silver moon hung far, far above the Supung like a wide, unseeing eye, not watching him go.

To clarify, it's not a mistake that Canada says 'You're not actually going to bomb China, right?' to America when he already is at this point. The bombing raids on the Chinese airfields weren't widely publicized because the US didn't want to get accused of trying to start a war with China (even more than they already were). They were officially only crossing the Amnok if they were in hot-pursuit. (all these things they swore they weren't doing, and some people think the germ warfare is the one thing they were telling the truth on) Even if it was publicized, Canada doesn't read the news. It makes him anxious. (diagnosed with liberal. It's chronic)

Something that irks me is when the same liberal types that praise MacArthur and his land reform here demonize the DPRK's land reform. The US quite literally did the same thing they had called the DPRK evil for, just in Japan, and they get lauded for it, 'the land reform was so enlightened and democratic.' And don't get me wrong, the land reform here was good and definitely needed, but it should have been carried out by Japanese, not by colonizers. Why can a foreign nation murder millions, come in to forcibly redistribute land and break up conglomerates (while leaving the conditions for those monopolies to happen again), then be praised for 'bringing democracy to Japan' but when a formerly colonized nation does the exact same thing in their own nation without the mass murder, and removing the conditions for that sort of monopoly to reform, that is a great evil? Even US historians admit the DPRK's land reform wasn't bloody, so it can't be levels of violence. 'Forcibly seizing land belonging to honest hard-working landlords' vs 'redistributing land to tenant farmers' is how its portrayed, but they're the exact same act, the DPRK did it first, and you called them evil Communists for it.

In other news my sweet cat was making a noise I have never heard before, so I went over to check, and he found a bug! I killed it and he stopped right away. My loyal child, protecting our home. Meanwhile during the earthquake, he disappears. You might think this is cowardly of him, but actually this just means he's tactical. Bug = Mother can handle this. Earthquake = Mother is going to die, I must save myself. I admire his practicality. He will be a great warrior after I am killed by the next earthquake.

Chosen

"So you're really leaving?"

The look America gave the question made South feel the way it always did, his disappointment scorching his skin worse than the lingering burns. Though he managed not to cringe this time. Too noticeably anyway.

"I told you I was leaving days ago, kid," he reminded him. "Made sure you were sober as a preacherman and everything. The whole reason I did that was 'cuz I didn't want you to say I was springing it on you from nowhere."

"I know, but…"

It still didn't feel real. South had half convinced himself that the talk at the table with Rhee and… Clark? Hadn't even happened. Even after standing here watching America pack his clothes, his papers, his pistol, into a series of cases and carry them out to the shiny black car waiting to take him to the airfield, it still didn't feel real.

Had it really been two years ago that he'd stood on the docks, his heart soaring as America leapt from the deck of his warship onto Korean soil and promised him the war would be over soon?

It simultaneously seemed like just yesterday, everything in between a jumbled mess of pain and grief and alcohol, and long ago. Far too long ago.

He rubbed his arm, looking down at his dress shoes.

"C'mon, kid," America sighed. "Don't gimme that face. I can't spend my whole life managing your country. I've got my own to take care of. Elections are coming up. Plus Truman screwed the pooch with the steel guys back home, and you know him- he couldn't find his way outta a damn corn maze. He needs me to go play hero for him."

"I know," South muttered.

It was selfish of him to want the American to stay. He'd already drawn a lot of negative attention from Soviet propagandists for being here for so long, or at all. It was already crazy that he'd spent two years in a foreign country, just for him.

"I just…" He hung his head, unable to help murmuring, "Want you to stay."

"Who wouldn't?" America preened, before saying more soberly. "But can I be honest, kid? I can't stay here anymore. This place…" He looked around the house, then gave a wry smile. "It's got some bad memories now."

Right. Grace.

South knew it was wrong, but he couldn't help but feel a bit of resentment towards the dead girl. Not only had she offed herself on America's birthday, but in his country. Now whenever his friend thought about Korea, about him, he'd have that shadow hanging over him.

'Couldn't she at least have waited to go home?'

He didn't say that, obviously. Just said, "Sorry."

"Not your fault, kid," America told him. "But it still happened. And it's a little hard to sleep in a room knowing if I turned on a blacklight, I'd see my girl all over the wall. And the bed, if ya catch my drift."

South did not. He didn't even know what a blacklight was. But it sounded like a joke, so he gave a smile that was still appropriately apologetic and nodded, reminding himself people dealt with grief in different ways. He drank until he couldn't feel anything anymore, and America made jokes.

"And it's not like I'm going to Antarctica," his friend said, easily moving on from Grace. "Just Washington. I've got a phone and a private jet. If you get in over your head or just need a friend, I'm a few spins on the dial away."

South needed a friend now. He needed him now.

But he kept his mouth shut. It'd just make him look like a whiny kid if he broke down in tears and started begging him to stay. And he wasn't. He was the Korean Countryhuman, a key American ally. Clearly his friend thought he was capable of handling things alone now.

America had to leave. South needed to prove that he could still trust him once he did. He didn't want to end up on house arrest like the provinces.

He still couldn't stop the stinging in his eyes.

"Are you…?" He subtly swallowed, trying to make his voice sound less thick, and less pathetically hopeful. "Going to come back on my birthday?"

It was next week. He'd been going to ask if America wanted him to sing for him, like he'd had him sing 'Amazing Grace' at their little memorial for the girl.

But the way his mouth stretched out told him that wouldn't be happening.

"Eee, no can do, kid," his friend said regretfully. "You can blame Rhee for that one. Folks are raising a bit of a fuss over that shtick with the assemblymen."

The elections were coming up in August. The man wanted to change the constitution so the president would be voted for directly. The assemblymen hadn't. So he'd locked the ones he hadn't arrested in the Assembly until they had.

And now he was ruining South's birthday. God he hated him.

"You and I know that was necessary," America assured him. "But you know how Big Red is. Him and his agitators in the north are crying foul. I've got to put a little distance between me and your Prez until the water's cooled off. To rephrase- if you get in over your head or just need a friend, I'm a few spins on the dial away. And ten to fifteen business days after your elections are over."

"Rhee's going to rig them," South muttered, toeing at the carpet and eyeing America.

His friend's mouth screwed up. "Yeah, I'd say. With me gone, he'll be free and clear to. But it's probably for the best. If he didn't rig 'em, your brother and his guys would find some way to. You don't want some commie double-agent in charge, do ya?"

South dutifully shook his head.

"Exactly." America nodded in satisfaction. "The devil you know, y'know?"

His face turned more serious, and he took South by the shoulder.

"You do know that it's best he wins for now, right, South?"

"Yeah," he said, mustering the word. "I know. He's an asshole, but he's better than a commie. I'll work with him."

Even though he still couldn't stand him.

Whatever. It wasn't like South had to do anything anyways. He'd just keep his distance and let Rhee handle things. The less he knew how he handled them, the better.

'Over eight hundred people died.'

And how many had died under North's Communists? The Hangang was nothing compared to his brother's... government's death toll.

South wasn't defending Rhee. Blowing up the bridge had been messed up. Those refugees hadn't all been commies- they'd been fleeing from them. Even though North definitely had spies mixed in, some of them had to be innocent.

'Most of them.'

‘The devil you know’ really was a good way to put it. He at least knew most of Rhee’s violence was focused on the Reds. They were the ones he really wanted dead. And South did, too. And if anyone else ended up in that count…

It was necessary. And he’d never have to know anyway. And one day it would be over.

“Right.” America snapped his fingers in front of his face. “And as soon as the war’s over, I guarantee you’ll be free and clear of him by the next election.”

That would be a relief. Even if South would be paranoid that the next guy might secretly be a Communist. The one, one good thing about Syngman Rhee was that he was sure he wasn’t.

But he really did wish he knew less devils.

“Maybe the next guy’ll actually have eyebrows,” he joked, and was rewarded by a laugh and a ruffle on the head.

He’d used to find the action a little patronizing, and honestly he still did. But knowing he wasn’t going to feel it for awhile made his heart clench.

America smiled down at him fondly, hand still on his head. “I’m gonna miss you, kid.”

South swallowed. “Even if you can’t visit right away, I can still call you, right?”

“A’course, a’course. I’ll give you a birthday ring. Just don’t get your knickers all twisted when it’s not first thing in the morning. It doesn’t mean I forgot about you, just means you’re thirteen hours ahead of me.”

South flushed, knowing he probably would’ve thought exactly that, especially if he was drunk or hungover. And he would be.

His friend’s voice lowered seriously. “I’m not leaving for good, Southie. My advisors are still going to be here, and so’s my army. My guys are still going to be working out your ceasefire and fighting for you in the UN. I'm still in your ring, and I always will be, no matter what. Got that?"

The hand on his head weighed him down. He did.

"I'm not abandoning you," America said firmly, bottomless aviators boring into him. "I'm not your brother."

South looked down, heart splitting in two for more than one reason.

'Not that it wasn't that way already.'

"I know," he said quietly. "You won't leave Korea. Or me."

"Never," America promised, showing his teeth. "I'm going back to be a hero for my folks. But I'm always going to be your hero, right, Southie?"

South's eyes fell to the case at his side. Chunkier than a normal one. He'd seen the grey box he'd packed inside, watched him nestle the reels in with it, insidious coils of wire, metal snakes hissing secrets.

It was almost funny, to think that just two years ago he'd been quivering at the thought of someone overhearing their talk about rats in the granary. It made him want to laugh and laugh and-

"Right." He smiled, raising his eyes to the other country. "If it wasn't for you, North would've won two years ago. I'd be a commie puppet."

He'd have his brother back. They'd be Korea. But they'd never have the future they dreamed of back in the prison shack, even if Kangwon had been telling the truth. He knew how North was. Even if Communism was the paradise he said, he wouldn't let them enjoy it.

His saviour beamed at him, his teeth a white half-halo in his striped face. "You've got that right. And hey, who knows? Maybe next time I come back, it'll be when the war's over."

Probably not. Bombing the Supung hadn’t made North and his masters crack. South had known it wouldn't. He knew America would win no matter what, but it wouldn’t be until at least winter, when the frost crept over the fields and the dark came sooner.

“Yeah, maybe,” he said, smiling.

“I’ve actually got a little going-away present planned, too,” his friend said mischievously, pulling down his aviators so he could give an exaggerated wink. “Should be hitting tomorrow, so look out for it.”

South didn’t ask what it was. The suitcase loomed in the corner of his vision. All he hoped was that the surprise wasn’t anywhere near the frontline. It was hard enough to deal with the sweat soaking his burns as it was.

“Can’t wait,” was all he said. “Maybe it’ll get the Reds to finally give up.”

Once America's negotiators came off their recess.

He knew it wouldn’t get North. But maybe whatever it was would be the final straw for China, show him South’s brother wasn’t worth protecting. Then his army would go home, America could swoop in and destroy the Communists, and South would have his brother back, after he learned his lesson. After that, it didn’t matter what happened with Red China.

“That’s the spirit, kid,” America cheered, slapping him on the shoulder. “And hey, to make up for being AWOL on your birthday after you gave me such a good one, I got you a little something-something.”

He reached into the inside of his suit and whipped something out, presenting it like a king grandly gifting a loyal eunuch.

Black aviators. Like the ones him and MacArthur wore, but without the fancy gold rims of his, though the chain attached to the arms looked like it was made of the same stuff.

“Ta-da,” America sing-songed, placing them in his hand. “Now we can match, more or less." He gave him a critical once-over. "Well, no one's going to be getting our names mixed up at a bar or anything, but you know what I mean."

South stared down at the glasses in his hands. The black lenses stared back, murky and impenetrable. They distorted his reflection, turned it dark and wavering. But he could still see the way its expression twisted.

"Aw, come on, Southie." America clucked his tongue as tears started to stream down his face. "You were doing so good."

"I know," he sniffled, rubbing his forearm across his eyes. "I just-"

He wanted to burst into tears and hug America. Maybe if he'd done that to North back then, he wouldn't have left. It was a nice thought.

But he knew it wouldn't have worked. And it wouldn't work now. He'd just ruin another of his friend's suits.

So he firmed his lip, straightening up.

"I'm going to miss you," he said, sounding almost normal.

America's lips curved, and the bit of pride he thought he saw there for not breaking down completely made him flush.

"I know, South. I'll miss you, too. I mean it."

America took the aviators back from him, unbending the arms and placing them on his face, reaching around his head to do the clasp, tightening the gold chain around him.

It felt weird. Countryhumans weren't built to wear sunglasses, and South was overly aware of their position on his face, and how easy it would be for them to slip off. It gave him a new appreciation for his friend wearing them around the clock.

The entryway got darker, tinted by the black glass. But America's grin pierced the shadows as he nodded in satisfaction at his work.

“And I’ll always be with you, kid,” he said. “Riiight here.”

He placed a finger on the center of South’s chest, and he looked down.

“My… heart?” he asked, sensing an incoming quip but playing along anyway. That was way too mushy for America.

“Nope,” he said, as expected. “Your stomach. I’ll keep having stuff shipped over from Tokyo for you. Alcohol, cake, the goods.”

South sagged in relief. Thank God. He really hadn’t been looking forward to having to shop for himself full time. He didn’t have enough money and the market didn’t have enough food.

It'd be more debt, but hey- what was a few more drops of liquor in the ocean?

‘If you won, we would be-‘

Who cared? Better to be in debt to America than to Communists. At least if Korea was capitalist, they’d have a chance to pay it off.

“You can take the crap still in this place, too.” America looked around, then dramatically lowered his voice, shielding his mouth with a hand even though the house was empty and about to be emptier. “But be warned- it's mostly potatoes."

That was fine. South just needed something to gorge himself on to try and dull the eternal aching hunger inside him.

It was unfair, really. He could never be full so long as people were hungry, but even if every person in Korea ate enough, he could still starve.

“Thanks,” he said to his friend, tilting his head up so the aviators wouldn’t fall, resolving to take them off as soon as his friend was gone.

“No problem, South.” America rested his hand on his shoulder again, and his expression softened more than he’d ever seen it. “So long as you’re with me, kid, I’ll always look out for you.”

South knew it. America wasn't really leaving. He was going to keep him fed, keep calling him, keep sending him presents. He would take care of him, so long as he was good. And even if he wasn't, he would come back, whether from Washington or Tokyo or China. He would always come back.

America wasn't a Communist, he wasn't the provinces or Red China or Japan. And he wasn't his brother. He hadn't chosen North or 'more important things' over him. For better or worse…

He had chosen South.

—

America grinned down at his colony, liking the look he saw in the white eyes behind the aviator lenses, less inky than his, the way the lids relaxed, the way the tension in his shoulders stopped quivering under his hand, and the feigned ease on the rest of his face became real.

Yeah, that was what he wanted to see. Not those wide eyes and half-open mouth as that kid had backed away from him on shaking legs in the snowy woods, shocked and confused and scared, for some fucking reason, like America had ever hurt him on purpose.

He'd done well. This kid knew which side of the bread his butter was on. He knew there wasn't another side to butter. Only America's.

It was safe to leave. South wasn't Canada. America's brother had chosen Britain over him and always would, until there was no other choice.

But South had chosen him.

A surge of affection rushed through him, making him want to hug the kid. And since he always did what he wanted, he did, swooping down and heaving South off his feet as he shrieked, spinning him around in the air. His shrieks turned to laughter as he tried to keep his aviators on his face, and America laughed, too, laughed and laughed until he got bored and set him down on his feet with a dramatic sweep.

South swayed, dizzy, holding a hand over his torso. There was pain at the edge of his mouth, but he still smiled up at the American, his aviators askew.

The look in his eyes told America that he knew well and truly what he was- his Korea. And that wouldn't be changing.

America grinned, reaching out and adjusting South's aviators with a flick of his finger. Then he grabbed his suitcase and plucked his hat off the stand, tipping it to the Korean.

"Catch ya around, South."

"Yeah," he said back. "In a while, crocodile."

America laughed, delighted that he'd learned the expression, then clicked his tongue and headed out the door.

'They grow up so fast.' He wiped a fake tear away.

He'd admit, he was genuinely a little reluctant to leave the kid. It was nice to have someone around that saw him for the hero he was, instead of the backstabbers like Truman and the other pinkos. But he couldn't bring him home with him. He had shit to do.

'Have to pick up a new girl.' One who wasn't quite so loony. One who would appreciate what she had.

Rage flared inside him, turning his vision red, but quickly faded. The thought of that crazy cunt wouldn't dull his shine, not when he knew he wouldn't even remember her name in a few years. The sun was high, the air was warm, and by tonight he wouldn't have to smell fish and smog and poverty. He'd be back in America, land of the free, home of the brave, purveyor of the best goddamn french fries you ever had in your life. The first thing he was gonna do was stop at a diner. Summer was for milkshakes, drive-in movies, and cruisin' around with a pretty doll in your passenger seat.

There was a skip in his step, and as he headed down the gravel drive, he couldn't help but kick up the heels of his shiny leather shoes, tapping them together as he tossed his pork pie hat in the air, catching it on his wrist and rolling it across his shoulders as he passed through the gate, plunking it firmly back onto his head as he yanked the car door open.

He glanced back, grinning as he saw that South was standing in the doorway, watching him. He inclined his head, snapping off a half-salute, then threw himself into the vehicle, setting his wire recorder on the passenger side floor.

With all his material, he could make South say just about anything he wanted. But he wouldn't have to. He knew all he'd have to do was ask.

America laughed, then hit the gas, speeding down the street, eager to get out of this Godforsaken county. Goodbye gooks and whores and boring war, hello pin-ups and elections and the thrill of politics, a war that was far more subtle, but no less bloody. And with the eyes of the newshawks off him, he could actually get his hands bloody again, try to bring that spark back.

He'd go home, fix up the steel situation, win back the hearts and minds of the masses, and wash their brains clean of all the commie lies clogging up their wrinkles, once he figured out how CCCP had done it in the first place. Then they would see that this war wasn't just just, but holy.

He hadn't needed Big Red's tricks here. Not for South. The kid was his. Soon Korea would be, too.

"And everything else is just dominoes, baby," he said out loud, and laughed out the window at the Korean summer.

—

South stood in the doorway, watching his car go. Then just watching, until the vehicle was gone and America was gone and even the dust in his wake had settled and he was alone again.

He didn't cry. America wasn't like North. He wasn't abandoning him with nothing, and he wasn't lying when he said he'd come back. He would be back.

And South wouldn't cry. There was no cement room waiting for him this time. No dried blood soaked into the floor. No lashes. No punishment. Not for him, anyway.

There was only South.

He turned and went back inside, prepared for tomorrow's going-away present, and whatever else was to come.

I've been the archer, I've been the prey. Who could ever leave me darling?
But who could stay.

Archer by Taylor Swift is actually very good for South. I was just thinking of this line, but go listen or read the full song. It screams South. And by that I mean abandonment issues and being desperately afraid someone will see through your façade.

Mm, I've definitely read the phrase 'screwed the pooch' in English books before, and always thought it was just a nonsense saying. But is it actually saying 'fucked the dog?' I don't think I want to research this.

I was really torn with calling this chapter Born To Stay. But I settled on Chosen for the double meaning.

Going-Away Present

"Inhale."

Hae sucked in a breath, trying to hold still on the hospital bed while Kangwon listened to her lungs, even though the little disc thingies on the stef… stethoscope were cold against her ribs, and the pressure on her burns made her want to squirm.

"Exhale," Kang directed, and she obeyed, breathing slowly out, repeating the in-out breathing as he worked his way down both sides of her body, back and front.

When he was done, he straightened up, takin' the band he used to hold the contraption on his head off.

"Well?" Korea demanded.

He'd been facin' the corner the whole examination (even though Hae had her slip on, it was just pulled up to her chest), but he spun around to look at Kang now.

"She's fine," Kang told him. "Just a minor infection. From picking her elbow," he said pointedly, looking at Hae.

She blinked innocently, sliding her hand away from the part of her body he'd examined earlier.

She couldn't help it! She'd been doing good at not pickin', but she had a ton'a new burns now from the transformer attacks (something she hadn't thought was possible), and whenever the one that covered her elbow started to heal, the scabs got all stiff and gross and made her arm feel weird when she was trying to work. The feeling was so annoying that before she knew it, she'd be pickin' them off, like on the ride back to Pyongyang a few days ago. And even if she didn't, they broke open on their own when she helped out in the fields.

But Korea was still glarin' at her, and she knew he didn't want to hear excuses.

"Ah'm sorry," she said to both of 'em, hanging her head. "Ah really din't mean to."

"Make sure it doesn't happen again," her country ordered. "I can't have you out of commission for a second time."

"It won't, Korea," Hae promised, really hoping it wouldn't. She'd never disobey him on purpose, her hands were just traitors that got all picky without her realizin'.

Korea had been keeping his eye on her face, but it flicked down for a moment, to her stomach.

Hae pulled her shift down over the mess of ribs, blisters, and bloody bandages, swingin' her heels as she put her undershirt and jacket back on, covering it all up.

"Ah'm okay, Korea," she chirped, givin' him a real big smile. "Ah told ya ah din't feel that bad."

Her head just felt a li'l hotter than usual. She wouldn't'a worried him at all, but she wanted to make sure it wasn't the sympathetic fever getting worse. And she didn't want to bother Kang unless she really had to. And she only really had to if Korea said so.

He was still all tense, so she added, "Kang says it's just a li'l infection. And he's never wrong."

Her cousin's voice was quiet as he said, "I'm wrong sometimes, Hae."

He was rubbin' his face, his smooth doctor's gloves off now. He kept it down, like he didn't want them to see, but Hae was still sitting, so she caught a glimpse of his eyes through his fingers.

They were real tired.

But his expression was easy again when he lifted his head. "But yeah, it's just an infection. I'll give you a few antibiotics, and you should be fine."

Hae frowned, sneaking a look at Korea, who was still starin' at her stomach like covering it up with her clothes hadn't helped at all. She tried to catch Kangwon's attention to talk to him with her face, but he'd gone back to rubbing his.

"Do ah… have to take antibiotics?" she ventured, flinching as Korea immediately growled, "Yes."

She didn't want to use up their hospitals' precious medicine. Their machines couldn't work right without steady power, and if someone needed to be hooked up to one after they got sick 'cuz she'd taken medicine they needed…

"But-"

"South Hwanghae," Korea growled in that voice that meant if she said anything else he'd get mad for real. "Do you need to be reminded of the criticism I gave you after your recuperative coma?"

Kang had told him about her wanting to refuse rations. He hadn't told him all of it, and Korea hadn't asked so Hae hadn't had to either. But he did know she hadn't wanted to eat too much as part of her cholera treatment.

She didn't blame her cousin. He was just tryin' to look out for her. And Korea hadn't been mad. He hadn't even been upset. Not at her. But she had been criticized for it.

Hae looked down at her scuffed boots. "No."

She hurt too much right now. If he gave her that disappointed look, she'd burst into tears. Then he'd just be even more disappointed.

"Then you will take whatever Kangwon prescribes you," he ordered. "Or else when you die again, I'll make sure you don't wake up."

His teeth bit down on the last word, his jaw twitchin'.

Hae said real quick, “Ayuh, Comrade Gen’ral.”

She didn’t want to die again. Korea got that look in his eye even thinking about it. If it actually happened…

“You won’t need many, Hae,” Kang soothed. “And I told you before- if you need them, it’s not a waste.”

He went to touch her shoulder, but his hand only hovered, then dropped. Hae didn’t know if it was because he’d seen how burnt up her shoulders were, or if it was ‘cuz his own hands were hurtin’ under the bandages. She hoped it wasn’t the first one. She didn’t mind a li’l pain if she got a hug out of it. And since she was always in pain all the time now, the hug could only make it better.

Her eyes flicked sideways, and she guiltily fiddled with her top button.

It wasn’t like she was really hurtin’. Korea had to bear all the bombing from all their northern provinces. He had way more burns than her. And since he wasn’t curlin’ up into a ball crying, she wouldn’t either. She was tough. She’d also just… really like a hug.

Kang left to get the medicine, taking the flashlight with him. Hae’s eyes didn’t even get to close before Korea’s light came on, chasin’ the shadows out of the small check-up room.

“Thank ya, Korea,” Hae said, her insides relaxing a li’l.

He didn’t answer. He was looking at her stomach again.

Hae wished she could pull the shadows back over just that part of her, and the bandages on her face and hands. But she knew even if it was pitch black, Korea would see them anyway.

Kangwon came back a few minutes later, handing her a li’l bottle.

“Penicillin,” he told her. “They're the ones I gave you when you got that mouse bite in '48. Take two a day for a week. Only take them with your rations, and bring the bottle back after.”

Hae gaped in dismay, running through her fingers just to be sure.

Two a day for a week? That was fourteen pills!

“You need them, Hae,” Kang said seriously. “You remember why North Pyongan couldn’t help Korea break us out of the holding camp?”

“’Cuz Korea doesn’t like bringin’ us with him on dangerous missions, even though he always tells us to bring backup an’ never go alone if we don’t have to,” Hae said confidently.

Korea grimaced. Kangwon didn’t smile as wide as she’d wanted, but he did have to hide a tiny one.

“And because his infection wouldn’t let him operate,” her cousin said. “You wouldn’t want to get stuck here if America launches another attack and we need to defend ourselves or march south, would you?”

Hae’s back teeth clenched. “No.”

She wanted to be there where Korea put his fist through ‘Merica’s stupid stripy face. And she needed to be there when he confronted the Southern One. He needed her there to make sure the bastard didn’t blind him for good.

“Then take your damn pills,” Korea muttered.

He wasn’t looking at either of ‘em now. He was staring past them, at the white wall. Hae looked too, thinking there might be a bug for her to kill, but didn’t see anything.

“Okay, Korea.” She took the bottle, tuckin’ it safely into her belt pouch and doing up the clasp. The only thing worse than taking fourteen pills from someone would be losing them.

“And don’t say anything about ‘wasting’ medicine around Kim Yong-hwan,” he ordered, finally breaking his starin’ contest with the wall.

“Because she’ll scold you for it?” Kang asked, leaning back against the door, his face twitching like it wanted to wince.

Korea's was stony. “Just don’t do it.”

Hae promised not to, staying on the cot as they moved on to a germ warfare debrief.

She wanted to get back to work, but Korea hadn’t told her to, so she thought he wasn’t done with her. And she wanted to be in the same room as him while she could. He hadn’t slept at the bunker since the electricity went out, and she was probably goin’ to get sent back to her province soon since the meeting of the Party Political Committee was over. They had work to do to get ready for the Party leadin’ body elections in August and September, and to make sure all the criticism the Gen’ral and everyone else gave at the meeting was followed through on.

Hae was going to suggest that Korea send her along to Hwanghae to keep rallyin’ everyone there, and send Hwang to survey the ri People’s Committees an’ Party cells across the country to find out what the best stuff to put in the winter courses was, so both of them would be doing what they were good at. All innocent-like.

She snuck a look at him.

He was focused on Kang. His head still didn’t have any burns for some reason. North Hamgyong had grumbled about it, but it pleased Hae. Even the bombs knew not to mess with his face. It made her feel a li’l better to know that even if everything she could see was destroyed, enough of Korea was still standing that her Countryhuman didn’t have to wear these annoying bandages on his face like her. She could see all his bands, and the li’l scar above his eyebrow, and his cheeks. Even if they were even hollower than hers, being able to see their flag still untied the braids her insides had tied themselves into.

And she could see his eye. It was narrowed now, a li’l tight at the corners. But when she said she thought her sympathetic fever had gotten worse and it might be a real one, it had shot wide open, all alarmed as he clamped down on her shoulder and dragged her off to see Kang.

She knew he didn’t want to lose her or Hwang. Just like her and her brother didn't want to lose each other. Just like she didn't want to lose…

Hae pulled her legs up onto the cot, wedging her heels against the side so she wouldn't get the thin sheet dirty, trying not to feel her thighs splitting opening as she rested her chin on her knees.

Korea didn't want to lose them. And he was smart. Even if they didn't tell him to separate them, she knew he'd still make the right decision.

But... she did... know he didn't always. It probably wasn't the right decision not to take at least Cha or Hambu to break them out of the holding camp. Or to sneak away to the south a few months ago. And she guessed he hadn't known that the Southern One was stupid and evil back then, but Seodaemun probably hadn't been the right decision either. He'd even said it wasn't.

Korea could be wrong sometimes. He'd been wrong about the Southern One being kind, after all.

She didn't love him any less for it, and she knew he was still right at least ninety percent of the time, but…

She knew he'd make the right decision with her an' Hwang, like he'd made the right decision with Kang an' Gang. But she also knew that was all she could hope for.

Hae got up while Kang was midway through tellin' Korea about the recent germ attacks around the country, walking over to wrap her arms around their Countryhuman. He tried to shove her off, but she clung tight, and he couldn't interrupt Kang talkin' about another batch of spiders torched in his province, so she got to stay.

He huffed, grabbing her arms. Hae tightened her hold, but he just moved them up so she was hugging his chest instead of his stomach. Pleased, she relaxed her grip, hopin' she hadn't hurt him.

"China told me Liaotung had more blighted leaves dropped on her province a couple days ago," Kang reported. "Looks like Macrophoma kuwatsukai." “That’s the stuff that causes ring spot on apples an’ pears,” Hae told Korea helpfully.

Hwang had been surprised she knew that kind’a stuff. Not in a mean way, just a surprised way. She didn’t know what he thought she’d been learnin’ in her night classes to join the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry, but of course she knew all the gross fungi and stuff that caused crops to rot. She just called them by normal names. She didn’t see why scientist types had to call them all fancy. She thought maybe it was 'cuz peasants knew more about plants and animals, so they needed to make up code words so they could still feel smarter.

Korea had went stiff at her words.

Oh, right. Hae should be stiff, too. Ring rot was real bad. It didn’t just make the apple go bad, but the entire tree, causin’ cankers and twig blight, until the entire thing was no good and had to be cut down. And it was really infectious.

“They burned ‘em, right?” she asked urgently.

“Yeah,” Kangwon said. “Don’t worry. They just kept a few samples for testing.”

But if they were just dropped a couple days ago, they didn’t know if any had got missed and managed to infect a tree.

Hae buried her face in Korea’s side. She hoped the Chinese didn’t have many orchards in the northeast. And she hoped they didn’t get any more dropped on their country.

“We’re handling the drops here?” Korea’s voice rumbled in her ‘ear’ like a tractor.

“Ayuh,” Hae said into his uniform. “Everyone knows to burn any weird leaves. And to get rid’a trees or crops right away if they show blight.”

They couldn’t afford to go around burnin’ down fields or trees right now (except for the mountain peasants that still slash-and-burn farmed), but losing one tree was worth it to save an orchard.

“Good. Keep it up.” But Korea didn’t untense. “Word on the ISC?”

“They’re investigating Shenyang now,” Kangwon told him. “I got a message from Zhao Jingjing, and she says the reports were all good. They should be here by the end of the month.”

Korea nodded tersely.

Kangwon fiddled with his fingers a li’l, how he did when he was trying not to bite them. “Korea, the Security Council resolution-“

“The second veto was the last,” Korea said blankly. “They don’t intend to listen to us. They have decided that CCCP refusing to accept us not having a presence at the vote means that we are lying.”

Kang closed his eyes, nodding. It looked like it was hard to open them again. “Alright. At least the Commission will get the word out.”

Korea didn’t respond.

‘Bastids.’ Hae’s cousin was already upset with everything he had to deal with in the hospitals. On top of that, they had to knock out their power and leave him and their patients in the dark, and call them liars.

America was the liar. The other foreigners were just too stupid to tell. Or so evil that they didn’t care.

“And…” Kangwon hesitated. “Did they say anything about Gangwon?”

Korea jaw twitched. “CCCP brought up summoning him to provide his account of his time fighting the germ warfare here. He was told Gangwon had already testified internally that I detained him against his will, and that he has no desire to spread our lies.”

Kang hid his fingers in his palms. “Did South Command him to say that?”

“Gang would never say that,” Hae declared. “Even if the Southern

One tried to make him. He'd fight back like SH did."

"It's just hearsay," Korea dismissed. "Our agents say he hasn't left his holding area or been visited in days, since before CCCP brought it up at the first vote. America hasn't had a chance to make him say anything."

Hae and Kangwon's eyes slid to each other, then away.

"Alright," Kang said tiredly. "That's as good as it can be."

Korea's jaw was twitchin' a lot today. "We're done here. Get back to work."

Kang gave a slow salute, shufflin' aside so they could get to the door. "Hae, take some plantain and ramps from your garden patch and make a poultice for your elbow every day."

She pouted as Korea dragged her for the door. "But they're itchy."

"You said you pick because you forget you're not supposed to," he reminded her. "If it's itching, you won't forget."

She reluctantly agreed to do it, even though she'd rather eat the tasty wild garlic and plantain leaves than smear them on her skin.

Kangwon smiled at her, but as she detached herself from Korea's side so she could shut the door, she caught him slumping down onto the cot and putting his head in his hands.

Her heart ached, but she couldn't go back in to hug him. Korea wouldn't like seeing how exhausted he really was. She'd already seen him eyeing the shadows under Kang's eyes, almost as dark as the ones under his. She'd just make sure to be extra cheery at her next blood donation.

Aw danggit. Since she was sick she wouldn't be able to donate until she was better.

'Stupid elbow.' And her traitorous hands.

Ever since the military hospital had got its pretty coat of teal and white paint, it usually felt pretty big. But with the lights off, the hallways seemed cramped, like fox burrows. They felt so narrow that she couldn't forget they were underground the way she usually tried to, even with Korea's flashlight lighting the way. She wasn't allowed to cling to him with the nurses walkin' around with their lamps, but she stayed close, right on his heels, until they were back out in the wide-open bright.

Even though it was raining outside, and the summer heat immediately jumped on her like a musky-breathed puppy that really wanted to be pet, makin' her sweat in the uniform she couldn't take off, Hae was relieved.

She hadn't realized how used she'd got to electricity. Back during the Occupation, if the dark started gettin' to her, she just had to deal with it. Fires took too long to make and attracted enemy attention, lamp oil and candles couldn't be wasted just 'cuz she was a li'l… not scared, and matches only gave her a second of bright, then left the place feelin' even darker than before.

But after they'd got everything back up and running, if she worked so long in the office that shadows started to creep through the window, she could just reach over and switch on her lamp to keep working. If Hwang was out late and her room in Haeju started feeling too small, she could walk over to the switch and light the whole house up. And if the walls of Korea's windowless bedroom started closing in, and the warm dark behind her lids got cold, and his soft breathing wasn't enough to push them back, she knew she could lunge for the desk and brighten the room.

Korea always was enough to remind her she wasn't in the dark and lonely, in the hole. But it was still nice knowing she could make her own light.

But ever since the war, she couldn't depend on electricity anymore. Lights couldn't be turned on at the front, and even at the rear, lines would get cut or transformers would get bombed, and she was left with just her flashlight.

And now no one could depend on it at all.

"Korea," she asked as they headed away from the hospital. "Are we goin' to get electricity everywhere after the war's over?"

She didn't ask if it would be back on soon. Pyo had asked again a couple days ago, and he'd snapped at her.

"Yes," he said, not looking at her. "Rebuilding has to be the main focus, but we're going to work on electrifying all the villages as soon as possible."

That meant no one would ever have to worry about the dark again, even the people up in the mountains.

Hae gave a happy li'l skip, then startled as someone said, "A goal I can admire."

Korea didn't even flinch as Mao Zhilong slid into the space Hae's jump had put between them.

"Ah, sorry Little Tiger," he said, all innocent when she knew he wasn't. "Did I scare you?"

"No." Hae pouted, hoppin' over to Korea's other side.

She still wasn't allowed to hug him because Pong-ju and Man-won were behind them, but she made sure the Chinese guy could see she was walking closer to her Countryhuman than him.

"That's good," he said. "Just like bringing electricity to your country." He smiled at Korea from under his mask. "You want to 'light up the Peninsula from Hallasan to Paektusan,' isn't that what you told me awhile ago?"

Korea hunched, not looking at him as the red on his band got deeper. "Shut up."

Hae liked getting to see him do that since it was so rare, but she still asked, "Korea, where are we goin'?" before Mao Zhilong could tease him more.

He got to do that more than enough since he was allowed to sleep in his room and go to Jonsung complex with him (which she still definitely didn't know the location of, nope).

She'd thought Korea would send her off once they were out of the hospital, but he'd turned for the rail line that ran along the river, toward where the Quarantine Hospital had been before the war.

"I'm going to Jonsung complex," he told her. "You are heading back to the bunker to rest."

Hae halted. "But ah want to get back to work!"

"Then you should have thought about that before you got yourself an infection. You are taking at least one rest day."

But Hae didn't want to be locked up in the bunker all day! She couldn't even use her flashlight 'cuz it would run out of battery and she'd get in trouble for wasting it. And Pong-ju and Man-won couldn't talk with her if they were standing guard.

"Ah can work, Korea, honest," she protested, scampering after him. "It's just weedin' an' makin' sure the fields are stayin' drained, and the paddies are stayin' wet."

"And you will get wet." He swept rainwater from his forehead, flickin' it at Mao Zhilong. "And then you'll get even sicker."

But if she was just sitting around doing nothin' she wouldn't be showing Korea that her an' Hwang got way more work done as two people!

"Ah won't," she protested. "Ah only got sick last time 'cuz ah was-"

She cut herself off just as Korea spun to face her.

"South Hwanghae, I mean it," he growled. "I will not have you being made useless to me again. Regardless of whether we get a ceasefire soon or not, I need you active, either to fight or rebuild."

His narrowed eye added, 'Don't argue with me in front of China.'

Hae pouted. She really really didn't want to go sit in the dark lonely bunker.

But she also didn't want to make Korea mad.

She widened her eyes, silently begging him, but he just narrowed his even more, until it was just a slit of white. Rain pattered off his epaulets and they bent as much as him.

Hae hung her head. "Yes, Korea."

He squinted at her harder, then turned on his heel. "March. I'm escorting you to the bridge."

"So diligent," Mao Zhilong said, following him again as Hae trudged after.

"I just don't trust her guards not to give in to her," Korea muttered.

"Comrades Pong-ju an' Man-won wouldn't disobey you like that, Korea," Hae defended their honour, but quietly, just in case they hadn't heard him say that. "And ah wouldn't either. Ah'd never not do what ya tell me to."

Which was why she wasn't going to pick her elbow burns again. Even though it'd be real hard if it was just her locked up in the bunker with nothin' to do, just her and the pain and the dark-

'Nope!' Not happenin'. She'd keep the door open and talk to whichever one of her guards stayed close. Korea couldn't tell her not to, 'cuz Kang said fresh air was some of the best medicine there was.

Korea sighed. "For the last time- I don't want you to just do whatever I tell you to."

"Okay, Korea!"

He sighed again.

The rain poured down, soaking Hae's uniform as they walked along the railway. She usually liked the rain 'cuz it meant the fields would be getting a nice drink, and it was especially important in July to make sure the rice paddies wouldn't dry out. But she didn't like how warm it was today, mixin' with the sweat coating her and making it run into her burns, stinging. As she tried to swipe the water off her face, only giving her bandages more to absorb, she couldn't help but think of how weird and spongy Pyobu had looked after he came back from drowning, his scabs having soaked up all the ocean water.

'Yuck.'

She'd get dried off and changed into her spare uniform at the bunker, then sit in the doorway.

"Comrade Nam Il says the Americans still don't intend to end their recess until the week is over," Korea told Mao Zhilong. "Still no word on the two thousand."

"You know," the Chinese man said. "I'm perfectly capable of staying updated on the talks and giving you the highlights. If you want to focus on your energy situation for now, I can handle the negotiation reports."

"I'm not letting you take control of reports for my country," Korea snapped, which Hae could've told Mao Zhilong he would do. He didn't even like the provinces takin' control of stuff like that. He had to read all the reports, even if they'd already read them.

Hae thought it was really impressive, especially since he didn't even like reading as much as Hwang did. She knew she couldn't read as much as Korea did, unless he ordered her to. And even then, she'd probably get squirmy and start pickin' her elbow again.

"I believe the word I used was 'handle,'" Mao Zhilong said. "But have it your way."

Hae envied the way he swished through the raindrops, like they weren't even touching him. They were- she could see that his olive uniform had got darker, but he didn't look all soaked like her and Korea. His scarf wasn't even plastered to his head. She thought if Pyo could see him right now, she might have to hold her back so she couldn't hurt him.

She skipped along at Korea's side, even though she wasn't exactly happy about where she was headed. But her Countryhuman was stretchin' his legs so Mao Zhilong couldn't get ahead of him, so she had to to keep up. She only half-listened to what they were talking about, enjoyin' the rasp of Korea's voice more than the words, since he'd already updated her a few hours ago at the muster point, before she'd told him about her fever.

It was the same POW problem, the Yankees refusin' to give their people back, and a lot of numbers stuff that made Hae's head spin. They'd been saying a huge amount of the eighty thousand prisoners on Geoje Island didn't want to go home, then lowered it to five percent, even though all the press that visited were still sayin' they were all 'diehard Communists,' a term Hae didn't like much. Hwang said it was a good thing, but she thought there were better ways to say 'super loyal to Korea' that didn't involve the word 'die.'

Anyway, now the Yanks were admittin' that seventy-eight thousand of them wanted to come back north, but weren't saying anything about the other two thousand.

Hae didn't like that. She didn't like that at all.

She'd always known Korea was going to come for her when she was in the camp, 'cuz he knew she was there, waiting for him. But those two thousand didn't know that. They didn't know Korea had that big list of all their names that he kept in his bag, and that he was always saying they'd get them back no matter what. Those two thousand people could be being tortured right now as 'Merica tried to make them give in, and they wouldn't know that Korea was here fightin' for them. They might die without knowing it.

And Hae didn't like that Rhee was sayin' almost thirty thousand of the forty-four thousand civilians-that-probably-weren't-civilians were going to fight for him. And not just because it was illegal. They knew who some of them were, they knew some of them were their soldiers, but they didn't have every name. The Yankees had never handed over the full list.

Even Korea didn't know some of them were missing. Just like when he hadn't known Hae had even existed.

She could remember those final days in the hole now, sitting in the dark thinking she was never going to be rescued. That no one would ever know where she was. That maybe she wasn't even real. That she'd die the same way she'd lived- alone.

If it hadn't been for Eyebrows deciding to be nice, she would have died down there. The Japanese would've left Korea, and either 'killed' her themselves or left her to rot. Her body would heal in her recuperative coma, but even after she woke up she'd still be chained up in the dark and lonely, and the rats probably would've feasted on her while she was dead. She would have spent the rest of her life rat-bitten and starving, falling in and out of comas until one day Korea fixed whatever had made two Hwanghaes in the first place, and she would fade away. And no one would have ever known she'd existed in the first place. Not Hwang, not the Gen'ral, not her people, not SH or Korea. Not even her.

She didn't like to think that even one of their soldiers was locked up right now, dark and lonely and hungry, their only company the Yankees torturin' them, not knowing that Korea would come for them, not knowing that even if him and Hae and the others didn't know their names that they knew they were there, knew they were real. That someone out here remembered them.

She didn't want to think about it. But she knew she had to. Like the hole. She couldn't let herself forget what had been done to her, and she couldn't forget what was happenin' to her people right now.

'Not ever.'

Hae wrapped her arms around herself, feeling small and soggy as the rain beat down on her charred skin. She'd fallen behind Korea, and was about to start skipping to catch up when something moved in the corner of her eye, somethin' small and yellow slipping in between the rubble of the old hospital bloc.

Her eyes shot open. Could it be?!

She started towards the rubble, but glanced back before her feet could carry her away.

Even though it was all rainy, there were a bunch'a people out and about. Rain was good 'cuz it meant there was less of a chance the planes would come. The railway workers were taking the chance to make sure the repairs they'd done in a hurry were solid, and workers bustled around the ruined city, hustlin' back and forth from hidden warehouses and supply dumps Hae wasn't allowed to know about as they got stuff ready to ship to the front.

Korea had stopped next to the tracks to talk to a work crew. He looked over, realizing she wasn't at his side.

Hae tipped her head to the rubble. 'Ah saw somethin'.'

He tensed, fingers twitching for his pistol. 'Danger?'

She shook her head, then blinked reassuringly. Korea looked up at the sky.

Hae knew what he was looking for. The weather should make it less likely for planes to show up, but it wasn't windy, and she knew a li'l rain and clouds wouldn't stop the Yankees if they really wanted to bomb them. Nothing did.

But right now nothin' filled the sky but patchy grey clouds, and the hissing of the rain drowned out any far-away droning. Korea tilted his head, telling her she had permission to investigate.

Happily, Hae skipped off for the broken wall that surrounded the old hospital, before abruptly slowing down. If it was him, she didn't want to scare him.

"Comrade Hae?" Man-won asked, comin' out of nowhere with his gun drawn. "What is it?"

Oops. Right. They couldn't read her silent talk with Korea.

She told him what she thought she'd saw, and he relaxed, tucking his pistol back in its holster.

“Alright. I reckon it’s safe to check it out.” The big man squinted at a nearby dug-out built under the shadow of the crumbling wall, where a peasant woman was huddled inside, sewin’ up a shirt.

Her huge bodyguard could be a li'l menacing sometimes, so Hae leaned past him to give the woman a friendly wave. Her face softened as she saw her, giving a tired one back.

Then Hae set off into the wreck of the hospital, navigatin’ through the parts of the cement walls that were still standing, all the paint blown off them, weird steel wires twisting out of the grey chunks. She got snagged on one, and Pong-ju had to unhook her.

She popped out on the other side of the wrecked main building without finding what she’d seen. Some of the smaller structures were still mostly standing, so she planted her hands on her hips and squinted at them, lookin’ for any movement in the drizzly rain.

There!

Hae saw something flash behind the mostly intact wall of a bathhouse and darted over. The far side of the room had caved in, causin’ the ceiling beam to crash down and take out the other wall, filling the small building with shattered stones and clay.

When she found what she’d seen, she felt a li’l disappointed. But then her excitement surged back.

“Cat!” She grabbed for the scrawny yellow-striped critter sitting on the beam, but it slid in between the rubble before she could catch it.

“Oops,” she said out loud, ashamed as she remembered what Hambu had told her about animals. She wouldn’t like it if someone suddenly chased her into a dead end and lunged at her.

Hand over her belly scar, Hae backed up a li’l.

“It’s not a hound,” Man-won noted, comin’ to stand next to her.

No, it wasn’t. Hae had thought it was probably too small, but…

She still missed Ppang. She hadn't found him after waking up, and SH said he never showed up when she was in her coma. It'd been months now. He almost definitely wasn't comin' back.

It made her sad, but she hoped he was happy wherever he was. Maybe someone nice really had taken him in. Someone that had food to spare.

"Nope," she said cheerily. "It's a cat!"

She hadn't seen one in ages, since before the war. They didn't like loud noises like bombs and trucks and construction, so they'd made themselves real scarce.

Well, she'd seen some in the village barns. But she knew what had happened to those, so she didn't want to think about them.

"Ah want to pet it," she announced.

Pong-ju's small eyebrows crinkled. "Ah think that might not be the best thing. It could have fleas."

Right. And she didn't want to get sick again.

Hae squatted, peering into the shadows where it was hiding. Its big green eyes peered back, doin' that thing cat eyes did where they turned to shiny silver discs. She decided it was a girl.

She looked wet and bedraggled, the way the province felt. Her yellow fur was plastered to her body, and she could count all her ribs just as clearly as she could count hers. But it looked like she didn't have any mangy patches, and her eyes, ears, and li'l pink nose looked clear.

"She looks healthy," she announced, then looked up at Man-won, battin' her lashes.

The large man sighed. "Ya really want to pet it?"

Hae nodded vigorously.

"Alright. I'll check it fer fleas." He put on gloves and moseyed past her for the cat's hiding place.

"Don't come at it from above." Hae tried to whisper so she wouldn't scare it. "Animals hate that."

It took Man-won a few *'jjeut jjeut jjeut'*s and a li'l reaching, but in a minute he came up with the cat's scruff firmly in hand. He wouldn't let Hae touch her until she put her own emergency gloves on and he was finished carefully examining it. The moment he was, she reached out a hand for the cat to sniff, then snatched it from him.

"Hi there," she happily greeted the kitty as she struggled in her arms. She kept a firm grip, stroking her until she stopped fightin' (mostly), and just growled at her low in her throat.

Hae's mouth opened excitedly then clamped shut. Maybe she shouldn't tell her guards it sounded just like Korea. He might not like that.

"She's so cute!" she cooed, and Man-won stoically agreed.

"Ah'm more of a dog man myself," Pong-ju opined.

The cat growled at Hae again, so she rubbed behind her ears, wondering if she liked being scratched there like Ppang. But the ear twitched and flattened, so she went back to stroking her sides instead.

It made her sad not to be able to pet the fur. Even all wet it still looked soft. With her glove on, all she could feel were the ridges of her li'l ribcage, like back when her skin had been unburned enough that she could still run her fingertips over her own ribs, feelin' the bumps.

Hae knew she should just put her down and let her run away again, so she could hunt mice and birds until one of the Anti-Epidemic Units caught her, but…

She held the kitty close to her chest, and it went limp in her arms with a wheezing sigh, like Korea the few times she'd managed to git him in on-the-spot sparring.

She turned and trotted back for the rail line.

Korea was waiting near where she'd left him, deep in conversation with Mao Zhilong now that the workers had gone back to work. But the second she trotted across the rails, his eye was on her, alarmed.

"South Hwanghae!" he hissed like the cat. "Put that down!"

Hae tilted her away, but before she could say anything, Korea was lunging forward, grabbing the cat by the scruff and yanking her away from her, tossing her across the ground.

"Korea!" the province cried, dismayed. "Don't be mean!"

She tried to go for the cat, but he grabbed her by the shoulder with one hand, frantically wiping the one that touched the animal on his pant leg.

Hae winced as fingers dug into her sore burns, cracking the crust of scabs on them. But Korea's eye was still wide as it darted over her, searching frantically as he stopped trying to get his hand clean to grab at her collar and pockets, so she didn't say anything.

"Ah'm fine," she told him. "It din't have any fleas. Just ask Comrade Man-won."

Korea jerked his head over to the man, lookin' all murdery, and Hae guiltily apologized to him in her head.

"It's true," Man-won said with a soldier's expression. "Checked myself. Wouldn't've let her hold it if it did."

"You shouldn't have let her hold it at all," Korea said icily, but finally let go of her.

'Owwww.' Deep pain throbbed through Hae's shoulder, but she tried not to rub it. It'd just make it worse.

She looked around for the cat, afraid she'd ran away or been hurt. But she had just rolled when Korea threw her, poppin' right back up. She was sittin a few feet away by the mess of the railway worker canteen, washing her li'l paws. Hae thought the look she gave Korea was sort of offended.

She went to go get her, but *'oof'*ed as she ran right into Korea's arm.

"Are you trying to get sick?" he snapped at her.

"She's not sick, Korea," Hae protested. "She doesn't have any fleas or other bugs, and she looks all healthy. Ah checked."

It was really really surprisin' for a stray cat not to have any bugs at all. That must mean their insect eradication was working.

"And Kang didn't say any germs got dropped on Pyongyang recently," she added. "And ah don't think even the Yankees would drop cats."

Not 'cuz she didn't think they weren't evil enough to. But cats weren't light like insects or compact like voles and other rodents. If you dropped a cat out of a plane, all its legs would snap. And that meant it couldn't spread your germs around.

"It doesn't matter if it doesn't have anything to do with the germ warfare," Korea growled. "Cats still carry disease."

The cat padded over like she knew he was talkin' about her. Even though she'd been all flinchy when Man-won tried to pet her, she sat down near Korea's boot with no problem, even after getting tossed.

Korea raised his foot, but Hae jumped on him.

"Don't kick her!" she cried, knocking him off balance so he had to put it down again.

"I wasn't going to kick it," he said irritably, shoving her away. "I was going to nudge it."

"I could kick it for you," Mao Zhilong volunteered, sliding over.

"No kickin' cats!" Hae threw herself in front of the kitty, arms spread out. "You'll have to go through me!"

“Hmmm. Only a fool kicks a tiger,” the Chinese man decided, craning his neck to eye the cat behind her.

She eyed him back, then tilted her li’l nose up.

“Unpleasant creatures,” Mao Zhilong sniffed, tiltin’ his own face up in the exact same way.

Hae glared at him, but he kept his hands in his sleeves and his feet on the ground. So did Korea.

Satisfied her new friend wasn’t goin’ to get punted like Pyo’s football, Hae clasped her hands in front of her waist. She thought she knew what the answer was, but…

She batted her eyelashes at her Countryhuman. “Korea?”

“No,” he said immediately. “You aren’t bringing the cat back to the bunker.”

“But she’s lonely!”

“It’s a cat. They don’t get lonely.”

“Everyone gets lonely,” Hae fought. “Look!”

They both looked at the cat. She lifted her leg to wash her privates. Despite what she saw, Hae decided she was still a girl cat.

“You aren’t bringing it back,” Korea said flatly. “I didn’t let you waste your rations on that mutt, I’m not letting you waste them on a cat.”

“Cats don’t need people to feed ‘em,” Hae told him, frowning as he insulted Ppang. “Remember Comrade Du-soon’s cat? He kept him at the Secret Camp, and he never had to feed him.”

Son Du-soon had found the mackerel cat as a kitten in a village the Japanese had run everyone out of. His mama and everyone else had been cut open, like Du-soon’s own family. He’d brought him back to camp and raised him on broth and pig milk until he was big enough to mouse. He used to walk around with him on his shoulder, even going up and down the mountain. Korea always told him he should throw it away, but he said he was a special Japanese-fightin' cat, and they needed him to protect the granary. The only time she'd ever seen the man feed him was when the cat would bring a fish back. Then he'd fry it up and save a bit of meat for him as a reward.

"So she can feed herself," Hae said, gesturin' at her yellow cat. "She could even keep all the mice away from the bunker so we don't have to!"

She didn't like killing the rodents much. She already felt bad about the good bugs.

"We keep the mice away so we don't get sick," Korea growled. "The point of that is negated if the cat gets us sick."

"But she's not-"

"South Hwanghae." His voice hardened as he glared at her from under his spiky lashes. "Go hand it over to the rail workers."

Hae went cold. She knew what they'd do to her. The same thing everyone knew to do with strays right now.

She looked down, swingin' her shoulders side to side. "…Do ah have to? Can ah just let her go?"

"And if it does get sick the next time Americans drop fleas on the city?" Korea asked coolly. "Are you prepared for the blood of anyone it infects to be on your hands?"

"…No," Hae admitted.

That was why she didn't want to hand over the cat to anyone. Then her blood would be on her hands. Even if she didn't do it herself, the critter wouldn't understand why she'd been so nice to her, just to hand her over to someone that would dash her on the ground or use one of the railway spikes on her. She'd blame Hae and wonder why she'd betrayed her, and she din't like thinking about that.

She yelped as Korea grabbed her by the arm, dragging her over to the wreck of the canteen. He let go to glare at her, jaw working.

"Korea," Hae ventured, her finger burns hurtin' from how hard she was clasping them. "Are you goin' to make me kill her?"

He stared at her a few seconds longer. Then asked in a low voice, "If I told you to, would you?"

Hae looked over at the cat still sittin' in the mud, delicately washing its paws while exchanging snooty looks with Mao Zhilong.

"…Ayuh," she said quietly, hanging her head.

Even if the cat was cute, it was still just a cat. Hae didn't want anyone to get sick 'cuz she was too weak to do what everyone in the villages hit by germ bombs had already done. She knew what it meant when they visited Pong-ju's hometown and his sister said all the cats and dogs were gone now. It made her happy 'cuz it meant everyone was workin' together to keep each other safe. So if she wasn't willing to do it herself, that meant she was a coward. If Korea told her that, she knew it would be part of the ninety percent of the time he was right.

Korea stared at her in silence. Hae couldn't help but shrink in on herself.

"I'm not going to make you kill it," he said eventually, makin' her slump in relief. "But you are going to return it to the place you found it."

"Thank you, Korea." Hae made sure to sound grateful. It was better than havin' to kill her herself, or hand her over to know she might as well have.

Just 'cuz she would do it if he told her to, didn't mean she wanted to.

Korea's lip twitched, showin' a fang in a li'l grimace, and he walked by her without another word.

Hae trudged after him.

Back at the tracks, she scooped the cat up, being careful to hold her far enough away from her body that Korea didn't look panicked, even though he still tensed.

"Go put that thing back, then carry on to the bunker," Korea ordered, makin' sure Man-won and Pong-ju heard, too. "I have something I need to do."

"Yes, Korea." Hae tried not to sound glum. "Can ah get Hwang to come with me so we can work on the ri course stuff?"

She'd been excited at the idea of havin' someone there with her. Now that she couldn't take the cat, thinking about the bunker made it seem even darker and lonelier.

And she might've been too squishy just now. She didn't want Korea to start thinking that mergin' her with Hwang might get rid of that.

He filled her with relief by nodding. "I'll find someone to-"

He cut himself off, jerking over, his voice tense all of a sudden. "What? What is it?"

Mao Zhilong had straightened up, his head swivelling around. It made Hae giggle a li'l. That with what Korea had said made it seem like he was a huntin' dog.

But her amusement died almost right away. She could see the Chinese man's eyes under his scarf, and they were alert and serious. And it was never good when Mao Zhilong looked serious.

He spun south, gazing across the ruins of the slaughterhouse and the warehouse district, up at the sky. Hae's heart sunk as she followed his look.

She couldn't see anything but slate clouds and rain. But Korea was looking too, and he didn't tell Mao Zhilong to stop screwin' around. His eye darted over the horizon, searching.

"Small wing incoming," Mao Zhilong said after a few moments. "There."

He pointed a gloved finger, and Hae followed it to see a few specks on the horizon, the tiniest li'l ring spots on the clouds.

Korea was so tense his muscles were quivering. “Another fake nuclear run?”

Hae swallowed. Those were bad, the way the TNT bombs roared like monsters as they took out entire blocks. But they were better than a real nuclear bomb.

And they couldn’t tell whether they were real or not until they hit.

Thankfully Mao Zhilong said, “No. Mostly fighters, a few light bombers.”

Hae’s insides went watery in relief. She didn’t know how he could tell that’s what the li’l dots were, but she believed him. He had real good vision- he’d even managed to tell her what kind of hawk was circlin’ high in the sky one day, and when it came down to roost, he’d been right.

Korea *‘tch’*ed, more annoyed than stiff now. “More leaflets.”

“Maybe a bomb or two if we’re unlucky,” Mao Zhilong agreed. “The regular kind. Even with this weather, it’s too bright out for a germ bomb.”

That was good. Hae cuddled the cat close.

The air raid alarms went off, but that happened a lot. Pyongyang hadn’t been hit with any huge bombing runs in a couple months, but they had to alert even if just a few recon planes came by, just in case. They could still strafe people with their guns, and did. The last-last time Hae had been in Sariwon with Hwang, they’d seen a group of peasant women get taken into a field hospital after a Yankee pilot had shot them up while they were washin’ clothes by the river. One hadn’t made it.

But a few light bombers weren’t enough to make Korea run for cover. He took them over to the rail line workers to make sure they were ready to man their anti-aircraft guns or take shelter.

While they worked their way down the tracks, the drone grew louder until the planes were circling over the city. Their bellies opened up, sending papers spiralling from their insides in streams, or dropping packages that burst open halfway down, scatterin' them everywhere, the same way they scattered the fleas and flies.

Anger surged in Hae, imaginin' the kind of stupid lies 'Merica had filled them with. She hated to think anyone would read the choppy Korean on them and believe it.

The planes didn't stay long. They just added their toxic snow to the rain already coming down, then wheeled away.

Hae bounced in place, looking at Korea as he curled his lip, watching the final leaflets drift down over the distant buildings.

"Fine," he huffed, catching her look. "You can come pick them up."

"Ura!"

Hae loved picking up the Yankee pamphlets and murderin' 'em. Reading the lies they were spewing about them made her mad, but she didn't have to read them. She just had to tear them into shreds and light them on fire so no one else could.

"But you rest all day today and tomorrow," Korea ordered.

That was okay! She would have Hwang to keep her company, and it might not be so gross out, so they could sit outside to work.

"And drop the cat."

Hae pouted, but set her on the ground, pettin' her li'l yellow head one last time. The cat yawned.

She went to take her gloves off, but decided to keep them on. The Yankees wouldn't be bold enough to drop infected insects in broad daylight, but they had dropped blankets and stuff before that'd made people sick. She knew they did the same with leaflets.

"We'll go clean up the warehouse district," Korea said, marching past them, eyeing the cat as he did. “It’s busy today.”

Since Pyongyang hadn’t been getting too bombed lately (not countin’ the transformer attacks and a few rail line strikes), they’d had time to build more underground ammunition dumps and warehouses hidden around the rubble. Which meant lots of workers to man them.

Hae skipped after him, not bothered by the warm rain anymore. It would just help dissolve the miguk-noms' filth before anyone could read it.

As soon as they stepped out of the ruins of the residential district and were able to see the rail lines of the marshaling yard splayed out over the gap between it and the warehouse district, Hae froze, the hairs on her arms shootin’ up like soldiers caught slacking.

Workers were hurrying back and forth around them, carrying crates and cases inside as they shouted at each other. But it wasn’t the happy hurry of people doing their jobs or the exhausted one of the workers earlier, the one too many were doin’ lately. There was a tension in the air that made Hae’s stomach twist.

“Somethin’s wrong,” she said at the same time Korea did.

A man in a railway uniform saw them standing across the tracks and sprinted over, a stack of pamphlets in hand.

“Comrade Korea!” he cried.

“Leaflets aren’t supposed to be touched,” Korea said, voice tight. “They could be infected. You need to burn them.”

“I know,” the man said, panting. “But-“

He thrust one at Korea and he snatched it, eye flicking across the paper. Hae saw his jaw lock.

“Air raid incoming,” he said grimly. “Large.”

Hae caught a glimpse of the words on the paper. ‘-CITIZENS EVACUATE. PYONGYANG WILL BE BOMBED BY THE US AIR FORCE. THE COMMUNIST REGIME IS OUR TARGET, NOT YOU. AMERICA WANTS YOU TO EVACUATE SO YOU MAY LIVE. YOU HAVE-'

Cold and hot flashed through her. Fear for their people, but also fury. Their Supreme People's Assembly wasn't even in the city! The Yankees were just goin' to bomb the warehouses and the factories and the train cars lined up in the marshaling yard again, and everyone that worked at 'em the same way they always did, then say they were Communists so they deserved it.

They were Communists, or they at least loved Korea, which meant to someone stupid like 'Merica they were the exact same thing. He didn't want any of them to get away, and he knew they couldn't. There was nowhere to go that wasn't the mountains in the rain, and it'd take an entire day to evacuate Pyongyang, even with just a few thousand essential people left in it.

He wanted to kill them all. He just wanted to look good while doin' it.

Hae tore the pamphlet out of Korea's hands, ripping it into tiny pieces and throwing it on the ground, grinding the scraps into the mud until they drowned it in.

'Stupid thick-faced Yankee.' Hundreds of people wouldn't even see these stupid leaflets or know to evacuate if they weren't told by the Party and People's Committee cells in charge of evacuations.

The cold won out in Hae's stomach.

The power was out. The radio stations were down. Communications were down.

"Korea-"

"I know." He raised his voice, shoutin' loud enough to be heard over the clamour. "Pyongyang is going to be bombed! Get all essential supplies hidden and make sure the supply dumps are camouflaged- don't let the enemy claim even one more warehouse!"

Hae could see it in his face, just for a second. He knew they would.

Korea gazed at the railcars as the workers pushed them along the tracks, tryin' to get them away from the marshaling yard which would be bombed for sure. His jaw pulsed.

"Sound the air raid alarm and spread the news!" he ordered their comrades. "Make sure any civilians know to evacuate to the bomb shelters! Remain calm- we have dealt with this before."

Almost every day for over two years.

"Long live Korea!" the workers all called, the ones with free hands throwin' their fists in the air to show them they heard him.

Korea's eye flickered. "Long live the Korean people."

To them he ordered, "Move out," spinning around. "Comrades Kim Man-won and Kim Pong-ju- get South Hwanghae and Mao Zhilong to Jonsung complex."

"Well that's not happening," Mao Zhilong said, and Hae agreed, jogging after him.

"Ah'll help raise the alarm, Korea."

"We don't have time to argue!" he snapped, leaping over rubble.

Mao Zhilong followed easily. "So it looks like you don't have time to stop us. I'll carry the news along the warehouse district, you get to your broadcasting station and see if you can get the word out."

Korea bared his teeth, looking between them. Then, "Keep her safe," he ordered Hae's guards before sprinting away.

"Meet up at Taedongmun in two hours or when the planes come!" he called back before he disappeared into the ruined streets.

Hae's heart skipped. 'Meet up' not 'meet me.'

"Don't worry, Little Tiger," Mao Zhilong said, flicking his long sleeve at her as he buttoned it up. "I'll make sure he gets back to you. Go cover the northwest in the meantime."

He took off before she could say anythin', off in the opposite direction, deeper into the warehouse district.

Trumpets blasted from across the city, more takin' up the call, joined by bells and whistles, all of 'em clamouring to tell everyone that the Yankees planes were coming to kill them again.

Hae took a deep breath, then put her shoulders back.

"C'mon," she ordered her guards in her best general voice. "Let's go evacuate folks."

For over an hour she ran all over Pyongyang, from Stalin Street to the Pothong, all through the crumbling school district and the cattle market, even clambering over the completely destroyed city center just in case people were sheltering there thinking it was too messed up to hit again, screamin' herself hoarse as she warned anyone listening to get to the air raid shelters.

The broadcasting system never came on, just like it hadn't for the past two weeks. But from the sudden amount of people on the more main streets, Hae thought the Party and People's Committee in Jonsung had got word and come down to help. And from all the ones she knew were civilians that were helpin' the militia herd other folks out of the city and into the shelters, she thought Korea had been rounding up volunteers.

With them helping, Hae left the cleared main roads and went to the places she hadn't seen pamphlets fall over, her shouting bringin' people out of the woodwork. Some of 'em took off for the nearest shelter, but the others hunkered down in place, ducking into their dug-outs buried under piles of rubble and earth, hoping it would be enough to keep them safe.

She didn't bother looking at the sky. She couldn't stop the deathbirds from comin'. Man-won and Pong-ju would drag her to safety as soon as they saw anything.

'Safety!' Hae turned on a heel and shot off towards the old Quarantine Hospital again, even though she knew the workers would've already heard from their comrades down the line.

A handcart flew by as she sprinted across the tracks, the men on it pumpin' away to get it and all the building supplies on it out of the city to cover. Hae flew past the crumbled walls, almost falling on her face as she slid to a halt in the slippery mud, barely keeping her balance.

"Comrade!" she called, and the peasant woman she'd seen before peeked out of her hole, still there like she'd been worried about, her eyes wide and frightened.

"Are the planes coming?" she asked in a wavering voice.

"Ayuh," Hae panted, hand over her side. She could feel blood soakin' the bandages there, hotter than the rain. "Ah'll take you to the City Hall shelter. Come on!"

But she shied away from her hand like the cat earlier. "M-My husband's at the rail bridge. What if he can't find me after?"

"You can come back here once the bombin's over," Hae told her, trying not to hop from foot to foot as her skin burned.

"We aren't near any important rail junctions," the woman said, tugging on her bun. "We haven't got hit here yet. S-Surely…"

Her eyes shone fearfully as she shrank back in the hole.

She was afraid. Which meant Hae needed to be the opposite of that, the way Korea was.

She made her shoulders relax, leaning up so she wasn't blocking the dug-out, putting her hands on her hips and a smile on her face, hopin' the lady couldn't see the blood soaking through her clothes yet.

"You could be safe," she told her. "But ah don't want to risk it. You're too close to the river crossin'. The Yankees say they're goin' to be hittin' us hard, and they don't know how to aim for things that aren't people."

The woman still hesitated.

“And ah’ll make sure you find your husband after,” the province added, trying to sound like there was no way she could fail, the way Korea did.

She knew he’d let her cancel her rest day if it was for somethin’ like that.

Before the woman could say anything, Kim Man-won said, “Comrade Hae.”

His voice was tense. Hae’s stomach twisted into knots, but she kept her smile up, holdin’ out her hand.

The woman’s lip quivered, then firmed, and she nodded. “Alright. But my things-"

Hae didn’t wait for her to finish, sliding into the hole and helpin’ her lay her few clothes an’ cooking supplies on a jogak-po before wrapping them up. She tried not to look like she was rushing as she helped the woman tie it to her back, then gave her a hand out of the hole.

“Bunker time!” she chirped, not looking at the southern sky.

The lady did. Her face went pale.

As they hurried from the wreckage of the hospital, Hae caught a glimpse of yellow waiting by the broken gate. Without stopping, she scooped it up, wedgin’ it under her arm as she ran, leading the woman for the City Hall shelter, passing her off to a Party member already in there and getting her name, promisin’ that if her husband didn’t find her, she would.

Then she took off, heading west around the City Hall so she wouldn’t get stuck in the rubble on the riverside streets, still shoutin’, trying to warn anyone else about what was about to happen.

But if they couldn’t hear her, they could hear the planes. That distant droning buzz rumblin’ on the horizon, getting closer.

Hae’s legs burned as she sprinted through the city, trying to reach the meeting spot before they got here. The torn skin on the back of her thighs chafed raw under her bandages, sending sparks of pain through her legs, and the stitch in her side wasn't in her innards where it was supposed to be, but outside. Every time her body flexed as she took a corner or vaulted over a pile of rubble, sharp heat tore though her belly and chest.

But she didn't stop running. Korea would be disappointed if Man-won had to carry her, and she knew if he was at the meeting spot and she wasn't, he would come looking for her. She didn't want him to be the reason he made another wrong decision.

Hae burst from the narrow streets and took a sharp left onto Stalin Street, gainin' speed on the open road. People were streaming in the same direction, carrying supplies on their backs as they tried to flee the city. Hae called to them to be safe as she dodged in and out of the crowd, reassurin' them that everything would be fine and they could come back soon, trying not to gasp the words out.

Her boots thumped on the parts of the tram tracks that hadn't been bombed or salvaged as she passed the old bank, the blackened skeleton of the library, the husk of Choguksa Temple, before she finally saw the road to Taedongmun, and the charred gate towerin' over the rubble around it.

As she veered onto the side street, her heart pounded like her feet.

'C'mon Korea-'

He was there! Pacin' in the open area like a tiger, arguing with Mao Zhilong. The moment he saw her, he pounced.

"Where were you?!" he snapped as she screeched to a halt, his eye arrowing for what was in her arms. "You better not have gone back for that damn cat."

Hae gasped for breath, unable to talk 'cuz she'd been yelling so much.

"We went back for a civilian," Pong-ju assured him, pantin' too. "Had to get her to the City Hall."

Hae nodded and Korea opened his mouth when Mao Zhilong said, “Here they come.”

Hae finally looked back at the sky.

A hundred black dots lined the horizon like a swarm of bees taking flight after their apiary had been shaken, their buzzin’ growing louder than the rain as they swept over the southern plains. The sky was only getting darker, but she knew what they really were. Not bees, but a whole flock of deathbirds, coming north like they had two weeks ago.

There were a lot of them. Enough that no one moved, eyes fixed forward, all dreading the exact same thing.

‘Pleasepleasepleasepleaseplease.’ They’d already been retargeting their other power plants after they started fixin’ them and Pyobu and the others said power was almost back on and ‘Merica couldn’t be doin’ this again so soon.

Hae pressed closer to Korea, crushing the cat to her chest as Man-won and Pong-ju drew closer to her, rifles drawn like they could do anything against the incoming swarm.

They all stood still, rain pouring down around them as the drone grew louder. Hae looked up at Korea, seekin’ comfort.

But he just looked blank, his lips and face slack as he stared out at the heavy grey sky. And his eye-

Hae quickly looked away, pressing closer, hopin’ he could feel her warmth through the muggy rain.

When Mao Zhilong spoke it almost made her jump.

“If they were veering for the coast, they would’ve by now” he said, taking a step back. “They’re all coming this way.”

It was an awful way to feel. Hae din’t want to feel it. Not when it was Friday so the kids would be stuck at school, missin’ their parents, not knowing if they would be there to pick them up tomorrow or ever again. Not when there was no way their warehouse workers had been able to get everything to safety. Not when they were standing next to one of the few landmarks in Pyongyang that hadn't been bombed to the ground yet, in the open.

But she was relieved. It wasn't the dam. It wasn't their power that everyone had been workin' so hard to fix.

It was just everything else.

The same guilty relief flooded Korea's eye before it was shuttered by his General look, his spine going straight and his shoulders squaring, that look that made Hae's stomach churn leaving his face.

"Run," he ordered, then took off for Moran Hill.

Hae didn't need to be told twice.

Behind them, the deathbirds came in for the kill.

China: I dislike cats. They're arrogant, never listen to what they're told, have no sense of personal boundaries, and think the world belongs to them.

North and Hae: …

My beautiful aerial map of Pyongyang made by the American Army in 1946 where it shows they were conducting active reconnaissance and were already interested in things like gasoline storage, water tank locations, mining supply locations, and army arsenal warehouses. <3 And I also can't post here because the resolution is insane for me to be able to read it.

Love when American sources go 'and the super benevolent American army told the Korean civilians to leave the city before bombing it, how nice of us!' As if warning people you're about to obliterate their houses and places of work before doing it, making them homeless, jobless, and with no supplies is so heroic. You'll notice Israel does the same thing in Palestine. 'We warned them they were about to annihilate their entire residential block! You can't get mad. ><' As if it's really simple to pick up and leave your home when a war is going on, transit passes are required due to the war, and you have no money, also due to the war.

Also ‘She needed to be there when he confronted the Southern One.’ She was… (Warring Pyongyang)

Assurances, Believed And Not

The drone of the jets got closer and closer, until Hae couldn't hear her own boots on the ground anymore. She kept her eyes on Korea's back, refusin to look over her shoulder. The cat struggled in her arms, smellin' the fear around them, but she didn't let go, not wanting her to run off into the city and get killed by a bomb.

The park, the lumber yard, the drone getting louder, buzzin' in her skull.

"Korea-"

"Keep running," he ordered.

The northern market, cratered and empty, the wreckage of the riverside warehouses, explosions behind them, the orphanage, Moran Hill looming too far up ahead.

The drone separated into distinct sources, louder than the bombs over the south of the city, reverberatin' off the clouds like they were trapped in a dome.

"Hate to point out the obvious, but we aren't going to make it!" Mao Zhilong called just as the ground shook under Hae's feet.

Bombs slammed into the warehouses they'd just passed, plumes of fire and smoke bursting into the air with an roar.

"They're empty!" Hae hollered up at the clouds as a fleet of bombers screamed past. "They've been empty since the first time you bombed them!"

She couldn't even hear her own words, drowned out by the ringin' in her head and the planes in the sky.

Korea cursed as the jets went shooting over Moran Hill, more bombs cascadin' over it.

“Cover!” he shouted, screaming the word loud enough to make it through the ringing as the deathbirds reeled back around.

He veered off the street, leading them for the cluster of buildings that used to stand at the foot of the hill. Hae followed, makin’ sure not to lag behind. Above them the fighter-bombers sprayed the hill with their machine guns as the anti-aircraft teams stationed in the crags targeted them, metal slugs pingin’ off metal wings, some of them falling back down to earth like painful raindrops.

The ground shook as the hillside in front of them erupted in fire, and Hae went reeling forward, almost falling. Pong-ju just caught her on his way by, hauling her up by the arm and pulling her forward.

She’d tried to shoot out her arms to catch herself out of reflex, letting go of the cat. She twisted in mid-air, hitting the ground.

“Wait!” Hae called in alarm, but her guard didn’t listen and she had no choice but to keep runnin’ so she wouldn’t slow him down.

They reached the destroyed buildings, Korea ushering them into one of the dug-outs that peppered the base of the hill like worm holes in an apple so the anti-aircraft units had somewhere to go when the bombing forced them to scatter.

The hill shuddered, debris rainin’ down on him, but Korea didn’t flinch, unslinging his Type 49 and gesturing them in. Mao Zhilong slid into the hole, followed by Pong-ju shoving in Hae.

Hae had just popped up when Korea spun around in a way she knew way too well meant he was about to take off.

“Korea, where are you goin’?” she called as dirt showered down through the ceiling of wooden planks.

“Up to join the gunners. Stay here.”

The ground around them shook and shuddered and Hae didn’t have time to think before she shouted, “Grab him!”

Pong-ju froze, eyes darting between her and their Countryhuman like his brain was short-circuitin', but Man-won moved on instinct at her order, leaping from the hole and wrapping his arms around Korea. He thrashed furiously, but the man used his bigger size to muscle him in, takin' advantage of Korea not actually trying to hurt him.

"What the fuck was that?!" Korea spat as he tore free, forced to crouch like the rest of them by the cramped hole, like a tiger about to attack.

Hae cringed, knowin' he was real mad if he as willing to cuss at one of their people, and Man-won immediately dropped to his knees and slammed his forehead into the damp ground.

"I'm so sorry, Comrade Korea! You gave me orders to obey Comrade's Hae's commands-"

"Not when it comes to me!"

"Korea, ya can't take off!" Hae protested. "The hill's under fire and there's no cover left, you'll get-"

The dug-out trembled again as an explosion roared over her, close enough she could see shrapnel rain down outside.

"I need to join our gunners." He tried to move forward, but Mao Zhilong said, "More planes coming from the east."

They couldn't see in that direction, but quieter explosions rang out under the ones right above 'em. Hae had listened to Pyongyang being bombed enough that she knew they came from across the river.

"If the weather doesn't get worse, I think we can expect all-day sorties," Mao Zhilong continued. "And B-29 backup when the sun sets. You'll get your chance to man the guns. Perhaps after there's a break in fire and you're less likely to get blown up?"

Korea argued as the machine guns rattled outside, and Hae caught somethin' from the corner of her eye, head jerking towards the grey light coming through the hole, standing on her knees to see better. Her eyes shot open.

The cat was still where she'd dropped her, cowerin' under the shadow of a half-standing clapboard wall, pressed flat to the ground, her thin tail bushed out, ears flat to her head, makin' her look as earless as Hae as she looked up at the sky in terror. A fighter jet shot by high above, slugs slammin' the ground between them, and Hae din't know if the pilot had bad aim or could somehow see the cat and was awful enough to target her like she was a draught animal.

Korea was shouting at Mao Zhilong and her guards over the ruckus as they tried to convince him to wait for a break in fire.

The cat didn't even flinch as another blast roared from the hill, she was too scared. She should be getting to shelter but a cat didn't know what shelter was. She didn't know what the planes or the guns were or why people were screamin' and shoutin' or why the place she lived in was being blown up in at all.

Hae had seen Son Du-soon in Haeju on the temporary retreat, but she hadn't got to ask about his cat. He'd lived to see Liberation, but had he lived to see the war? He'd be old if he had. Had he got to go to sleep in his comrade's arms one last time, or had he been blown to pieces as bombs hit the apartment Du-soon and his wife had lived in? Or was he still alive, not knowing why Du-soon was never comin' home, why his friend had abandoned him?

Animals didn't understand stuff. The horses and oxen didn't know why they suddenly got pumped full'a holes while they were working the fields. The cats and dogs didn't know why the village people suddenly turned on them 'cuz they weren't able to understand what the Yankees were doin'. They didn't get why they weren't even eaten, why their bodies had to go to waste. Even the bugs that got dropped on them didn't know they were bein' used to kill people. The spiders and other ones that were good for getting' rid of bugs that ate the crops just wanted to help, but they got squashed and burned anyway, and they didn't know why. Just like babies din't know why they were suddenly being torn out'a their mother's arms and smashed on the ground. Just like a little girl didn't know why she'd been shoved into a hole just to be tortured.

Korea had helped her understand. But the animals never could.

Hae thought of a li'l yellow dog looking upwards and wagging his tail, not knowing he was about to die.

"South Hwanghae!"

She was already shootin' up out of the hole, sprintin' back across the open ground. Fingers grazed her ankle, but they didn't catch her in time. The ground under her feet shook, trying to buck her off balance as the bombs ate up her hearing again, but she kept going, straight for the cat.

"Stay!" she heard Korea shout dimly as a drone made its way through the high-pitched ringin' in her head.

She'd almost made it when someone slammed into her at the waist, sending her smashing to the ground. Clods of dirt went flyin', rapid dull impacts as the deathbirds' machine guns strafed the ruins.

Hae barely noticed. She'd been about to jump for the cat when she was hit, and the impact had sent her sprawling, straight into it, onto it. She still couldn't hear anything but ringin' and dim explosions, but she could feel the animal struggling under her, and felt the snap as she came down. She tried to sit up to see if it was okay, but Korea was on top of her, pressing her into the wall as the bullets rained down.

She hadn't wanted him to follow her! She didn't want him to get shot 'cuz of a cat! She should've known he would, but she'd wanted to save her and now she'd just hurt her and put Korea in danger-

He was screaming something at her but she couldn't hear it. She could only flatten herself against him, trying not to hurt the cat more and hopin' he wasn't going to get shot 'cuz of her.

Suddenly the vibrations of the bullets stopped and Hae was being hauled up, dragged for the dug-out. She kept her grip on the squirming cat as Korea hauled her forward. Up above she could see the fiery plumes of rockets shooting for the planes, drivin' them back for a second, just enough time for Korea to toss her into the hole like a sack of rice, sliding in after her.

Hae rolled, trying to cushion the cat. She hadn't gone deaf like Gang, the ringin' was fading, letting her hear her yowling, an awful pained wail that reminded her of Sincheon, and Korea shouting at her.

"You fucking idiot!" he snapped, eye blazin'. "You want to get yourself killed over a fucking animal?!"

"Ah'm sorry!" Hae cried to him and the cat still writhing in her arms, her back leg hung at an awkward angle, her howling filling the hole, stabbing at her 'ears' as she tried to hold her without hurting her, only making her scream louder and her eyes fill with tears. "Ah din't mean to, ah'm sorry!"

"You would be if you got us both shot!"

His hand locked on the back of her neck, trying to drag her away from the cat, and Hae wanted to tell him to stop 'cuz he'd be upset after that her guards were seein' how much she'd scared him but the cat was still screamin' an' thrashin' an' the guns were firing outside and it was too loud-

"Shut it up!" Korea snarled, other hand reaching for the cat as Hae tried to huddle around it, tried to keep it safe.

It was suddenly torn from her, not by Korea but by Mao Zhilong. He pinned it to the floor of the shelter by its throat and Hae cried out, thinking he was going to break its neck.

But he dug his fingers in behind its jaw, forcing its mouth open as it hissed and spat, and he pulled somethin' out of his other sleeve, shoving it into its maw and closing her muzzle, holding his hand over her face until she stopped moving, goin' limp.

"You killed her?!" Hae cried, breaking free from Korea to scrabble over.

"Put it to sleep," Mao Zhilong corrected, and her heart soared as she grabbed her and felt her li'l heart hammerin' in her thin chest, starting to slow.

Hae sighed in relief, cradlin' the hurt cat in her arms, before yelping as Korea seized her by the shoulder again.

"You-!"

Fire cut him off, an explosion of heat blastin' from the entrance as they were all sent slamming into the back wall, a wave of mud and dirt washing in as a bomb went off way too close. Hae couldn't sit up at first, dazed from the force, just managing to cling to the cat so Korea wouldn't throw her outside to die. She didn't have any time to recover before she was being shoved into the corner, her head bumpin' Mao Zhilong's as Korea pulled them into him, hunching over them on his knees.

She knew what he was doin', but his arm was around her too tight to fight off. The only thing that made her stop trying was Man-won and Pong-ju managing to escape him, putting themselves between his back and the exit.

The ringin' was back but she was sure he was yelling at them, even though they were just doing their jobs and probably couldn't hear him either. She could feel the vibrations of his voice through his chest, then the way it cut off as the dug-out rocked again, dirt raining from the ceiling, more heat comin' in from outside.

The shelter wasn't sturdy, It was just a hole with planks and rubble covered in packed dirt, and the bombs had cracked open underground warehouses before. If one hit them dead on it would collapse, mud and stuff caving in on them, buryin' them alive in the cold damp dark, unable to breathe.

Hae stopped squirming, curling over the cat the way Korea was curled over her and Mao Zhilong, pressing her head to his chest as she leaned into him, squeezing her eyes shut as another wave of force roared into them, smashing her guards back into Korea, and her into the wall.

Korea had stopped yelling, all she could feel was the thump of his heart against her skull, poundin' like the cat's had been, like it was trying to smash his ribs and break out. Hae tried to focus on it and nothin' else, not the ringin' or the dronin' or the dirt shaking over their heads, threatening to crush them, drowning it all in the sloshing of her country's heartbeat.

It almost worked.

Finally an explosion loud enough to beat through her murdered eardrums rocked the world outside, and the shaking stopped.

Hae tentatively opened her eyes, still crushed to Korea's chest, not able to see anything except the green-brown of his uniform and Mao Zhilong's grey and white scarf. Korea's arm pressed tighter around her, then he pushed her away, leaning back.

For a second his eye was as big as hers. Then it narrowed again.

"Ssi-bal," was all he said, turning to make sure Hae's guards were alright.

They were. All muddy and sooty, and Pong-ju was slappin' his hand on his ear, but alright. Hae sagged in relief.

Mao Zhilong sat up, fixin' his scarf and rubbing his head. Korea had shoved him away so hard he'd knocked it off the wall.

Bombs were still falling outside, but a li'l farther away. The bombers had moved up the hill to get whoever had shot down the plane Hae could see sending smoke up from down the river.

"Ah'm sorry, Korea," she panted, too loud. Her head was still filled with noise.

He glared at her, barin' his teeth, but then *'tch'*ed, looking away. Hae held the limp cat closer, guilty as she saw its broken leg again.

Korea rose to his feet, swayin' a li'l. Hae tried to grab him, but her legs were shaking too much.

"Comrade Korea," Man-won coughed. "Don't go out yet. Wait 'til they've left to refuel."

Korea stared at him, a muscle in his cheek jumpin' as he hunched slightly. Hae knew that look, but din't realize what was wrong until Mao Zhilong repeated the man's words louder.

“The next wave will just come,” Korea growled, staggering for the half-collapsed exit as he shook his head. “Whoever shot down that plane drew fire for us. I need to-“ His jaw locked down for just a second. “Help.”

“Their main targets are your warehouses and quarries,” Mao Zhilong said, loud enough Hae could hear him perfectly. “They’ll concentrate fire on the other side of the hill soon. You won’t have to wait long.”

Korea looked out at the scrap of sky outside the dug-out, dozens and dozens of jets and bombers spinnin’ over the south of the city like sick birds.

“If you go ah go, Korea,” Hae said, tryin’ to make her voice sound steady.

Her Countryhuman looked back at her. Hae saw his fist clench, blood soakin’ the bandaged palm red, but didn’t look right at it.

Another bomb shook the hill outside, and rocks an’ grit rained down on the rubble on top of their hole.

Korea didn’t say anything, just moved back to the wall, sitting down and pressing his back to it, keepin’ his spine straight as he fixed his eye on the outside.

Relieved, Hae crawled over to him. It was really too small in here, so he couldn’t complain when she snuggled up to his side. Even if he eyed her cat comrade in a way she didn’t really like. But he didn’t complain that she was holdin’ her to her chest. He did complain when Mao Zhilong slid up on his other side, even though he wasn’t touching him, but it didn’t stop the other guy.

Man-won and Pong-ju settled in front of them with their submachine guns on their laps, keepin’ her and Korea safe. Hae felt bad doing that to them, but she knew it was why she had guards in the first place. So she wouldn’t get kidnapped or bombed.

Even if when they actually went to do what they were supposed to, Korea told them to ‘stay.’

Outside the hole, Pyongyang burned. Bombs rained over the city, aimin' for anything the Yankees thought was a warehouse or a supply dump or just anything that could hide anything. The radio station, the debris in the city center, the City Hall.

Hae wished the sky would open up and douse them all with water, a big ol' flood like the ones that used to come from the Pothong to wash the planes down and stop them. But the rain just kept lightly fallin', enough to make everything grey and gross, but not enough to stop the deathbirds.

Shouting came from Moran Hill as the gun positions were struck again, and clouds of smoke billowed over the marshaling yard as the jets swept by, sleek and silver and deadly.

Hae didn't want to think about the people they'd seen there, the man with the stubble she'd seen balancing too many bags of grain as he carried them underground, the boys loading tools into carts, nervous but laughing as they kept joking with each other, the crew pullin' tarps over broken vehicles to try and keep them safe. The man that'd handed them the warning. She didn't want to think about how many of them were scared and hurtin' right now, or already dead.

But she had to.

A fireball bloomed over the warehouse district with an explosion they could feel from across the city, and Hae knew they'd either hit an ammunition dump or fuel storage. More detonations followed as the fires spread, fillin' the sky with an awful black smog.

She looked up at Korea. He was staring forward with a blank face, completely unmoving. Except Hae could feel his skin crawling under his uniform as it bubbled and split. It was a bad feeling, like he was full of bugs trying to eat their way out. His side throbbed against her, hot and wet. As she watched, a spot spread across it, an ugly red flower she didn't want to see bloom.

Hae pressed closer to him, covering it up.

His heart was still beatin' hard. She could feel it thudding against her, and where every single one of his ribs pressed into hers. As she watched, the burns crept evilly out of the bandages on his neck, slithering up the underside of his chin like venomous snakes.

Hae knew he wouldn't want her askin' while people could hear, so she waited until machine guns were strafing the hill again to whisper in his 'ear,' "Korea. We're still goin' to win, right?"

He stiffened against her, his eye still on the deathbirds and their destruction.

"Yes," he said after a moment, loud enough for the others to hear and as confident as ever.

Hae relaxed, smilin' again as she snuggled into his side.

She knew they were. Either they'd win through an armistice and forcing 'Merica to hand their comrades back and agree to end the war for real, or he'd keep screwin' around and launch the offensive Korea said he was planning, and then they'd fight him off and march south again to put him down for good. Like Korea an' the Gen'ral said at the meeting of the Political Committee, they were prepared to win the ultimate victory.

She'd just needed to hear it from him again so her legs would stop shaking. She knew Korea would never lie to her, not about something that important. If he said they were goin' to win, then they were goin' to win.

And even if he could be wrong sometimes…

Hae shifted her cat in her arms, resting her head on the wall in a way that just so happened to leave it half-resting on Korea's shoulder as they watched Pyongyang burn and burn an' burn.

She chose to believe in that ninety percent.

—

The bombings went into the night, like China had predicted and North had known they would. All day, from noon to evening, the light bombers flew in from the south and east, sent from the airfields in Gyeonggi and Gangwon, and the aircraft carriers off the coast of Wonsan. Waves upon waves of Shooting Stars and Sabres and Tornados whirling above Pyongyang in a silver storm, only hidden once the sun set.

And then the heavy bombers came, the B-29s and their nightfighters, spilling from the belly of the bulky carrier planes like piglets being torn out of a sow's slashed womb, strafing the heights where their anti-aircraft positions were, and the hills across the city where their fuel storage was, and the fields where their civilians had fled while the bombers rained destruction on the marshaling yard and the vehicle repair shops and the military headquarters and anything but Taedongmun because they needed that to locate where they were over the city because they'd razed everything else to the ground.

Bomb after bomb after bomb after bomb, each one shuddering through North's body, burning deeper than before, eating up his skin and flesh, sending a violent searing agony though every inch of his body until it was all he could do to cling to the machine gun he didn't remember taking control of and keep aiming at the things hurting him and killing his people.

High whistles and shrieks pierced the night, wailing over the roars of the jets as rockets and shells arced into the sky, sometimes finding a wing or a fuel tank, but more often soaring into the darkness to disappear. But the bombs never missed. Even when they didn't hit their target, they still hit something. A dug-out, a street, a person. Their own planes weren't enough, even the ones that managed to take off from Sunchon airfield, and the MiGs from the Chongchon. They couldn't trust that this raid wasn't just a distraction to draw them in and leave the Supung vulnerable so America could deliver a fatal blow to it.

Not now. Not when they were so close to fixing the power. Even if they could survive without electricity for longer, morale wouldn't survive that.

So the handful of MiGs they had spun and soared between the bulkier aircraft, leading their Sabres on chases and waylaying the B-29s, keeping them from hitting their targets for as many minutes as they could. But the only casualties they caused were fighters, too overwhelmed to get to the heavy bombers. And the moment they were driven off, the beasts lumbered in to finish off the rail bridge or the residential district.

Hour after hour, blurring together into smoke and flame and scorched flesh and pain and pain and pain as North ran from position to position, joining his soldiers in firing up at the planes until they ran out of ammo or their guns were turned into scraps of hot metal.

It should have felt relieving to have a weapon back in his hands, the recoil of a heavy machine gun rattling through him and the blast of a 100mm air defense gun shaking his bones as he blew a Shooting Star out of the sky, to be able to keep at least one of America's butchers from going home.

But it wasn't. It wasn't enough. One wasn't enough when there were hundreds more, when each of them flew dozen of sorties, when even the death spirals ended in explosions of fire that took out another city street and crawled farther up his chin. When the deathbirds and their pilots were just out of reach, taunting them from above as they pinned them down, able to do whatever they wanted to them but utterly untouchable themselves.

It itched in his skin and burned in his blood, beating behind his temples with an overwhelming pressure, locking his teeth together and his hands around the machine gun as he fired and fired, barely aware of the person feeding the cartridge belt through the gun and pouring their canteens on it when it started to burn him from the outside too.

Another F-86 plummeted from the sky as it tried to strafe them, North's bullets peppering its wings, sending it into a wild spiral over the river, smashing into another plane, both of them crashing to the ground with a plume of fire and he couldn't even feel any satisfaction because it was overwhelmed by the feeling of the gash in his torso splitting open wider.

A B-29 and its escorts flew high overhead, too high for him to hit, but he fired anyway, trying to make them see him, to turn away from their targets. He wanted them to hit him, to put a slug in his leg or bomb shrapnel in his side, something foreign he could tear out to stop the urge to claw at his own body as it melted.

But they didn't care about him, and more fiery flowers bloomed over the warehouse district, explosion after explosion that North tried to match with bullets, firing and firing and firing and firing and-

"-empty."

Not empty. He was filled with an awful aching pressure that wouldn't fade no matter what he did, no matter how many planes he knocked out of the sky or pilots died in the explosions they'd intended for his people. He was filled to the brim and he couldn't spill.

"-empty. Comrade, your gun is empty."

North was suddenly rocketed back into awareness, and he realized he'd been dry-firing the machine gun for… He didn't know how long.

But the planes were gone. The night sky above was still, and the lack of guns and bombs suddenly seemed like the deepest silence to have ever existed.

He let go of the gun, and his palms went with it. He stared dumbly at the bandages around what was left of them, melted and blackened from the heat of the firearm, melded so thoroughly with his skin he couldn't tell where one ended and the other began. His fingers wouldn't straighten or curl.

He tried to move back, but his legs were dead and he felt over, landing half on a cold body. North lay with his cheek in the chewed-up mud, staring into glazed eyes, black in the moonlight. The rest of the gun team lay scattered over the hill, and for a moment he couldn't remember if they'd been alive when he got here.

No, they had been. Three of them. Then that jet had passed and this man had thrown him aside, out of fire. Remember.

'Idiot,' North thought at him, his forehead somehow touching the dead man's now.

"Do you need help up?"

His body tried to jolt, jerking uselessly. China. He was still there.

A surge of blind panic shot through him. If he touched him, North would attack. He knew it. The pressure was still throbbing inside him and with nowhere to go, it would try to spill over on the other country.

Part of him wanted to. China was an enemy he could feel, something he could fight off.

But he wasn't an enemy, and the Korean knew he wouldn't get any release by hurting him. It would just make this itching worse.

"Stay away from me," he clipped, trying not to sound desperate.

If he felt skin on his right now, going after his comrade wouldn't be a choice.

Thankfully China didn't push, standing up. North didn't. He'd got on to his hands and knees, but didn't move more than that.

"Ssi-bal," he hissed, his voice sounding muted from his abused eardrums. "My legs are asleep."

They were. But that wasn't what was stopping him from sitting up. Even just falling back had sent fresh agony sweeping through him, his skin bursting all over.

He stayed the way he was, head pounding, panting as he tried to brace himself without making it obvious to China, trying not to shake.

Fire roared around the city, the crackling of flames and shouts as people tried to put them out. He needed to go help. He needed to get up.

His heart was beating too fast, not giving him any time to steel himself for the next wave of pain his pulse brought. He had to get to work so he could forget about it. He had to get up.

"And what about now?" China asked quietly, looking down at him. "Would you be so merciful, if you had the chance to decide our enemies' fate?"

North answered with a snarl, far too vicious, but the only thing he could do to stop his throat from making the noise it really wanted to.

He was being weak. The other country could see it. Their ammunition production had just been crippled even more, hundreds of thousands of won worth of supplies destroyed. His people needed their neighbour's aid, so he had to get up. No one wanted to help a fallen ally up if they didn't help themselves.

North gritted his teeth, focusing on the crackling of the fire, picturing how the napalm had rained down on his workers, how the bombs had burst, sending shockwaves smashing into them, breaking bones and leaving them helpless. The feeling as the bullets had torn through the body of the soldier next to him, giving them a clear target to spare his Countryhuman, and how each of those things had echoed through his body.

That was the pain that mattered, those deeper aches under the burns on and inside him. The ones on the shell around them were nothing.

'Nothing nothing nothing nothing nothing*'*

North was standing. His body throbbed and tore as fresh fluids gushed from the burns. But he didn't feel it. It was nothing.

They were still on Moran Hill, though he knew they'd left at some point. They had been all over the city, but ended up back on it, on the west side now. North made his way out of the gunner's nest, stiffly walking to the top of the slope, refusing to limp even as every brush of his pants fabric against his skin felt like it was scraping against raw nerves. It didn't matter. It was nothing.

The night was filled with thick black smoke, billowing into the sky, blocking out the stars. The choking stink told him the rubber factory was beyond saving even before he was able to look down on it burning at the foot of the hill. Shadowy silhouettes ran around, lit by the flames as they tried to ineffectually put them out with water from the well, the safety tanks on the ground for that very purpose another victim of the bombs. A few stood to the side, watching in a daze.

Truck tires for the war effort, shoes for their soldiers and civilians, protective gear for their doctors and Anti-Epidemic Corps, conveyor belts for their factories. Those were just a few things the rubber produced by the Pyongyang Rubber Factory was used for.

It was far from the only place that had gone up. North could see fires burning across the city, concentrated around the warehouse and rail districts. They burned the brightest over the ammunition factory, turning the grey clouds a bloody red. It was still raining, but the weak droplets did nothing to douse the blazes, just like they hadn't kept the planes away. Shouts and sobbing echoed over Pyongyang, carried up to him along with the blaring of alarms as everyone tried to call for a fire brigade that wasn't coming.

And beyond it North could still hear that infernal drone as the planes returned south.

He shouldn't have felt anything when he watched that pilot burn to death in his own napalm. Nothing but satisfaction.

"He's trying to get us to break off the talks," China said from beside him, still sounding like he was coming from above water North was drowning in.

That or give up on their POWs. Though America had to know by now that no amount of destruction he brought on them would make them surrender. It only stoked the fires of Korea's people to fight harder.

But he would use the prisoners as an excuse, at least. That was what he would tell his allies. Just like he would tell the United Nations that the straw and clay huts he'd turned to ashes on the edges of Pyongyang were troop billets or supply sheds or anything that wasn't a house and every other nation on Earth would be fine with it.

He'd tell them he'd broken off the talks and hit Pyongyang with the largest bombardment in months not to try and expand the war to China, but because he wanted to force North to give up on his people, to cave and accept that international law only applied to Korea. Like that was any better. Like it wasn't grossly unfair and arrogant and barbaric. Like he hadn't started a war he'd realized he couldn't win so now he wanted to kill as many of North's people as possible to try and prove that he was mightier, to make him submit, to turn Korea into the obedient colony he wanted.

And no one cared. Just like they hadn't cared about bombing the Supung once they realized China and CCCP weren't going to retaliate for it. No one cared what happened in Korea so long as it didn't affect them. Every single last one of North's people could burn to death and no one would care. No one no one no one no one no one-

"There are some that care,"

North's teeth clamped down. He didn't know what part of that he'd said out loud. The pain was nothing but it still filled his head, clouding it.

'Weak.'

"I thought my people and I had proven that to you by now." China turned to face him, though the Korean refused to look. "They're down there helping yours fight fires. They care."

'This time I hope to be the hand in a foreign land.'

The other country pulled his scarf back a bit, letting North see his eyes from the corner of his, painted crimson like his skin by the fire reflecting off the clouds.

"China cares."

'Is it really so strange that someone wouldn't want you to take on any more pain?'

North didn't answer, starting down the hill, blood welling and running with each step. His entire uniform was plastered to his body with water and darker fluid, clinging to every bit of his skin, trying to strangle him.

"I don't intend to call off the talks," he said flatly, like there hadn't been any break after China's first statement.

They would be justified to when America had pulled back so unilaterally, and when he was refusing to budge on an issue that shouldn't have been an issue in the first place. But North wasn't going to give them the chance to call him bloodthirsty and war-hungry any more than they already did. He wanted peace. It was what he wanted from the start. It was why he'd let his army take that stupid fucking one week break after Liberating Seoul for the first time.

They had the draft armistice done. It had been for months. They had agreed that all prisoners of war would be repatriated. North and China had even conceded on paper that they wouldn't deploy their returned soldiers to the battlefield, since they were receiving more prisoners than America and his puppets, and hadn't suggested changing it even when they knew the enemy was using prisoners as agents and Rhee had boldly announced that he would send them to the frontline. If it wasn't for the bullshit the Yankee had pulled with the 'voluntary repatriation' and leaving all those names off the lists because he was 'worried they'd be killed if they were returned' while he burned Korea's villages and cities to the ground and murdered thousands of civilians, they would have a ceasefire by now. They could have had a ceasefire over a year ago, when China had proposed all foreign troops leave Korea so the Koreans could work it out. The war could have been over.

North could have his brother back.

If America wasn't going to agree to peace, then he was going to have to show the world that he was the one that wanted war. North wouldn't be pulling back, no matter how many times they bombed his power plants or razed his capital. He was going to sink his claws into the negotiating table and prove that he wanted peace and that it was the rest of the world that craved war. They would have to choke it down that all their 'concerns' for Korea's people were bullshit to make themselves feel better about being useless Yankee puppets and bloodthirsty Imperialists. That no matter how much the Western and colonial powers tried to pretend, they were the same unjust rulers they always had been, the same bloodthirsty savages they tried to paint him as.

And still they wouldn't care about North and his country. Except for Korea, no one ever had.

1,254 sorties. In one day. On one city.

Chapter 300 comrades!! We're still on track for two books. We will see how long that lasts. This, the last chapter, and the one after this were all supposed to be one chapter.

Some of Hae's feelings towards animals come off as if she'd be vegan or vegetarian if she had the chance, but she's actually one of the least likely to be. She believes that an animal's purpose is to be eaten by people. She doesn't like cruelty towards them because she doesn't like cruelty, but she also specifically doesn't like if an animal gets killed not for food or in a way that means it can't be eaten. Because bombing an ox or soaking a pig in napalm means it can't fulfill its purpose. At least a cow got to work and help people before it died, but by removing its ability to be consumed, the pig has now lived for nothing. And this makes her very sad. Hae loves animals very much, on and off her plate, but is remorseless when their deaths are necessary. She'll fight tooth and nail to stop North Hamgyong from killing a spider in the house, but if there's a leaf bug on the rice plants, she'll cheerfully kill it. Bugs that help crops = fulfilling their purpose of helping humans. Bugs that destroy crops = going against their purpose, must die. If she was told to kill a non-food horse in the prime of its life modern day (so there's food factories, no one actually needs its meat) she'd be really upset. But if her pet horse reached the end of its life, she'd happily have it cut up for steaks to bring home, even if they're low quality.
To her, the greatest respect you can give an animal is to use it to help you and the people you love live. Because that is what they're made for.

Alternate universe where China never told the provinces he was here, and the way they found out is when the war is almost over, North accidentally calls him by his human 'given' name.
"Zhilong, come here."
stunned glances from the provinces
alarmed* "Ssi-bal, did I just call him China?"
"CHINA??"

Fraying

1912

"Do you think we have provinces?"

North didn't look over from where he was using a floorboard splinter pinched in his off hand to carve a tally mark into the wall.

"If Japan hasn't killed them."

He'd thought about the possibility before. His common sense told him that it wasn't just the Korean Countryhuman that had been dissolved, but all of their old Provincehumans. So new ones should have formed to replace them, like North and South had replaced the Korean Empire.

'A colony replacing an empire,' he thought bitterly, digging harder at the roughhewn wooden planks.

There was a thud as South swung his legs off the wall he'd had them stretched up, sitting up.

"Do you think he did?"

His other half sounded worried enough that North gave up on the tally for the time being, turning to him.

His brother's brows were furrowed, a bruise still on his cheek from where the guard had hit him for singing so late at night. He was starting to look skinny. Skinni*er*. Three small bowls of rice a day was enough to live on, but not enough to grow fat. Japan supplied them with just enough that the hours between meals stretched out torturously. His own stomach was filled only with a hollow ache.

He imagined the thirteen provinces imprisoned in this exact same way, locked up and beaten, subject to the same torments his brother was, but with no North to protect them.

It would almost be better if they were dead. Especially if they had any females. The only other alternative was that they were living freely because they had easily pledged their loyalty to Japan where North and South had refused.

And if they had, then death would be better.

"If he did kill them, there's nothing we can do about it," North said to his brother.

It was why he hadn't brought it up before. He hadn't wanted him to fret over it.

"We have ourselves to worry about," he added, trying to stop him from dwelling.

His fist clenched around the splinter, the other one spasming as pain shot through it, still tender from being dislocated.

'The hand that dares raise against Japan must be taught not to.'

If the Japanese country had been treating Korea's provinces the way he was treating Korea, then once their people freed the nation, there would be a reckoning.

"Mm, I guess," South said. He tapped his fingers on the floor for a few moments, running imaginary scales before he asked, "What do you think they're like?"

North's common sense gave him impressions of brightly-coloured silks and headpieces dripping with pearls and jade, horsehair hats and long robes. Faceless men and women with sharp swords and green veils.

He shook his head irritably, getting rid of the 'memories.' They weren't his, but rather the collective memory of the Korean people that made up their common sense, as fragmented as it was. And they were of the old provinces anyway.

"Who cares?" he said bluntly.

"Meeee," South whined, flopping back down on his stomach to watch him as he went back to carving. "Don't you think it's fun to guess? We're going to get to know them once we get out. If... If they are alive."

North sighed. "I'm sure they are. Why would Japan kill them if he hasn't killed us?"

There was a reason. Japan wanted a stable colony to steal from. A Provincehuman wasn't needed for their province to exist. But a country needed its Countryhuman.

North wasn't sure if he believed that. But Japan had to. Otherwise...

He glanced over at his brother, his chest tightening.

South didn't seem to notice. North's words had perked him up.

"Yeah, you're right," he said. "Japan wants Korea stable, right? That's why he didn't just kill the Korean Empire. I bet the provinces are all just locked up like us."

'Just.'

"Sooooo," South hummed. "Since they're alive, and we're going to meet them one day, whaaaaat do you think they're like?"

He kicked his heels in the air as he pouted at him, face cradled in his hands, begging him to entertain his game.

North didn't see the point, just like he didn't see the point of talking about all the food they would eat once they were free. It just made you hungrier.

But he sighed. "What do you think they're like?"

"Mmmm." His other half's face screwed up, like he hadn't actually thought of it himself. "Hwanghae was a... scholar, right? So maybe he still is. Or she, I guess. Oh, but girls can't be scholars like that, can they?"

"There's no reason Hwanghae would be anything like the old one, male or female," North said, still scratching at the wall. "We aren't anything like Joseon."

He didn't think.

"Maybe we could be if we were in a palace like he was," South suggested. "We could wear fancy clothes and have feasts. We'd probably be more like him. We'd be respected and stuff."

North didn't want to be like the old Countryhuman. 'Respect' wasn't the word for it.

And that wasn't where they differed. They were far lower than the glory days of Joseon, but not far removed from the final ones of the Korean Empire. It made him grit his teeth to admit it, but North's common sense insistently 'whispered' that Japan's official annexation hadn't been the beginning of Korea's decline. It had came long before that. They were far away from the luxurious life Joseon had lived up until the last, but their pride shared the same tarnish.

The old Countryhuman had signed away their country. That was the real difference. North and his brother would never do that.

"I know." South went quiet for a moment, fiddling with a loose thread on his dirty shirt. "Since we're nothing like Joseon, that means we won't have to... treat the provinces the way he did, right?"

"Yes," North said immediately, knowing what he was talking about.

Joseon had ruled for over five centuries as a 'divine' being. Like so many other Countryhumans, he had been entitled to claim whatever he fancied, including human women. And their own female provinces.

The idea disgusted North, and he intended to have no part in it.

"Concubinage dies with us," he told his brother firmly. "Even after Japan is gone."

It should probably die for the entire country. Though North had no idea how you would go about doing that.

"Good," South said, relieved. "Yeah, that stuff kind of... grosses me out. But that just means we can be friends with them once we're out."

"Provinces aren't friends," North told him.

"Then what are they?"

His other half didn't have an answer for that. So he said, "You're being noisy. It's distracting."

"Sorry, I didn't realize your brain was so small that you need all of it to make a tally mark," South said glibly.

North gave him a withering glare, and he smirked.

"I still don't see why you need to make those at all," his brother said, wriggling over to him.

He hadn't been as injured as North after the last major beating. The punch to his face hadn't affected his ability to squirm across the floor like a worm when there was no good reason he couldn't walk.

"We need to keep track of how long we've been here," North said, not for the first time.

Every day spent sweltering in the thick summer heat or freezing in the winter's grip, every day spent being beaten for talking too much or singing too loud or trying to reach freedom that shouldn't have been taken from them in the first place needed to be marked. And when they did meet the provinces, North would get their tallies, too.

Every single day needed to be avenged.

"Then you should make them in the morning so you won't forget," South pointed out, reaching him and resting his chin on his thigh. "If you keep leaving it 'til the last second, you're going to forget someday."

The orange light of sunset had already faded, setting on the other side of the prison shack. It was getting harder to see the line he was digging.

"We won't be here much longer," North dismissed.

And he couldn't start the day by carving it into being that they would still be here when it was over. He would make them at midnight, if he had the light for it, the moment the moon disappeared above them.

He would try and snag a stone the next time they attempted to escape. A sharp one, not like the round pebbles that sometimes got kicked in, and that South had figured out sucking on could make them a little less hungry. That way he could carve the lines in the dark.

'No.' Next time they escaped would be the final time. They would be free and he wouldn't have to worry about the tally anymore.

But until then, a day wasn't marked as done until he was sure they hadn't escaped on it.

"Right," South said confidently, but quietly, so he wouldn't be heard outside. "You're busting us out of here before the summer's over."

North nodded. "We'll try again tomorrow."

His brother's eyes widened as he sat up. "Tomorrow?"

"The two-year anniversary of the annexation is in two days," North reminded him. "We have to try."

Just like last year.

"Doesn't that just mean they'll be expecting it?"

"We have to try," his brother repeated.

South sighed. "Alright. I just wish you'd wait until your wrist fully healed. Or your ribs at least."

He gently poked his other half's side, below his aching ribs.

"They're fine," he assured him. "I can throw a punch and run."

He'd come up with a new escape plan while he watched South sleep. Without the maple, he had been forced to get creative. Especially when neither him nor his brother were tall enough to boost the other over the wall.

"And if anyone tries to hurt you again, I'll kill them," North promised, fists clenching as the echo of a skull cracking off hot cobbles thrummed through them.

"Right." His brother looked down, then leaned his head on his shoulder. "Thanks again for standing up me for last night. I was being stupid."

"No you weren't," North said sharply. "I asked you to sing for me. And I shouldn't have fallen asleep."

He should have just dealt with the pain.

South frowned. "I would've sang for you anyways, even if you didn't ask. And I really was singing too loud."

Anger shot through North. "No you weren't, South," he growled. "You should be able to sing as loud as you want. Those bastards shouldn't have any control over us."

"But they do."

But they did.

North took him by the shoulders. "It wasn't your fault. It was theirs."

"Alright," South said after a moment, leaning his bruised cheek against his good hand. "Then it wasn't your fault, either."

It was. If he hadn't drifted off, he could have stopped the guard before he'd slugged his other half across the face with his fat fist.

"Exactly," North said out loud, resolving to school his body more, to try and overcome its pathetic need for sleep, just as he had conquered the hunger hunger hun-

Even if South ever learned how to stay up to keep watch, that wasn't enough. The thought of someone coming in while he was asleep and his brother wasn't, spiriting him away, leaving the shack half-empty, filled him with a wild panic that made him want to sink his nails into his other half.

He knew the other option was more likely. If Japan ever decided that killing a Korean Countryhuman was worth the risk, it would be North that fell under his sword, the one that always led their defiance and had dared to kill one of his 'holy' subjects. But at least he could fight back. And even if he did die, at least his brother's survival would be almost guaranteed.

But he wouldn't. Tomorrow they would be gone. Free.

North finished the fifth and final stroke on the 正, the only character he knew how to make, finishing the one hundred and forty-sixth one.

Leaning back, he examined the tallies. They had started big on their first day here, in the middle of the wall, then gradually got smaller and smaller, cramped together to save space.

Seven hundred and thirty days. That was how long they had been in this cage. And it would be how long they were in it. He had just made his final tally. Tomorrow night, they would escape. And on August 22nd, 1912, the beginning of the third year after Joseon had signed away Korea and all its people, North and South would be free.

He would have rather not had a complete 正 as the final mark. It brought more satisfaction to imagine Japan staring at the first stroke, never to be finished. But it still put him in a good mood. Enough that he suddenly jumped on his brother, knocking him to the floor.

South yelped happily as they rolled around, pulling at each other's clothes and pawing at each other until he managed to get his hands under his brother's dirty workshirt to spider his fingers across the ribs on the side he hadn't been kicked in. North hissed, scrambling back as his other half lunged at him, intent on tickling him, which he hated.

Still, he let South knock him over, struggling ineffectually for a minute while his brother had his fun torturing him, making him writhe as he tried not to just buck him off.

"Oh yeah, you're not ticklish at all," South crooned as he got a "Mrgh" out of his brother.

Then he yelped as North suddenly threw him off, leaping on him and pinning him firmly by his wrists, trapping his legs so he couldn't move. No matter how much his other half struggled, he couldn't get free, though North didn't want their wrestling to end yet, so he eventually let him knock him over so they could roll around on the floor again, until they crashed into the rickety chair and sent it falling to the floor with a clatter.

The Koreas both immediately froze as a harsh voice shouted, "Shut up in there!"

South cringed under North, who was on top of him again. Anger flared through him, hating that the Jap guard could change his brother's mood with just a few words.

He narrowed his eyes. Then, even though his other half was giving him a look that said 'Please don't,' North shouted back, "How often do you hear your 'father' say that to your mother and the waste collector?"

Fear flashed across South's eyes, but he also bit his lip to stifle a grin.

"Fucking brat!" the man spat from the other side of the thin door. "Was last night not enough of a lesson for you, chosenjin?"

North tensed, ready to jump off of South and onto the man to see if their escape would come a day early.

But the other guard muttered something, and the first *'tch'*ed.

"You're lucky I'm eating dinner," he grumbled. "Stay quiet or my chicken will have to get cold."

North and South were quiet for a few seconds, then the former collapsed on top of the latter, his brother quietly snickering into his chest. His other half allowed himself a silent snort.

"I won, by the way," he said as they sat up, brushing each other off.

"We were interrupted," South protested.

"I won."

"No way, it's not over. Rematch tomorrow."

"We'll be out of here tomorrow," North reminded him.

"Oh. Right."

The air inside the prison shack was heavy and oppressive, burgeoning with late summer heat. Even the brief tussle had made them both sticky with sweat, so North avoided the thin futon to lean against his tally wall. South pressing to his side immediately made this useless.

"You're damp," he grumbled, then flinched as his brother wiped his hand on his forehead and smeared sweat on his shirt. "And I hate you."

"And you aren't ticklish at all," South added.

"I'm not."

North instinctively put his arm around him, despite the heat. The smell wasn't even a consideration. They were both wearing two-year old clothes and hadn't had a single bath in that same amount of time. It wasn't even noticeable anymore.

Perfumed oils and delicate scented lotions in earthenware and celadon jars. The chime of silver pins on a woman with vivid green skin.

North shook his head, trying to get the fly out. None of their provinces were living like that now. If they were, they didn't deserve to live at all.

But then... the old provinces had lived that way. While North's common sense told him the people below them had starved, barely scraping by. It was why the Donghak Rebellion had started. Part of it, anyway.

The word 'rebellion' didn't sit quite right in his head. Even if that was what it had been.

There wasn't really any point thinking about that. No matter how the Korean provinces were living, Korea was living in chains. They would never know if they were too until they were free. Just like there wasn't any point in guessing what they were like.

But the tally marks he was rubbing his fingers across, and the promise that there would be no more, kept him light. And he wanted to bring back his brother's cheer from before they were yelled at.

So he heaved a sigh to let him know he didn't really want to ask this, and said, "You gave up on guessing what the provinces are like."

South raised his eyebrows. "I thought you didn't care."

"I don't." But he did care about making his brother happy.

"Well," his other half said with mock haughtiness. "I guess I can make some more guesses anyway."

He didn't really though. He mostly just talked about how they could all live together in Gyeongbokgung Palace, not in this tiny shack on the grounds but in the real thing, and wear silk choson-ot and eat pheasant and sing as loud as they wanted. Surely no matter what the Korean Provincehumans were like, they would want that, too.

"When we get out, are we going to go find them?" his other half asked, leaning his head back against the grooved wall.

"Maybe," he replied, meaning 'No.'

Even when they were free of this shack, Korea wouldn't be free of Japan. North wanted to join their people in protesting the Occupation, but his number one priority would be taking care of South. And he couldn't risk even one of the Provincehumans being loyal to Japan.

Surely no Korean province would be. He knew they couldn't be. But when it came to his brother... he couldn't risk being wrong. If they were in a situation like theirs, he would try and get them out of it. But nothing more.

They wouldn't be meeting their provinces until Korea was truly free. And then they would do... whatever Countryhumans and Provincehumans did.

No. North didn't want to do what Joseon had done. The concubines and the tribute and the slow decline. He didn't know what he wanted to do, but it wasn't that. They couldn't, or else their country would just end up the same way.

South talked about the old provinces and Joseon like they were mighty, respected figures. But that wasn't the impression North got from his common sense. It was in there, of course. The admiration of soldiers back when the males had still taken to the field, long, long ago, the loyalty of court officials whose entire careers had been made off of Joseon's favour bowing before the throne. Centuries of thoughts and feelings condensed into a bleary impression of the men and women that had once represented their country.

But those threads were hidden under memories of cold eyes behind emerald fabric, and harsh light glinting off of sharpened blades and jewellery that cost more than you could ever make in your life. Knees and brows grinding into dust, never daring to look up too soon or speak out of turn or even brush the hems of those priceless robes unless they wished to pay for it.

The collective memories of Korea's representations didn't say their people had admired or cared for them. He supposed it was respect, the kind of respect that made Japan's soldiers tremble and drop to their knees when he arrived. But not love. The people of Korea had not loved Joseon and his provinces.

They had feared them.

North didn't know what their provinces were like. He didn't care. And he wouldn't care until they were free and he knew none of them had been lost. But he did know that no matter what, they couldn't be like the ones before them.

And neither could he and his brother.

—

1952

The sun was rising when North stumbled his way back to Jonsung. He thought he had done that at least. One moment he was on the ground in the marshaling yard, directing men with hoses hooked up to portable water tanks to spray down the burning rail station and pulling bodies even more charred than his from wet ashes and steaming rubble, and the next he was in the narrow, dark halls.

He knew why he'd left when Hyon Chol-hae came to get him. The same reason he snarled at China to leave him alone and head back to the bunker if he knew what was good for him. But he couldn't remember the walk. Only the pain that pulsed through him with every step. It was nothing compared to the woman weeping over the bodies in the streets and the soot-smeared workers with exhausted eyes, but it still devoured the in-between moments. He still needed to be stronger.

His General's bodyguard was next to him, and the halls were busy as his politicians went back and forth with candles and flashlights in hand, some heading out to survey the situation now that daybreak was here, and others coming in off of firefighting duty. It was good. Their masses needed to see them on the ground.

But it meant he couldn't compose himself before he entered the office. He couldn't let anyone see him like this.

North stepped carefully up into the room, shutting the door and bracing his hands behind his back, spine twinging.

His General looked up from behind his desk. There was a black smudge near his ear. A dirty cloth sat on the desk next to him, and his black eyes were tired.

But he was alive.

"Were you-?" North tried to ask if he'd been caught in the bombing, but his voice came out cracked. He'd been screaming commands and shouting over the roar of planes and fire now for hours, and the inside of his throat felt thick with ash from breathing in the smoke.

It suddenly felt too tight, the soaking bandages closing in, squeezing his burns as they throttled him.

"Jong-il," he croaked instead.

His General and his son had been at the military complex today. The buildings over it had been decimated.

"Jong-il and Kyong-hui are both fine," his General soothed. "We made it back an hour ago. Comrade Song-ae has him now. He's sleeping."

A bit of tension went out of North.

"What did you need?"

The man did what he'd known he would, and placed a roll of bandages and a cloth on the table, pushing it towards him.

"I need my country to take care of himself."

North's grip around his wrist tightened, sending a burst of nothing up his arm. "If that is all, then I need to return to my duties."

"The city will still be there once you've tended to your wounds and had some rest."

The city wasn't there. That was the problem.

"No one else is resting," North said flatly. "Our people have been tormented through the entire night by the enemy, yet they are still in the streets, putting things right. How can their Countryhuman do any less?"

"Our people don't have to bear the burden of being burned with our city." The man held up a hand before he could force his words out. "No one wounded by a bomb or affected by the napalm is conducting relief efforts."

"It isn't a burden." It was just what he deserved to feel.

"Yet I would still like to see it lessened," his General said. "And I suspect there isn't anyone out there right now that wouldn't."

It didn't deserve to be lessened. There was still too much to fix. With first response almost over, he would need to assess the damage in the daylight, see what could be salvaged and what supplies would need to be supplemented with increased production in other factories or by importing. And there were still people buried under the rubble that he needed to save.

"If you won't do it for yourself, do it for our people," his comrade said into his silence.

His eyes moved observably downwards to North's muddy boots, then back up to his shadowed eye. He didn't need to speak for North to know what he meant. It was why he had taken the chance to get away from his workers and China, even knowing his comrade would try this.

It was good for their people to see their Countryhuman on the ground after a bombing, working just as hard as them to put things back in order and rescue who they could. It was good for them to see him with ash and blood smeared across his skin like it was theirs, a bold commanding force in the flickering firelight and shadows, refusing to bow in the wake of the enemy's attack.

But with the sun up, they would see him too clearly. His cheeks hollowed out, the eye not hidden by his patch sunken in like a Yankee's, and the drab green of his uniform turned entirely dark red-brown, even though there hadn't been any ground combat. In the dark he looked battle-worn. By the light of day, he would just looked exhausted.

'Weak.'

He wasn't. The pain was nothing and neither was his lack of sleep. He could keep going.

But that wasn't what anyone would see. His General was still just as skilled at aiming for a kill point as he was during his battlefield days. Just like he was still just as tactical, sending Hyon Chol-hae to get him instead of someone else in the Party, knowing North wouldn't dare delay when his Premier's bodyguard had left his side.

"...Fine," North forced out. "I'll change and... bandage my wounds."

He didn't know how he was supposed to cover the ones on his chin. He couldn't ask Kangwon. He would find a way.

"But I can't sleep until I find my provinces."

He'd ran into South Pyongan after the bombing was over, down in the warehouse district as she hauled rubble off the roads to clear the way for the water tanks to be dragged in, and he had taken Hae to Jonsung complex as soon as he had the chance, making sure she got inside himself (after ditching the cat at the door). He knew she wouldn't try to smuggle it in or take off idiotically again. He had told her not to.

But he needed to know if the others were okay. Aside from North Pyongan and North Hamgyong they had all been in the Pyongyang area today. He had wanted to keep them close after the meeting of the Party Political Committee because it took too long for messages to pass between their capitals with the power out. If one of them was taken, he wouldn't know until hours after it happened.

And if he had been even an hour later when North Pyongan was abducted, he could have lost him.

They had been in the city when the raid started, or out in the fields or the hills. Kangwon could have been returning to the Quarantine Hospital, Chagang could have been at the troop barracks, if Hae hadn't been with him she might not have even got the warning and ended up trapped outside the city with only a shallow dug-out to protect her. Or nothing. That still could have happened to his other provinces.

The panic he'd been managing to force down all day surged up.

"I need to go find them." His voice broke from the strain of the words but for once he didn't care, already halfway out the door.

"Comrade," his General said before he could fall out it. "They're all safe."

North whirled back, eye narrowed, suspicious that he was just trying to stop him from leaving, even though he knew the man wouldn't lie to him.

"Comrade South Hamgyong came to the military headquarters before we left to ask me to tell you that she personally accounted for the safety of our provinces in the city," the General told him. "Comrade Chagang had left the complex to assist with the evacuations, but she told me even he was well. The only one she couldn't find was Comrade South Hwanghae, but I reassured her she was safe here."

"Where was South Pyongan?" He trusted his General was telling the truth, but part of him said SH was lying, trying to trick him into resting, predicting that they would be having this exact conversation.

"She didn't inform me of exact coordinates, but she said she was helping clear rubble around the industrial sector."

Which the warehouse district was part of.

"North Pyongan and North Hamgyong-"

"The Supung Dam wasn't the enemy's target this time," the General interrupted him, giving him a small reassuring smile. "There isn't any reason they wouldn't both still be safe."

'Safe.'

The rush of relief in North's body made him want to sag, though he fought it. His provinces were okay. Not burnt by white phosphorous or napalm or lying at the bottom of a bomb crater or stolen by America in the chaos.

Good. He couldn't afford to lose any more good soldiers.

"...Alright," he rasped. "I'll... rest."

Just until his voice came back.

His General nodded. "I put some clothes on your cot for you. And a spare uniform will be here for when you wake up." He foresaw North's protest by adding, "I sadly think that one has reached the end of its lifespan."

North looked down at his shirtfront and grimaced. Even when it had less holes in it than it would after melee combat, only a few tears he could've easily patched, the fabric was soaked in blood. Too much to be washed out. Even if he scrubbed it for a day, it would still bear noticeable stains, especially over his left side. He would lower the KPA's prestige by wearing it even casually.

"Thank you," he muttered.

"I live for my country." Kim Il-sung got to his feet. "I have a conference with our comrades, but I'll hold it in one of the halls. I'll lock the door."

North's skin was still itching, pressure boiling inside him, and his chest was tight. Even with the door locked, he knew he would keep jolting awake as a voice raised in the hall or someone knocked, looking for the man. Part of him wanted to crawl under his General's desk and curl up in the leg well like when he hid from China, dignity be damned. Part of him wanted to ask him to stay.

But that was childish. So he bit his tongue and nodded, going to grab the bandages, unable to hide his limp now that it was just them. He saw there was a bowl of clean water behind the desk, too.

His General didn't leave immediately, drumming his fingers on the other side of the desktop, a serious look in his eye.

"What?" North asked, hackles going up as every name of their close comrades that could have died in the bombing flashed through his mind.

"The Soviets got a message to us his morning," Kim Il-sung said after a moment. "They said to take this with skepticism, but it seems America has returned to the United States."

The foreigner had taken off before, but the weight with which the General said it told North it wasn't just a simple visit home.

"For good?" he asked, fingers sinking into his abused palms.

"The rumours say," the man replied. "He left yesterday. There wasn't an announcement or any declaration, but our comrades seem convinced he has returned to his country, at least for some time."

'Returned to his country.'

North's eye went to the map on the wall, starting from the Korean Peninsula, tracing across the Pacific Ocean to the west coast of America. Then farther, over the lines and place names to the dot on the map labelled 'Washington, D.C.' The place the American Countryhuman could return to or from whenever he wished. Not just across the sea, but on the entire other side of the world.

Whether he was gone for now or not, America could do that whenever he pleased. Fly away from Korea to a place with no war, no fires, no choking clouds of smoke. Fly back to his brainless sheep living their fat lives off of the suffering of other nations under a blue sky and electricity no one would dare snuff out and leaving behind North's under a shroud of death he had brought here in the first place.

America could forget about this war, relegate it to how much money it cost and made, to casualty numbers that meant nothing to him, to far-away death and destruction he hadn't even cared about when it was outside his door. There would be no burns to cling to his skin to remind him of what he had done, what he was still doing. No food shortages, not power outages, no buildings to repair. He could live comfortably and forget about the war he had started.

But Korea's people couldn't forget. They woke up hungry and suffered through air raids and sabotage and combat every day, and North couldn't even take down the planes doing it without his body and his land paying for it.

His teeth ground together, the fire in his skin seeping into his chest as he fought the urge to lunge across the room and plunge his knife into the General's map, to mutilate the other country until it was unrecognizable. That pressure throbbed against his temples and he heard his skull start to creak-

Then the pressure burst, replaced by fear as he surged forward, slamming his hands down on the desk. The lump in his chest tried to make its way into his throat, blocking his words, but he forced them out.

"South? Did he take South with him?"

"The South is still in Korea."

This time the relief weakened him too much. He slumped forward, forehead on the cool desk.

He hadn't taken him. Not yet.

"Did America move him somewhere?" he demanded. His head was too heavy to raise right away, so he tilted it slightly to look up at his General. "Did he lock him up?"

The tension in his stomach wasn't relieved as the man answered, "I don't know. I only know that America arrived in Washington alone, and that a contact of Comrade CCCP's believes he may be staying."

North's jaw feathered, and he added, "But I've already had an order sent out to confirm the South's location."

That was all they could do.

'That's as good as it can be.'

North's teeth grit. It shouldn't be. He shouldn't have to worry about his brother being swept away across the sea, Kangwon shouldn't have to worry about his trapped in the south. They should have been invited to the Security Council vote, Gangwon should have been able to testify, they shouldn't be at war in the first place.

"It is just a rumour," his General repeated. "But I wanted you to hear it from me."

North paused, raising his head, mustering the strength to push his upper half off the desk to look the man in the eye.

They were serious, piercing into him.

"If America has truly returned to his country, and the South hasn't been imprisoned, there is a chance his security will be weakened." The General's gaze bored into his.

North's heart skipped at what he was implying, but his ragged nails curled against the desk.

"We agreed that I shouldn't leave again," he said, trying to keep his tone neutral.

"I told my country when we first met that I was willing to Liberate both of our Countryhumans." His General laid a worn hand over his heart. "And I told you last year that I wouldn't stop until you got your brother back. If there is a chance, if you think you could convince the South to return to us, then I will consider this necessary. I know you would be fully capable of infiltrating Busan. And without America there, the risk would be significantly less."

North knew he could do it as well. Even if South was being detained somewhere. This wasn't like the Occupation, when agents had been hard to come by and usually had no real resources. And better than that, he had the cord connecting them now. No matter where his brother was in Busan, in the south, in Korea, he would be found. And North would go to him. He was certain he could infiltrate Busan and manage to talk to him.

He would only be in danger if he raised the alarm.

"So," Kim Il-sung said solemnly. "Do you think you could?"

Two years ago, North would have said yes without thinking. He would have leapt at it. Even just four months ago he would have. His brother had been sorry. He had seen what sort of country America really was, how cruel and violent and self-serving. He had left that message to let him know that he'd made a mistake, that he should have followed North when he asked him to at the Raktong. With America across the sea his brother wouldn't be so scared. The moment North arrived and held out his hand, he would take it, without him even needing to speak a word. He could save him. He was sorry.

'잘못했어.'

"...I won't go." North was careful to keep himself steady both inside and out. "Whether or not I could convince him, it wouldn't matter. Even if he made a hundred statements after I brought him back here, no one would believe he was with us willingly. They would accuse us of abducting him and likely escalate the war."

Whether by declaring China complicit in the abduction of a foreign Countryhuman and using it to justify declaring war on him or dragging him in front of the UN again, or simply using it to delay the armistice even longer. Or with the atom bomb. Whatever it was, North knew America wouldn't simply cut his losses on Korea if his brother came home with him.

'If.' He didn't think there was a word he hated more.

He could see on his General's face that the man clearly recognized his dodge. But he said nothing. Nothing but, "Are you sure?"

North grit his teeth, keeping his face neutral. "Yes."

He wouldn't drag this war out even longer just to make sure South was safe. So long as he was in the country, he could have an eye kept on him. And America couldn't afford to kill him. He could afford to slaughter tens of thousands more of their people.

And even if he went to just talk to him, to make sure he was safe, to demand the truth, to let him know North forgave him and always would forgive him...

What did it mean, if South wasn't imprisoned?

He couldn't risk their country. He would see his brother when a ceasefire was signed, and it was time to work out a real end to the war. Not before.

"Alright." His General's expression didn't give away what he thought about his decision. Or why he would be willing to accept North going at all when he had been so adamant about him being safe when he'd left to retrieve Choe Jong-ok.

'I wanted you to hear it from me.'

'Tch.'

"But if America is gone, we should take advantage of it." The words sounded far away, not trapped inside his skull the way they were when the jets blew his eardrums out, but coming from somewhere far outside it. "Redouble our attempts to get me a phone call with my... with South. Don't bring it up at the negotiations, I don't want them to latch onto it as us trying to cause an issue. Keep going straight to the United Nations. Comrade China says he has no spine. He might bend."

"It will be done," his General assured him.

"This air raid seems to... confirm our intelligence." North's head was ringing again. "America wants us to pull away from the talks. He must be building his forces for- for another offensive. We'll need to..."

His voice broke and he swallowed, his throat flexing dryly.

"To..."

"Comrade." The General put a gentle hand on his shoulder. "Rest.

We can talk tactics later."

North nodded. His throat wouldn't form any words.

The man left, taking his flashlight with him. His Countryhuman stood in the dark, listening to the lock click.

Had South heard something similar after America had left? The 'snick' of a lock as he was shut away in a dark, cramped room like the shack they had spent nine years in? Alone in the dark like North, but with no latch on the inside he could undo?

His own cooking body smelled like the thick black smoke that came off a burning city. The fires that had raged in Seoul had been even hotter than the ones here today. And the people in it hadn't had anyone to evacuate them.

'잘못했어.'

'Maybe he-'

North tore his clothes off, the strangling feeling suddenly too much, and stood panting in the dark. He just wanted to sleep so he could get back to work, but he knew if he didn't clean himself his General would send Kim Yong-hwan after him.

He couldn't let her see him like this. Not her, not Kangwon, not anyone. Not even his Comrade Kim Il-sung anymore.

By the white glare of his flashlight, lens cracked by the bombing, he scrubbed his body down, trying not to look at the chasm that crossed his torso, or the singed pink muscle twitching within it, and trying not to flinch as he scraped skin off with the grime. There wasn't really any difference between the dirt and the crisped flakes.

He wanted antiseptic. He wanted to pour it inside that gash and watch it foam white until it hurt more than that deeper ache. But Kangwon said not to put it directly on burns, and he didn't want to waste any.

And he knew it wouldn't work.

Mechanically he wrapped new bandages around himself, leaving his throat bare, then cursing himself and wrapping it anyway, trying to pretend he didn't feel it closing in on his windpipe. Like the pain, it was nothing. He would deal with covering the chin burns when he woke up.

The bowl of water was now dyed a deep muddy red, scraps of burnt flesh floating on the surface like they'd never been attached to his body. Something foreign and unsightly that made him want to shatter the clay on the wall and dump it all out.

He moved it behind his desk, not liking the image of his General staring into the murk with downturned eyes while he slept.

The man had left him his canteen. He took a sip, refusing to guzzle it the way he wanted, then dressed in the loose white peasant shirt and baggy pants Kim Il-sung wore when he wasn't in uniform or his suit.

North turned off his flashlight and curled up on the cot, burying his face in the rough fabric and inhaling his comrade's warm scent, trying not to listen to the sound of shoes in the hall or feel the burning in his skin, both of them telling him he couldn't afford to rest, he had to go help.

A few hours' sleep. Just enough to satisfy his General. Then he could.

He wanted to shut his brain off, but thoughts of his brother refused to be stifled.

Was he alright? Had he heard about this air raid? Did he hear about all of them? South wasn't the type to read reports, and surely America wouldn't have been telling him about them, wanting to hide from him exactly how much destruction he had been inflicting on North and their people, on Korea. Surely...

But he had burned Seoul. And he had seen the burns on North at the Raktong. He wasn't an idiot, he had to know they were worse by now. It wasn't his fault, it wasn't like he could stop them-

'잘못했어.'

When America had taken South to Japan, North had been terrified. He had been terrified today at the idea he had taken him to the US. When the planes flew back in from the north, when the warships docked in Busan after raining death on Wonsan, when the bombs falling on the frontline made blisters rise on his skin, barely an echo of what they were doing to North...

Was his brother ever scared for him?

That old chicken bone lodged in his throat, and the noise he'd been trying not to make for hours leaked from it. He seized his neck his hand, crushing his own windpipe, his cheeks going hot with shame.

'Weak.'

Gritting his teeth, he forced his legs straight, still lying on his right side. He wasn't a child, he wasn't going to sleep curled up in a ball the way- He wasn't. But his back was too burned to sleep the way he usually did. And his left side was obviously out.

It didn't matter. And it didn't matter if South would come with him if he asked or not. If he would raise the alarm the moment he saw North's face. He couldn't go for him. Not when it would just draw the war out. So there wasn't any point in thinking about it. He didn't want to think about it.

His back ached under the burns, yearning for the feeling of pressure against it, no matter how much it would hurt. It was embarrassing, and stupid, but when Kangwon had pressed against him the night after the power went out, it had felt better than any poultice he'd ever made for him.

The memory made him ache more, a phantom itch he couldn't scratch, and North rolled over to stare up at the dark ceiling, not caring that his skin scraped off under the bandages as he did. He squeezed his eye shut.

Even if he couldn't s... Even if he couldn't go rescue South yet, he still hoped America had left for good. It would be good if he had, a tacit acknowledgement to his puppets that their master couldn't get the victory he had wanted. And it got him away from North's provinces.

'Keep your promise.'

He grit his teeth.

But he couldn't relax. The relief that had flooded him as he heard his provinces were safe had still been tinged with anxiety, and more of that helpless, itching pressure.

His northern provinces were safe, for now.

But his southern provinces weren't.

The next escape attempt the flashback talks about is the one where North kills his second person. I can't wait to do the flashback chapters in order eventually.

American plane made last year: I am old and frail and my parts are falling off sickly cough I need to eject an innocent passenger out my door in mid-air.

Soviet plane made in 1980s: I am young and hale and in the prime of my life. I will never die.

I think CCCP (the Russian Empire territories that made him before he formed) and America were very similar people when they were 'young.' Especially 'Russia' (the one who became the original Russian SFSR). Both children who were desperately trying to get approval from a father who was more a ruler than a parent, who eventually realized what a tyrant he was and rebelled against him with great ambition, going on to reject any claim of fatherhood he had over them. But CCCP made a clean cut. He killed the Russian Empire and broke free. 'I am not him. And he is not my father.' But Britain is still alive, and America has more family ties that keep him connected to him, like Canada. No matter how much he says it, he can't change that he's Britain's son. He is all the bad parts of him, and worse. And he's so obsessive that even the idea that the old man attributes his successes to himself drives him crazy. Britain is very firmly in his shadow now, but he still casts one over his heart. America has to prove he's better than him, that he surpassed Britain's expectations and he is in control now. CCCP resolved to become a father himself, a better one than his, that wouldn't inherit his legacy. But America in some ways is still that child desperately trying to earn his father's approval.

Don't tell him that though. He'd shoot me dead.

Puppet On A String

'Scraaape.' The shriek of metal on ceramic was loud and grating in the nightclub hall, as if the Yankee squatting in their country had never departed at all.

The Southern Korea flinched, his hand spasming 'round the knife as if he wished to drop it and pretend the sound had been produced by someone else.

There was nothing South Chungcheong hated more than a man that refused to take responsibility. One who crept around with his head down, apologizing for every breath like he were a woman. Men had the right to take up space, to declare their presence known. Yet this man refused to. He had claimed the head of the table so easily, yet it seemed almost as if the eyes of the other patrons turned to him, he would hide under it.

Yet they did not. The long table tucked away high in this terraced corner of the club was dangerous territory. Too long a look, too intentful of one, may get one accused of gathering information for the enemy. And they knew what that would mean.

South Chungcheong's knuckles tightened on her lap, hidden from sight under the flowing white tablecloth.

Her seat had been set to the left side and other end of the table from the southern one in an attempt to keep him as far away from her crystal glass and silver utensils as possible. She had switched it to the end so she would not have to sit next to those she was forced to call her relatives, facing him and turning it into he who was at the foot and she who was at the head, facing him.

Her steak sat on the plate, a warm slab of barely-browned meat leaking watery red fluid. She despised red meat.

The hall around them was packed. 'Twas July 17th, 'Constitution Day,' and it had brought the cockroaches out of the rubble. There had been no choice to attend this year. South did not bother trying her door only to have it slammed in his face again. He had simply had her jailors drag her outside and into the waiting car.

"This is good," South said, having finally cut the steak with his blade, stuffing it in his mouth with his brass chopsticks. "You should try some. It's rare. The only way to eat a steak."

He smiled in a tentative way that was surely meant to be encouraging. It was met with a heavy silence by the southern provinces.

His lips wavered, and he quickly took a sip from his glass of dark red wine.

"Come on, eat," he said, more confident with the bloody liquid lining his gums, ruining it by immediately adding, "Please?"

"We're not-"

"-hungry," the Jeollas muttered in their shameful way.

They had not deigned to wear the Western-style dresses that had been delivered to them in their prisons. As South Chungcheong had not. She had no intention of baring her shoulders and calves like a Yankee whore for the degenerates that shared this hedonistic establishment with them. The only ones that had worn the rags were Gangwon, thin and nervous in his black suit, Jeju, as obedient as ever, the front of her dress low and the back high, and South Gyeongsang, somehow still idiotically thinking that she had a chance to get through to the Southern Korea if she played along.

She would not. There was no victory in a fool's game. And there was no denying that South was a fool.

"How could we be hungry when people are starving?" South Chungcheong's imbecilic brother demanded, the chunk of meat on his plate going untouched for once in his life. "You expect us to gorge ourselves on foreign crap when I could walk outside and find someone who hasn't eaten in a week in under ten minutes?"

His words should have been impassioned. But before they had even left their vehicles, the Command not to raise their voices had been issued. Instead the violet man sounded oddly neutral and strained.

"You sound like-" South's lips flattened in displeasure. South Chungcheong knew what was coming a moment before he ordered, "All provinces- eat."

Caught unawares, her idiot cousins picked up their tableware in sync with a clatter, immediately cutting into the meat, faces twisted as their mouths were pried open and their jaws forced to work.

South Chungcheong could not afford to resist long. But she had the presence of mind to aim her chopsticks for the kimchi in her bowl, opening her mouth willingly before the Command had a chance to make her.

But she could not keep up with their pace. Barely had the piece of salty pickled cabbage went down before she was forced to pick up another, and another, the force telling her body to eat eat eat-

South looked alarmed at their sudden frenzy, and even more so when Gyeonggi started to choke, even his fat mouth unable to keep up with the desire to devour.

"All provinces- stop," the puppet quickly ordered, and they all dropped their utensils with a clatter that pierced the music in the nightclub, drawing eyes for the briefest of seconds.

South Chungcheong lay hers delicately down on the porcelain chopstick rest.

"So much for 'Commanding them'll just make them want to listen to me less' or whatever," North Gyeongsang muttered, voice thick from the food lodged in his throat.

The South tried to disappear in his navy pinstriped suit as resentful eyes turned on him. "I'm sorry, I didn't mean to do that. Can you just… eat normally? Please?"

Grudgingly, most of them did, wishing to avoid the prying fingers of the Commands further sullying their minds. South Chungcheong did as well, picking at her kimchi and rice bowls with delicate bites, ignoring the Western fare on the plate.

Though the puppetmaster was gone, she was not safe. His strings were long. And with what the southern one now knew, she could not risk drawing his ire. Small men would always turn the meanest when they were scorned.

North Chungcheong crossed his broad arms over his broader chest, staring defiantly at the Countryhuman.

'Fool.' Did he not see the time for meaningless gestures was long past? It had died on the floor of the interrogation room as Gangwon bled.

South sighed, taking another gulp of wine. "You're acting like I'm trying to feed you like, pig scraps or something. I worked really hard to get this."

"And by that you mean you got it from Japan, yeah?" North Chungcheong challenged.

The South took another drink.

"How much did it cost?"

"Does it matter?" the puppet deflected. "You didn't pay for it."

"It does matter when every time you go running to the Yankee for something you tie us tighter to his wall-"

"All provinces," South ordered. "No talking about politics. At all. Any kind."

South Chungcheong felt the Command tighten around her brain, making her teeth grit. As if she had had any intention of doing so.

North Chungcheong's jaws clacked shut, though his eyes continued to glare.

South took a deep breath, then gave their table a smile that held a pathetically desperate plea at its corners. "I invited you all here to have a birthday dinner. Can we please just have a nice one?”

To have a nice dinner with the Countryhuman who had whipped one of their own with his own hand, like the both of them were common chattel. The idea was preposterous.

They of course could say nothing of it, no matter how the idiot Chungcheong strained to. Those Commands had been the first beat into their wills after the event.

“This isn’t our birthday,” Gyeonggi pointed out between bites of steak. Despite his earlier refusal to eat, the glutton clearly did not disdain doing so. “We don’t have birthdays.”

“I know North-“ The name left his mouth reluctantly, as if he did not wish to remind them of the man’s existence. “Is… weird about birthdays. But you can have one now.”

“If I was going to have a birthday, I wouldn’t choose the day a fake constitution was drawn up for a-"

Whatever defamation North Chungcheong had been about to spew they would never know, as the Commands closed his throat, leaving him to splutter.

“I also wouldn’t,” South Gyeongsang said, hands smoothing the vulgar rayon fabric of her deep green dress over her lap with repetitive motions. “Especially when the constitution apparently doesn’t mean anything, if Rhee was able to change it on a whim.”

South’s jaw feathered as he took another drink. His glass was empty now.

“It wasn’t on a whim,” he said. “The National Assembly voted on it.”

They had all been given the paper. Ostensibly a reassurance that everything was progressing democratically, far more so than in the authoritarian north. But as idiotic as South Chungcheong’s cousins were, they were able to read between the lines as keenly as her. One need not study Korea’s dialectical materialism to predict who would be winning the election in August.

“And you aren’t supposed to talk about politics,” the puppet reminded them petulantly.

“Am I?” the orange-patterned woman asked distractedly. “I thought that was just a fact.”

But South Chungcheong could see down the table to her right, and observe the way the hands brushing the skirt trembled, fighting to stay unfocused enough to get the words out.

“No,” South said. “It’s Communist propaganda.”

He was starting on his second glass as he said, “Can you guys all just have fun? Even if you don’t want today to be your birthday, it is mine. You didn’t get me presents, the least you can do is have a good time. I- I mean, I didn’t want presents or anything,” he said quickly. “I don’t mind. I just…”

He swallowed into the stiff silence. “I just want us to have a good time together.”

A good time, as their country was occupied and bombers, foreign invaders marauding across their lands, plundering and raping, with the man who had betrayed them.

This ludicrous statement was met by more silence, as one would expect. Gangwon shrank down in his seat, not looking up. The puppet looked down at his plate, taking another quiet bite of meat.

The clink of chopsticks and scrape of knives on plates was the only sound that came from their table.

Stupid. Why would they be served slabs of meat they needed to cut themselves? The chef should have done it. Rhee’s puppets truly were lazy.

South Chungcheong refused to touch it still, sitting with her hands in her lap and her eyes straight ahead.

South was directly before her, his head ducking and eyes darting as he attempted to avoid her gaze. She did not let him make it easy.

To his right was Jeju, meek and pathetic, needing no Commands to mechanically cut and eat the steak, nor to behave. She kept her head down, shadowed eyes focused on the tablecloth. To his left was Gyeonggi, apparently dubbed the least threatening, as he should be. The boy was half a child, his lack of guile entirely unfeigned, unlike the little northern bumpkin. His mouth kept half-opening as if he sought to break the awkward silence before he changed his mind and quickly stuffed it with food once more.

Next to him was South Gyeongsang, her expression disgustingly sorrowed as she snuck glances at South. The Jeollas sat next to her, any separation of themselves they had managed to accomplish now entirely undone by the prolonged isolation. Their chairs were pressed together, thighs touching as if they could merge into each other's slender frames. Across from them was North Gyeongsang, pushing his thick glasses up on his face. They had been replaced after they reached Busan during the second retreat, but a new crack reached across one lens. Somehow the moron had broken them in captivity, likely by tripping over nothing.

And to South Chungcheong's left and right, respectively, sat the idiot she was supposed to call a brother, and Gangwon.

He shook in his chair, hand trembling as he tried to keep his grip on the chopsticks. As he attempted to lift a piece of nearly raw cow meat to his mouth, his wrist twitched and it fell onto his lap, the utensils landing on his plate with a crashing sound that made South flinch and the province jump.

His white eyes went wide as his shoulders hunched, cowering as the Countryhuman turned to him out of instinct. They were fixed on his plate as his shuddering increased.

"S-S-S-Sorry," he stuttered, green face drained of colour, his nails digging into either side of his chair. "S-Sorry. I'm sorry."

The southern one had downturned his eyes the moment he spoke. "…It's fine," he said, making a poor show of sounding casual. "It's okay." He said it louder, remembering the man was a cripple now.

Gangwon's face screwed up, his eyes squeezing shut as he gripped tight to his chair.

Was it solely the whipping, the isolation that was so much like what he had endured before the war, according to South Chungcheong's information-gathering, or something that the Yankee had done on one of his secret nighttime visits that had broken the man so? She knew not. Nor did she care. The result was the same.

'Pathetic.'

The southern one looked away from the shaking man, straight into South Chungcheong's eyes. She stared through him and his gaze darted away, trying to find one of the other provinces' faces. But they all kept them down, glaring mutinously at their plates.

All but North Chungcheong, who was glaring at her.

Clearly the puppet boy had placed the Chungcheongs and Gangwon in the farthest seats from himself to protect himself from them, whether physically or mentally. But did he have to seat her so near this imbecile?

He was glowering at her from under his thick brows the same way he had after the whipping, as if t'were her fault that the trembling green fool had been caught and scourged.

It had nothing to do with her suggestion that it might be Gangwon who had been in contact with Pak Seo-nam. It had been entirely because of his extended stay in the north and refusal to renounce Korea. And America's need for a sacrificial deer.

South knew the truth, after all.

But this idiot did not. And South Chungcheong had no intention of enlightening him. Sharing secrets with fools was how you lost.

So she would bear the resentful looks he and the others cast her along the long table, as she had borne their hateful ones after she had executed the agent. She cared not what the small-minded thought. Per usual, the only opinions that mattered were those held by men with power.

She met the other Chungcheong's gaze haughtily.

'Traitor,' it said.

She turned her face away, looking bored.

She had fallen into observance too easily, even with no one to share her findings with. It mattered not what condition the others were in. Gangwon had only brought it upon himself.

He had been safe. Even in a world where he had been whipped solely for her lie, how had she been supposed to know he would do something so idiotic that he would end up in the puppet's clutches once more?

She did not know what exactly he had done. They had not seen him before the whipping and they had not seen him after. He had been left unsilenced after the deed, but had fallen unconscious soon after from the pain of his back being carved open, and been carried away by the Yankee's minions before he could wake.

But she knew who he had been during the Occupation, and how he and his northern half must still be. The sort of fool whose soft heart would drive him to do something reckless enough to be captured, even after going so far as to maim himself to avoid being Commanded back.

'Twas not her fault he had ended up a demonstration. The blame lay solely on the Yankee and his puppet.

Yet the tension quivered over the table, her cousins dividing their scornful looks 'twixt her and the Southern Korea, as if they were anything alike.

South Chungcheong ignored them, gaze roving the club with disdain.

The floor was lit by muted light cast by globe lamps positioned at intervals around the walls, and filled with dancers, men in dark suits and military uniforms dancing with harlots in heavy garish paints and dresses that left nothing to the imagination, the way America's slattern dressed. Ankles kicked and hips twisted as they moved to the sound of the obnoxious curved Western horns played by the band on the raised stage at the far end. ‘Jazz,’ the heathens called it. She despised it. She could barely imagine a sound less Korean.

Round tables spotted the edges like swollen ticks, diners gnashing at rich meats and swigging foreign liqueurs, bloody juices running down their chins as they laughed and bantered. The eyes of the men proved hungrily over different meat, straying from their partners to coiffed blonde locks and curled black hair, skimming over low necklines and slender ankles, saliva practically gushing from their maws.

Many of them were foreign, war correspondents and diplomats and Yankee officers. Most had the brown skin and slender eyes of South Chungcheong’s people, but none of them were Korean. All of them were wealthy and 'important.' Powerful males with beautiful, useless females.

In here, in this microcosm of foreign lands rife with the stench of cooking meat and perfume, jaunty music and animalistic howls of glee, and clothes imported from across the sea, ‘twas if the war outside did not exist, nor had it ever.

South Chungcheong knew these types well. She had worked for them for long enough. The women on their backs in the filthy brothels, the children taking men for money, even the soldiers of the Yankees and their puppet army dying at the front meant nothing to these degenerate sycophants. Just as those suffering under the Jap regime had never meant anything to those upholding it from the offices she had cleaned for them.

She would never make the admittance, but she had been one of them for long enough.

No. Not one of them. She had never been one of them. That made it even more deplorable.

A woman that had used to be Korean laughed, a high, feigned sound, as a man with fish belly-pale skin rested his hand on her lower back. He did not move it, and she laughed again, shriller, but refusing to order him to lift it, or even to ask. She only poured his drink and said everything but the word ‘No.’

‘Idiot girl.’

She would be taken in an alleyway before the night was over, or a cheap hotel. Perhaps even in the toilet room, dress rucked up around her waist. South Chungcheong knew how these things went.

And there was nothing she could do about it.

She made herself turn away, facing the foot of the table once more, staring at the painting of the eastern coast behind the Southern Korea.

His gaze roved over the dancers, focusing on stretched mouth smiles and hands resting on waists, on people leaning across tables to talk intimately, far more desperate than the lechers, but for something different, what his smile had been pleading for earlier.

‘Twould have been less pathetic if it was flesh he craved. Men were meant to desire it. Her disgust with him was deepened either way.

‘I can’t help you next time, South Chungcheong.’

She did not want him to. She had needed it that night in the warehouse, but she had not wanted it. There was only one man she would ever deign to receive protection from, and she knew he would never offer it. Clearly. He had taught her to protect herself, to learn the moves to escape the game.

Even if thanks to him they were useless now.

South tore his bitter eyes away from the celebration in the room, reaching for his glass. Finding it empty, he began to pour a third.

South Gyeongsang’s brows furrowed. “I think you might’ve had enough.”

More than enough. The bottle he had brought had already been half empty when he led them into the club. It was almost entirely empty now.

"This is a party," the southern one replied, a defensive edge to his voice. "You're supposed to drink at parties."

"But you've been drinking… a lot," the woman ventured.

"No I haven't," the Countryhuman said sharply.

"Please," South Chungcheong scoffed. "We are all aware you have been as drunk as a sow ever since the northern army retreated the first time. It has only grown worse."

He had been laden with liquor when he came to lift the silent Command two days after Gangwon's punishment, swaying on his feet as he slurred at her that she could speak again, and repeated the order not to throw household items at him.

Drunk or sober, it mattered not. Either way, he had not believed her.

His eyes flashed as he jerked over to her. He did not share the silent language they did, but she could read the look on his flushed face clearly.

'Call his army what you really want to call it.'

She could not forget. This was no longer the boy she could snipe at and insult without retribution. With the whipping, the gate to the temptation of a man's power had been opened. She did not think he had the mettle to truly cross it. But he could try.

She was still afforded the freedom of self-defense. But with only a few words, he could strip it from her.

And if she were forced to her knees in front of him, her back scourged bare under his whip as the other provinces watched on with looks that said it was just what she deserved…

Her pride would not bear it. She could not.

"Yeah, I'm kinda worried you're becoming an alcoholic," Gyeonggi chirped.

'Twas only one of his inane comments, said thoughtlessly around a mouth of half-chewed potato. But it made South shoot up, the red on his cheeks flooding across his entire face.

"I'm not an alcoholic!" he cried, staggering slightly, grabbing on to the table and missing, pulling the tablecloth and causing his glass to fall, shattering on the floor with a sound that stopped the band.

The silence over their table spread, smothering the nightclub as all eyes turned to their corner. South stood frozen, staring at the shards of glass and puddle of wine on the floor, as if by holding still he could evade their judgement like a rabbit evaded foxes.

He quivered, and for a moment South Chungcheong thought he might flee from the scene and put an end to this farce, though she knew she would still be trapped here.

Then someone quickly commanded the band to pick up their hideous noise, and all heads turned from them with an almost audible crack of vertebrae, not wanting to witness something they should not. Not when martial law still lay over the city.

South sank slowly back down into his seat, shoulders hunched around his ear slits as a waitress hurried over to clean the mess, apologizing for some accursed reason as she did.

Not one of the provinces made a sound. Even North Chungcheong did not even snicker. From the corner of her eye, South Chungcheong could see that the look on his face was one of overwhelming disgust. The others were mixed with embarrassment. South Gyeongsang only looked pitying, a deep, deep pity that any man should wish to take his own life for ever inspiring in a woman.

'Disgust' was not enough for what the Southern Chungcheong felt. There was no word in any language to capture the revulsion that coiled inside her at the look of drunken shame on the face of the man who was supposed to be half of their country. 'Twas somehow far worse than when he had been heaving into her sink, or even that little smile that had been on his lips as his whip tore the flesh from Gangwon's back.

This bumbling puppet boy was who she had required to spare her from America's wrath that night? How pathetic. How truly, utterly pathetic, for the both of them. How utterly miserable.

She wanted to leave. She did not want to sit at this table, surrounded by these degenerates and the scathing glares of those who thought she had taken the life of one of their people because she wished to return to bed. By this farce of a colony. She did not wish to be subjected to this grating music and stupid Yankee slaves and to sup on heady wine and meat that was practically still breathing while a few streets over a starving peasant girl was being raped in a back alley so her mother could afford to make her supper.

She did not want to play this game anymore. She had never wanted to.

"I'm not an alcoholic," South muttered.

"I want to go home." The words had been too honest. If her voice had not been chained, she might have cried them.

'Pathetic. Pathetic pathetic pathetic.'

South Chungcheong straightened her shoulders, looking snootily down the table.

"I wish to return to my demesne. Release me from these Commands."

South looked at her, his eyes wide and glistening, soft and vulnerable.

Then they hardened. The way men's hardened when they remembered they had power over you.

"No."

South Chungcheong's jaw tightened. "I do not wish to play pretend with you and these simpletons. Release me."

"No," South repeated, louder. He stood, setting his jaw. "I invited you here, I invited all of you here, because I wanted to do something nice for you."

"You invited us here because your puppetmaster left and now you have no one to distract you from the things you do not wish to think of."

South Chungcheong knew she should hold her fool tongue, but if she was going to be forced to keep paying this fool's game, then she may as well get her cuts in and speak like one.

"That's not true," South protested. "I tried to invite you guys last year, too, but you all said no. You said no when it was just you and me on the first Liberation Day. You slammed the door in my face!"

"Because I do not wish to be part of your doll set," she sniffed. "You believe setting us around a table and making us eat your foreign food will make us a family."

She cut her eyes to him. "It does not."

His hands balled into fists, weak and ineffectual. "We are a family. I'm Korea and you're my provinces."

The others had been watching the exchange, not leaping to back her up as they would have each other. But now North Chungcheong growled, "You aren't. And we aren't your provinces. We're Korea's provinces."

"I am Korea!" South whispered a shout, slapping his palms on the table and making Jeju and Gangwon cringe, not raising his voice even when he was the only one with the freedom to.

South Chungcheong said nothing. She would not push her limits.

But Gangwon lifted his head, looking down the table. He trembled as the words left his lips, tripping worse than North Chungcheong as he fought to work around the Command not to call the northern one Korea directly.

"Y-You aren't our Korea."

And still, rage was not the first expression to twist the southern one's face. Instead it was a childish hurt, filling his eyes with tears. But then it darkened.

Again South Chungcheong knew what was coming.

"All provinces," South said coldly, straightening up, his voice low. "You will call me Korea. I am Korea." He spoke the words like he was trying to Command them to be the truth. "And my brother is *North."

He had issued those Commands before, but now he followed it with another one.

"And you will not talk about him again."

South Chungcheong felt the tendrils wrap around her brain, reaching down to hold her tongue, ready to restrain it if she tried to speak the name of her Countryhuman.

She had no intent to, but North Chungcheong let out a gagging sound, clearly attempting to defy the Command.

'Idiot.' They were all idiots. K-K-

For a moment she couldn't even think of him, and the feeling of her thoughts being stifled was somehow even more violating than that of her body being moved against her will. When the thought came, it still burned.

*'Korea, you idiot.'

The tablecloth bunched under the southern one's hands. The regret on his face was clear, as was the vicious triumph. He did not rescind the order.

"America is going to win," he told them firmly, gripping onto the table. "You need to get that through your heads. I don't want to do this stuff, but I have to. Once the war's over, I won't. So just behave until then, okay?"

His other Commands- not to talk about politics, not to spread

Communist messages, not to converse with their people or harm anyone, not to throw jasu hoops at his head- all ammounted to the same thing. But this new one still tightened around her bones, sinking into them, taking control of her body.

Behave.

So many years she had spent 'behaving,' believing she had no choice in it, believing she had any choice in it. How humiliating it had been to have that blind arrogance stripped from her by that stupid stupid man.

And still it came nowhere near to this, to not having a choice at all.

"I want you guys to like me," the southern one said, dripping with desperation that made her want to strike him. "I want us to get along. I'm not going to take North away from you- he's going to become part of me."

Gangwon's jaw feathered and North Chungcheong bared his teeth.

"We're all going to be together," the puppet said, pleading for it to be true. "We're going to be a family."

None of them looked at him. With their spirits shackled, it was the only defiance they could give.

"And every night will be like this." He gestured sloppily to the dance floor filled with foreigners and slaves, his eyes filled with a desperate hope that sent South Chungcheong's kimchi churning in her gut. "I know you've always had it hard, I know North never let you rest. But you can. You can tonight, if you just stop acting like him and have some fun for once."

When South Chungcheong could still hear his brother's voice ringing in her ear slits, every annoying speech, even the ones she had not wanted to hear, the ideas she had not desired to be taught, this one seemed lacklustre in comparison. The man seemed even more so.

South looked around, searching for some response, some sign that he had reached them, that they would betray the ideals they had fought and suffered for over decades in exchange for jazz and steak.

No one looked at him. No one but South Chungcheong. And she was a fool for doing so, as ever.

He finally met her gaze. And for once she saw resolve in it.

"I know none of you know how to be normal," the southern one said, his hands fisting on the table. "I know Japan and North and fighting for the Communists all those years messed you up. You're still brainwashed."

"Whose brain is washed?" North Gyeongsang demanded in his ridiculous lisp.

He was ignored. "I was messed up, too. America had to teach me how to be normal. I know you don't like him, but if it wasn't for him, I'd still have no idea how to act around people."

America had not taught him to be normal. He had taught him how to be a puppet state.

And how to be a man.

South Chungcheong did not speak. His eyes were still boring into hers.

"I can teach you how to be normal, too. I can teach you how to enjoy life. You know North never would."

The life of a Provincehuman was not meant to be enjoyed. It was meant for destroying stupid games and freeing their people from the obligation to play, Liberating them from being pawns in a game they could never win.

"You're going to have fun tonight," South said, the words bordering on a Command. And then they were one.

"South Chungcheong- come sing with me."

She stiffened. "No."

But her body was already trying to stand, legs trembling, and no matter how much she fought to keep herself on the chair, she could not stop herself from rising.

"You'll like it," South said, smiling, and she wanted to claw it off his face. "I won't make you sing one of Rhee's army songs or anything. You know 'Aegukka' by heart, right?"

He made her confirm that she did, her mouth opening and closing against her will.

"Hey," North Chungcheong said, standing. "No. Leave her alone."

"I do not require your protection," South Chungcheong forced out. The imbecile never learned.

"I'm not letting him take you out on stage like you're a damn baltal puppet." The words fought to be loud, to announce it to the club. They could not be more than a mildly heated statement.

"South Chungcheong doesn't like performances." South Gyeongsang volunteered, her brows furrowed as she looked at her. "If you want someone to sing with you, I will."

The woman's teeth ground. 'I do not want your pity.'

"Or me!" Gyeonggi almost appeared excited by the idea.

"No," South said, his small mind made up. "South Chungcheong is the one that needs this the most."

The room was loud, the murmur of filthy lechers and their wenches distorting around her, crowding her skull. They would whisper as they watched her sing, eyes crawling over her as she was moved like a marionette, made to perform for their pleasure. Whisper about how attractive she was, what the body under her thick choson-ot looked like, what it would be like to have her in their beds or bent over their desk, the same whispers that had followed her for ten years.

"If you do this," she said lowly, piercing into him with her angular eyes. "Then you will never be my Korea."

South stared back.

Then he shrugged. “I will be. I’m going to be the only Korea.”

He crossed to her, linking their arms together. She wanted the skin under her sleeve to crawl, but it refused. As much as it rankled, he was still a Korean Countryhuman.

“All provinces except South Chungcheong- sit,” he ordered before North Chungcheong could move towards him. And as he led South Chungcheong away from the table, he glanced back and Commanded, “And look at *me.”

No matter how hard she tried, South Chungcheong could not stop her feet from following. She strained and struggled, but all she managed was a twist of her ankle that almost sent her to the ground, and would have had South not caught her.

“I’m not doing this to be mean,” he murmured as they crossed the floor, weaving between the dancers. “I just want you to have fun.”

No, he wanted to prove to her that he was a man. That no matter how weak and pathetic and submissive he was, he still had more power than her and always would. Even someone like him was more capable of winning than South Chungcheong had ever been.

He wanted the rest of their days to be like this night. He wanted the game to last forever because of course he did- it had been made for him.

“I helped you,” he reminded her, barely above a whisper. “Do you know how mad America would’ve been if he found out? I really stuck my neck out for you.”

Men were meant to protect women, a Countryhuman was meant to protect its Provincehumans, and even if one of hers had refused the charge, ‘twas still better than this one treating it like it was a favour. Her heart should not have pounded as she waited to see if he would reject the order to Command her, it should not have been a question of if he would choose a Korean province over a foreign invader.

“And you treat it like an obligation,” South Chungcheong scorned. “Something that I owe you for.”

“I don’t think you owe me,” he said, shame flashing across his face. “I just mean… I- I still have that handkerchief you gave me when I was… I still have it. You helped me and I helped you, even though you’re a-"

He cringed, eyes darting to a man in a black suit gorging himself on soup as he watched them, not daring to speak the word, and South’s Chungcheong’s jaw tightened.

She, a traitor. When he was the one obeying a foreign nation’s will as he sought to turn their country into a colonial slave once more.

Satisfied they were not about to be dragged out in chains, he turned to her, fervently whispering, “I care about you, South Chungcheong. Even if you haven’t given me any reason to. I want you- all of you- to care about me too.”

“If you care about me,” South Chungcheong said quietly, legs shaking as they approached the stage. “Then you will not make me do this.”

He faltered, and for a moment she had a faint hope.

Then he shook his head.

“If I just keep letting you walk all over me and don’t try to unbrainwash you, then you’ll never like me,” he told her. “And you’ll never be happy. You want to be happy, right?”

He searched her angular face desperately, as if South Chungcheong had ever desired something so meaningless. As if she could ever be happy when the game existed.

Again his eyes shadowed, and he tugged her forward once more, grip tight, even with the Commands preventing her escape.

“You’re going to do this. And one day you’re going to like it. I promise.”

Eyes were already on her, watching her head for the stage, arm in arm with their nation-traitor Countryhuman, tracking the hem of her skirt, waiting for a flash of lavender skin, expecting her to entertain them because she was a woman and that was what women were good for.

South Chungcheong put up no more fight. She could not resist the Commands. She could only struggle and choke and demean herself even further. She would not do that. She could not. She could not. She couldn't-

They reached the stage and the man whose arm she was on said something distant to the band. Then he led her up the stairs.

She was before the audience, all faces turned to them now that it was clear they were expected to, tracking over her, taking in every inch of a Provincehuman who had not been seen in months, if ever, from her simple slippers to her flowing black skirts to the chest covered by her purple jeogori, and the golden province on her face. She could see the other provinces out of the corner of her eye, heads having swivelled to follow South, unable to take their eyes off him. She did not think they were blinking.

"Hey everyone," South called, the nightclub quieting as he spoke. "Me and South Chungcheong thought it might be nice if we sang our anthem for you for Constitution Day."

She could tell he had stopped just short of saying 'If that's alright with you.'

How pathetic. Puppeteered by a man who craved attention so desperately, yet cringed now that he had it. Puppeteered by a puppet. How useless, how worthless, just like every single one of these trophy whores staring at her.

"South Chungcheong," South whispered from the corner of his mouth. "Smile."

And to her horror, she felt her cheeks lift, her lips upturn and stretch, her teeth poking through as she made an expression she never had before in her life, giving a pleasant smile to this room full of traitors.

South blinked, looking stunned, then gave his own grin. “Wow, you really are prettier when you smile. Isn’t she?” he asked the crowd, and the men jeered and whistled, filling her face with heat and her stomach with useless roiling fury.

The worst part was that she knew he was not attempting to taunt her. The words could have came from America, but they were bereft of his mocking edge. She could not ascribe malice to him, only ignorance. He was just an ignorant, stupid man who still thought he was a child, heedless of the fact that he wielded a man’s power, a country’s power.

For the first real time in decades, she wanted to grab one of the blades from the fat diners’ hand and plunge it into her throat. She wanted to tear herself open with her nails and spray his face and those of these creatures watching her with her blood. She wanted to crack her skull open on the edge of this stage, to bash her head off the wall until it split wide open and the Commands fell out, to escape this humiliation forever.

But she could only smile.

“South Chungcheong,” South said after lifting the Command to keep her voice quiet. “Sing.”

‘Twas useless and she knew it, but some part of her did try to fight, to keep her jaw shut. But the strings pulled and cracked it open, and out came the notes of ‘Aegukka.’

“Until the East Sea’s waves are dry, Paektusan worn away, God watch o’er our land forever, our Korea manse.”

The man’s voice was high and pure, melodic in a way a male’s should not be. Her own was a lower counterpoint, unused to producing songs, the words emerging stilted and off-key, even when she was not trying to resist, flooding her body with even more shame, so much she felt she would burst.

‘Twas not one of Rhee’s songs, but it was one of his. The anthem of a puppet state, and he had her singing it to this room full of those tied to the same strings he was, showing that she was tied to his strings, cementing her as his. A traitor, a puppet.

"Oh hibiscus, thousand miles of range and river land;
Guarded by his people, ever may Korea stand."

Eyes were on her, degrading her with their focus. Up here on this stage she existed for them, turning herself into nothing more than a utility like every other nightclub singer in a slinky dress. Something to entertain, something to be used. The men saw her as an object to undress in their minds, to covet and conquer, and the women saw her as just like them. Under the greedy gazes she was no longer something untouchable and superior, no longer a province or even truly a woman.

She was just an object.

"Like that Mt. Namsan, armoured pine, standing on duty still, Wind or frost, unchanging ever, be our resolute will."

The words poured forth like bile, torn from her gullet. She wanted to run, to escape, damn her dignity. But when she tried, the Commands slithered over her, wrapping around her limbs and holding her in place, putting her mind in bondage, leaving her unable to think of anything but the next words.

Sing

"In autumn's arching evening sky, crystal and cloudless blue;
Be the radiant moon our spirit, steadfast, single, and true."

The man put his arm around her shoulder, a physical string to match the mental as he forced her to sway, to not be so stiff, to soften in front of all these glittering eyes and slobbering tongues, and now her skin did crawl, writhing over her body as it tried to tear off it and escape.

He did not even see what he was doing to her. He was tearing her spines out and leaving her vulnerable in a way she could never repair, and doing it in front of vultures who already though they were owed whatever they desired.

The shame beat in her breast like a living thing, something that wanted to claw its way out, but could do naught more than burn and burn and burn and not even do the courtesy of immolating her body and erasing her from this wretched world.

She did not deserve this. She had learned her lesson long ago, she need not learn it again. She was useless, powerless, a pawn in a game she wanted nothing more than to destroy. She got it, she understood. These women thought she was no better than any of them and they were right. She was nothing more than a helpless little girl and she always had been.

It had been supposed to change. They were supposed to change it, he had promised. Yet here she was, the scraps of real dignity she had managed to wrap around herself over the years of fighting to free their country being torn away, baring her to these greasy-fingered freaks and a boy who thought he was Korea.

“With such a will, such a spirit, loyalty, heart and hand,
Let us love, come grief, come gladness, this our beloved land.”

She was being torn apart, the edges of her sanity crumbling away as her will was ravaged. She wanted to cry, she wanted to scream, she wanted to die, wanted to die, to die to die die die die-

“Oh hibiscus, thousand miles of range and river land;
Guarded by his people, ever may Korea stand.”

It was her only defiance. She was no wilting damsel and never had been, even before he had taught her to fight for them. She would, the only way she could.

As she sang the last line, her voice faltered on ‘Korea,’ the Commands refusing to let the word pass her lips.

And yet her rebellion went unnoticed. As the last words of the anthem splattered the crowd, they burst into polite applause, whistles and shouts of "Happy birthday, Mister Korea!" The man with a flag on his face was too absorbed in their praise to pay attention to her, his arms raised and eyes alight, face flush with more than alcohol now.

South Chungcheong was left twitching and sore, the Commands carved deep into the matter of her brain, muscles aching from trying to flee. The pressure in her skull, in her body, crushing in on her from the audience, was too much, too much.

A Yankee in a double-breasted suit thought her blank stare was directed at him. He winked at her, and she felt something in her mind strain.

Song finished, she was freed from the stage. She stumbled away, tripping down the stairs, drawing chuckles from the pigs with empty eyes, thinking she was a drunken idiot like the man behind her, drawing concern and amusement and pity.

Her numb legs carried her past the table. Gyeonggi was crying, huge tears rolling down from his unblinking white eyes. North Chungcheong twitched, but could not tear his gaze from the male on stage. She knew he would not follow her if he could.

South Chungcheong fled out the door before her mind could break for good, mouth still stretched in an unbearable smile.

Guy that desires attention and praise more than almost anything from other people so can't comprehend why anyone would genuinely not want them vs woman to whom attention and praise are part of what she fears most. Entirely incompatible.

If you're interested in what South Chungcheong got from North, it's the 'I am going to genuinely lose my mind if I am publicly humiliated.' Amongst other things that should be obvious and will be even more obvious because the next chapter is a chapter I've been waiting to post forever UqwvjEjwpiejgqpiOaDgnqxgf <3

The bourgeois used to eat fancy luxurious foods and now it seems they just eat fast food. And children. What happened? Actually wait. Because of globalization (distribution and ‘lower’ prices(not really but you know what I mean) we now have access to every food they have. So they gain nothing by eating their tiny-portioned, unseasoned food over delicious, designed-to-be-addictive junk. It’s like how in Britain the rich used spices until they became available to the working class, then stopped using spices. And the one food no working person can eat normally now (not counting famines and such) is… Somehow the idea that the rich eat human flesh solely because it’s a rare commodity others can’t is worse than if it was just tasty, or even getting pleasure from consuming those ‘lesser’ than them. There’s a clinicism to it. Though all of those reasons are worthy of death.

An Interlude: Fool's Game

1910

An inkling of existence, a stirring of consciousness, and then-

“There she is!”

The words didn’t make sense at first, clunky, foreign gibberish, as incomprehensible as everything else swirling inside of (her?) her.

Woman, man, province, country, Sinsi emerging from the great white mountain in the north, Gojoseon raising his walled cities before falling to Han, replaced by Goguryeo and the other lesser states, Jin rising in the south before shattering into the Samhan confederacies, merging into Baekje, Gaya, and Silla until Silla absorbed them into herself before declining, usurped by those who stole the names of the old Three Kingdoms once more, Balhae’s fall, Koryo’s unification, then Joseon. A thousand wars of conquest and resistance, a million battles, invaders, conquerors, losses and victories, the sheer unadulterated force of history expanding in her mind like it had always been there, like she had always been there.

Joseon stretched on, five centuries of culture and progress and regress and language- Language. Her common sense came as words now, Korean, as Joseon’s borders tightened against invasion and foreign influence, until being pried open by greedy fingers and shaken by those who toiled rising up, a slow death, unmitigated by a new name, an abrupt termination by an unfair treaty, a real death, and-

And the rest was hers.

South Chungcheong’s eyes snapped open, and the man wielding a gun jolted back, alarmed by the sudden movement. Those with him raised their own weapons, surrounding her, a small, naked girl standing in the center of Taejon village.

Her cheeks flushed as her body discovered what shame was, her hands instinctively trying to cover herself.

The men, Japanese men, Korea's old nemeses, her common sense told her, laughed, and her body discovered something else.

Anger.

Her jaw locked, and her throat worked, until the words, "Get me clothes," came from it. Her voice was husky and sharp.

The men stopped laughing, and the one nearest raised his brows. "I think she thinks she's in charge," he said in a language different than the one that had left her lips. "Well, you're not, girly- Japan is."

"I'm aware," she said stiffly, trembling. "And I want clothes. Give them to me."

Another man smirked. "She's a feisty little mite, I'll give her that. Here." He shrugged off his jacket, tossing it at her. She barely caught it, her body still fresh and awkward. "It's long enough to serve as pants. Airing your bits out will do ya good, too."

The men laughed as she quickly shrugged on the jacket, doing it up all the way to her chin, despising that she was wearing an Occupier's clothes, but preferring it to being naked. Being bared only put her in more danger, she knew, the common sense of the old female Koreas coming to her, the common sense of being a woman.

Danger. She was in danger. Surrounded by foreign men in an isolated village that had likely been emptied in anticipation of her arrival. Men that had been waiting for her, men that served Japan. A male country that owned Korea, owned her, like men already believed they did.

She couldn't fight. She was barely a woman and women couldn't fight, let alone a girl-child with no clothes who had barely started to comprehend that she was alive. Tears tried to tremble on her lashes, but she forced them back.

When one of the men grabbed her shoulder, all she could do was cringe and hiss, “Don’t touch me!”

He only laughed, grabbing her harder and pulling her close, starting to drag her though the city at gunpoint, while she clumsily stumbled alongside, her legs too short to keep pace with him.

“Feisty’s good, it’s fun,” he taunted. “But best not to get too feisty, or His Divine Majesty might come pay a visit.”

She had to avoid that. She had to keep herself safe.

“I want a job,” she said out loud, her voice wavering as she clutched the jacket close. “I want to be useful.”

“A job?” the man asked, his grip on her tight, his sweat stinking in the summer sun. “I can think of a few for a pretty girl like you.”

“You’ll have to discuss that with whoever gets set up as the new Provincial Minister,” the man who had thrown his coat at her said. “Or even the Governor-General. Might take a few months, though.”

A few months surrounded by men like this, with nothing to protect her, while the Japanese swept in to finish claiming her country that had already been no better than a Japanese puppet for years.

As South Chungcheong was hauled through the dusty streets of her provincial capital that the Japanese called ‘Taiden,’ she had her first fully formed thought of her own, her eyes narrowed at the back of her captor’s head.

‘Bastards.’

—

1910

Three months later

“Here’s your desk, here’s your supplies, and here’s-" The stocky man that had trained her *‘thunk’*ed a huge stack of papers down on her desk. They were yellowed and smelled of mildew. “Your first task. These are the records of Chuseinan province from the past twenty or so years. You'll go through them, organize them by date, and throw out any that could be considered seditious to Japan's rule. Think you can handle that?"

South Chuncheong, whose jaw had clenched at the Japanese name of her province, nodded.

"Good." Her trainer leaned on an elbow, lowering his voice. "Because you've received official sanction from Japan himself to work here. And if you screw up, both our asses are on the line, understand?"

South Chungcheong nodded again, and he straightened up.

"Then get to work, girl."

She did. It was slow going with her only recently learned characters, and the old papers left an unpleasant residue on her fingers. But she spent all day squinting at dusty records, sounding out the words in them, cross-checking them with her list to see if anything could be considered 'seditious.'

At the end of the long, arduous workday, she had a stack of neat, ordered papers to be filed away, and another to be burned. She picked up the former, casting another look at the ones she left on her desk.

That was Korean history, as inconsequential as it might be. Genealogical records, recordings of celebrations, important events. It was her history, set to be burned.

This was her first time walking through the long, straight halls of the Provincial Office alone. The heels they had assigned her pinched her feet as she tried to walk as silently as possible, passing male politicians and female secretaries.

The former had no fear of going unnoticed, striding down the halls, loud and boisterous, while the latter scurried quite pathetically, their heads down, only raising them when hailed by a man, flashing them a quick, tentative smile.

South Chungcheong had come to despise those smiles over her last two weeks of training. The woman were so soft-spoken, always curving their lips when spoken to by a male, even when it was clear they wanted to do the opposite. They smiled and laughed even as they were blocked into a corner or trapped at their desks.

Even as she passed through the halls, she could see through a crack in an office door as one of the office workers pinned the young woman that had brought South Chungcheong a glass of water earlier to the wall with his body without even touching her.

“Forget the drink,” he purred. “I’m more interested in spending time with you.”

The girl laughed, a panicked, fluttering sound that was still attempting to be friendly, as she stammered through a dozen ways of saying no without ever actually saying the word, pretending to be so stupid as to not know what he truly meant.

South Chungcheong turned away. It was what the girl deserved, hustling around, acting eager to serve. The province had only been alive for barely over three months, yet from simply observing during her training, she had already realized what all these foolish women didn’t.

Those lowered eyes, fake smiles, and defensive cheerfulness were not a shield- they were a lure. The feigned stupidity did not protect them, it only made them more desirable to the men that wanted them. They were practically asking to be victimized.

Which was why when South Chungcheong entered the archives, finding the correct place to file the old records and removing a new stack, intent on proving herself useful, and a shadow fell across her, she was ready.

She hadn’t turned around as the door had creaked open, or as heavy footfalls came her way. Men did not need to creep. They moved through the world assured that it would bend to their wills.

“Chuseinan-do,” a smooth voice said from too close behind her in the small, dim room. “I had heard I had the honour of working with a province. It's a pleasure to meet you."

South Chungcheong turned, unsmiling, her files held under one arm, not clasped in front of her. "I am sure it is."

Pak Jung-yang, the new Provincial Minister of South Chungcheong province, blinked, momentarily taken aback by her blunt, informal speech. But it didn't last for long as a smile rose under his well-groomed black moustache.

"You're just as lovely as I heard," he said, his eyes scanning her lavender skin and black and white choson-ot. "Though I'm sure you'd be even lovelier with a smile."

He flashed his yellow teeth at her. South Chungcheong's lips remained flat.

The man smiled because he wished. The women that worked under him smiled because they felt they had to.

South Chungcheong did not.

When she didn't answer, the Minister leaned forward, bracing one arm on the shelf behind her.

"I've been keeping tabs on your progress," he said, as if she would not notice that he had just said he was seeing her for the first time. "You worked fast for your first day. If you keep that up, you could even be my personal secretary."

His voice lowered as he reached for her arm. "Does that sound good to you?"

"Have I given you the impression that I am a woman you can touch?"

South Chungcheong's scathing tone stopped his hand an inch from her slender wrist.

"What did you say?" Pak Jung-yang asked, too confused to sound as threatening as he likely intended.

“Are you deaf as well as lacking in wits?” South Chungcheong asked, arching a brow as she took a step forward, forcing him to straighten up. “What I said was, ‘Have I given you the impression that I am the same as these other empty-headed harlots?’ Because I am not.”

The Minister sputtered, outraged at being spoken to in such a manner by someone who should by all means be meek and docile. “You can’t speak to me like that!”

“Oh, but I can.” South Chuncheong straightened further, looking down at him despite how he loomed over her, the way she had been practicing. “You may have been appointed by the Japanese, but I am Chuseinan-do. My authority comes from my very being. I am your better. You are just a peon.”

She tilted her chin, barging past him, leaving the moron dumbstruck as she pointedly slammed the door to the archives.

Her heart beat hard in her bosom, and her tongue felt filthy for having said her name in Japanese. But she could not afford to use her Korean one. Not if she intended to walk this line.

Her heels clacked on the hardwood floors as she passed the office she had before, the door now closed tight.

Let the other women smile and simper in an attempt to spare themselves. It would only lead to their downfall. South Chungcheong would not play their losing game. She would play to win.

She marched to her desk, taking the stack of old records to be destroyed. History was nothing, not compared to her pride.

With that done, she sat back at her desk, starting on the next set of records, intending to finish them before the last worker went home and she must return to her little prison house.

Men only let women learn to read and write when it allowed them to serve them better. And the women had to smile and play along, lest they be kicked to the streets, where they would be forced to find other ways to serve lesser men. Better to be violated by one than a hundred.

South Chungcheong abhorred the idea of working for the Japanese and their puppets, such as that degenerate nation-traitor Pak. But it was preferable to the alternative. She would be violated by no man. She would wield her demeanour like a blade, and the little bit of power she had been given like a shield to prevent herself from losing her position, as Silla, Gaya, and every other female 'Korea' and their subdivisions had.

She would be an obedient little secretary. She would make herself useful, too useful to discard, to be locked away in obscurity where she could be treated as her jailors pleased.

South Chungcheong would keep her dignity, if nothing else.

—

1913-1919

South Chungcheong's heels clicked purposefully as she shoved open the door to the Provincial Office, head up, ignoring the voices that called to her as she marched past them.

"Good morning, Miss Chuseinan-do!"

"Looking good today!"

"You really could smile more."

She paid no heed to any of them, sliding behind her desk, adjusting the bouquet of hibiscus on it before removing the year's budget from a drawer, picking up where she had left off yesterday, unswayed by the myriad of distractions that the lesser beings she was forced to associate with attempted to inflict upon her.

"I brought you some water, Miss Chuseinan-do."

"Did I order you to? Pour it out and cease these useless appeals."

"Think you could shrug off your bodyguards and come eat ramen with me?”

“I would sooner starve than let such a vulgar dish pass my lips.”

“You know, your speech is so weird, I sometimes have trouble understanding it.”

“I speak the tongue of early Joseon, back when Koreans still had dignity. I would not expect you to understand it.”

“Chuseinan, I wanted those reports on my desk an hour ago!”

“They are. You set your tea down upon them, and now the title is obscured by your cheap drink.”

“…Ah. Get me a new report, readable this time.”

South Chungcheong had quickly risen in the ranks, if a secretary could be said to do that. She engaged in no gossip, took no breaks, worked overtime, and with a ruthless efficiency that had no match among the pitiful women she worked with. It had come to the point where Pak Jung-yang had indeed appointed her his personal secretary, sacrificing the ability to have a woman on call to kneel under his desk for him for the ability to scare off any unwanted meetings.

Not that he did not have his women. South Chungcheong made no attempt to warn the girls that followed him to his office. They would not heed her anyways, too hopeful that by providing their superior a brief moment of pleasure, they would be securing their futures. They were too stupid to realize that they were only cementing his opinion of them as office utilities. And utilities were easily replaced.

They were fools. And South Chungcheong had no pity for fools. ‘Twould get her fired if she did.

She brought the man his reports, examined proposals for him to sign, new roads, new public buildings, more laws, less freedoms. She brought him his teas and his snacks and his meals, counted funds, went over budgets, ignored any and all attempts to make meaningless conversation from the tools that inhabited the office.

They made her sick, acting as if they had any say in their country or any power over this small city. They were puppets, all of them. And unlike her, they did not even realize it.

She worked long into the night, rebuffing Pak Jung-yang's newest attempt to sway her into whoring herself out to him, then left, kicking the least annoying of her guards awake from where he had been sleeping in the lobby, and marching home to her one-room house to change into a different choson-ot to sleep in, slumbering the moment her head hit the pillow, plagued by dreams of miscounting or misfiling or being unable to escape the Minister's advances before waking to do it all over. And over.

"Good morning, Miss Chuseinan-do."

"Looking even better today!"

"Still no smile? But it's so nice outside!"

She sat behind her desk, scanning the proposal. Historic preservation. 'Twould never pass. Pak had a penchant for destroying cultural buildings.

"I got you a glass of tea, Miss Chuseinan-do."

"Is there no brain 'twixt your ears? If I desired a drink, I would fetch one."

"No ramen, but how about raengmyeon?"

"Did you think 'twas the pronunciation that made it vulgar? Begone."

"Okay, but why do you talk like that?"

"I do not get paid to explain myself to imbeciles."

"Chuseinan-!"

"Here is the copy of the report. Acquire a coaster, you possess the funds."

In 1915, Pak Jung-yang transferred to Seoul, relinquishing the title of Provincial Minister for the more 'illustrious' one of Privy Council member, advising the Governor-General how best to rule their country. After a year, her skill and status caught the attention of the new man himself, Hasegawa Hoshimichi, after his predecessor had transferred back to Japan to lord over his own people as Prime Minister, and South Chungcheong was freed from her obligation to work for a pervert and forced to work under someone worse- a Jap.

The surroundings and pawns were changed, but the game was the same. She woke up early in her two-room house in the city center, walked a few streets over to the aging City Hall, sat down at her desk, and went over the demographics of Seoul- the quickly rising Japanese population and the slower Korean one; public opinion surveys, which neighbourhoods held lower views of the Occupation; budgets, how much money had to be allocated to keep a country sufficiently leashed. She worked through them all while having to teach a new batch of public servants that they were, in fact, servants, while she was not.

"Chuseinan-do-ssi, would you like something to drink?"

"It is Chuseinan-do-nim, and do not ask again, wench."

"We're going out after work, do you-?"

"Why yes, I will simply inform my bodyguard that I will be going clubbing tonight. No. Do not ask again, peasant."

"You speak really-"

"You will not be speaking at all, soon. Silence, peon."

"Chu-"

"I brought you two copies of the report, one is on your desk, the other is filed, and I have allocated enough funds for coasters for the whole office in this year's budget."

The only difference was the power. The men around her had more of it, which put her in more danger. But at the same time, she had more as well. She was a Korean Provincehuman working directly under the Governor-General, which didn't change once he was replaced by Saito Makoto. No mere office worker would dare touch her without sufficient drink in them, and she would never put herself in that position.

She spent her days cold and aloof, working even later into the night, until her eyes strained most arduously and her lavender fingertips were stained with ink. Then she kicked awake her least annoying guard in the lobby and ignored the other five as they escorted her the block to her gated abode, where she fell into restless sleep where she dreamed of hanging on a rope for forgetting to burn something properly, and men she could not say no to, before waking up to do it all over.

And over.

And over.

And over.

Until he had the audacity to show up at her door.

—

1920

April

Arise, walk, ignore, sit, read, write, ignore, fend off unwanted advances, get up, kick, ignore, walk, slum-

'Thump.'

South Chungcheong shot up before she could reach the 'nightmare' slot in her schedule, disdaining the way her heart pounded as she sat up in her futon, listening.

Silence. Far too much of it. Where were the usual irritating murmurs of the men outside as they played cards or smoked?

Was this the work of more radicals, emboldened by the March First Movement or the failed attempt to assassinate Saito yesteryear? Or had her so-called guards finally decided to make some coin on the side by whoring her out to their friends?

Here in this dark, empty apartment, she was stripped of what made her untouchable, left only with her small body and the smaller letter opener she clutched in her hand.

She would not allow it to tremble. When they came for her, her grip on the blade would be steady as she drew it across her throat.

The key rattled in the lock, a more stealthy requiem of the sound she heard every morning, and the front door creaked open.

South Chungcheong rose, going to stand by the window, unable to see more than the moonlight that filtered through the shoji paper, the bars behind it obsidian pillars that threw shadows on the room.

'How pitiable.' A daughter of Korea dying colonized, any warmth left in her body likely to be used by whoever was invading her house.

At least she would die with dignity.

"Go in," a man hissed in Korean, audible through the thin door, likely goading on his partner in crime.

"Alone?" someone whispered back, her voice just as small as his. A woman, shockingly.

Perhaps instead of having their way with her here, she was to be trafficked instead. Though she could not fathom why her 'guards' would ever agree to that. Violating her would not affect her work-spiriting her away assuredly would. They would certainly face punishment from their 'kami' for that.

"Yes, alone," the man snapped quietly. "That's why I brought you."

"Oh." The woman sounded pleased. "Of course."

"Hurry."

There was a soft knock at the door to her room before it gently opened a crack. South Chungcheong brought her blade down from her neck, not wanting to give the invaders the satisfaction of thinking they had frightened her.

But she kept it ready.

"Pardon the intrusion," the soft female voice whispered as a head poked itself into the roof.

Her pale eyes widened, and South Chungcheong's almost did as well.

A Provincehuman, her skin so snowy white it almost glowed in the filaments of moonlight, matching her almond-shaped eyes. South Chungcheong had spent far too much time pouring over maps of the country not to recognize the red outline on her face as that of South Hamgyong province.

Those gleaming eyes flicked to the letter opener in her hand, and South Hamgyong opened the door further, her palms spread peacefully, as if she did not have a pistol at her hip.

"Hello," she said, smiling. "Don't worry, we aren't here to hurt you. Korea, she's here," she said over her shoulder with far too much excitement. "And she's decent."

South Chungcheong stiffened at the name, stopping herself from flinching as someone strode by the province, into her room.

The Korean Countryhuman, the skin revealed by his cloak just as white as South Hamgyong's, though interrupted by the red and blue taegeuk and its black dashes. Not the flag of Japanese Chosen, though that meant little.

He was not a man, but a boy, as was the province. Their voices were small not from whispering, but because they were but children.

His sharp eyes flicked around the room, as if an assailant might be hiding inside her wardrobe or under her futon, before settling on her, stabbing into her own.

“South Chungcheong,” he said, not a query.

The province straightened her shoulders. “I trust you have a good reason for intruding on my rest?”

“We’re here to save you,” South Hamgyong said, glancing over her shoulder before stepping into the room.

There were others outside.

“I was not speaking to you, girl.” South Chungcheong kept her eyes on the male. “What have you done to my guards?”

“We killed them,” Korea said bluntly.

South Chungcheong arched a brow, irked. “You realize the trouble this will cause for me? How am I supposed to explain their deaths?”

“You won’t need to,” he replied. “Like South Hamgyong said- we’re here to get you out.”

How irritating.

“I must have forgotten that I sent a communique indicating that I need your help,” she said, eyes narrowed. “If I did, then disregard it. I do not.”

“You don’t want to be free?” the female asked, sounding stupidly baffled.

“I am free,” South Chungcheong sniffed. “I have a salary, a house, and steady access to groceries. Whereas I assume you intend to recruit me for some venture that involves traipsing across the wilderness, starving, in a badly-stitched Jap uniform.”

She eyed the crooked stitches on the female’s cloak and tunic. The girl’s cheeks turned red to match the province on her face, but her lips lifted in a smile.

“It’s a chance to free our country,” she urged.

Korea stepped forward. “We’ve almost reclaimed all of our provinces. Once we have, we can take the fight to Japan and retake Korea."

"So 'tis you I have to thank for my increased security," South Chungcheong said with disgust.

'Twas not solely the March First Movement and its aftermath then, nor the growing malcontent of those chafing under the Japs. 'Twas this male gallivanting across the countryside with his utilities that had gained her further restrictions.

"I was rather more free before you took up this crusade." She let her irritation show. "Thank you ever so much."

"You weren't free," the girl insisted, still attempting to be warm. "You're slaving away for Japan, helping him Occupy our country."

They had been watching her. That had been the creeping feeling that had followed her this past week as she was ferried to and fro work.

"How did you find me?" she demanded. Had it been some misplaced 'benevolence' from one of the fools she worked with? If so, she was going to find out whom.

"I'll only tell you that if you come with us," Korea said, staring into her eyes. "Will you?"

"No." She lifted her chin. "I am a lady. 'Tis not my purpose."

South Hamgyong's fists clenched, her smile visibly tight. How pathetic.

Though before she could speak, footsteps sounded on the tatami floor of South Chungcheong's sitting room.

Another male barged into the bedroom, a boy, taller than Korea. He moved with confidence and purpose, and it made South Chungcheong's lip curl. Her lip curled even further when she saw the gold sigil on his violet skin.

"Hey, little sister," the male that could only be North Chungcheong province said, his teeth flashing in the dim room. “Nice to meet you.”

“I am no one’s sister,” the Southern Chungcheong said stiffly. “Let alone ‘little.’ Show some respect to a woman you know not.”

His dim-witted smile fell as he looked ‘twixt the other two, realizing their less than pleased stances. “What’s going on?”

“She doesn’t want to come with us,” South Hamgyong said with petulance.

“What?!” the male that had attempted to lay familial claim to her exclaimed.

Korea shushed him harshly. “Be quiet.”

“How can you not want to come with us?” North Chungcheong demanded of her, quieter. “Don’t you want to free our country? Don’t tell me the other half of Chungcheong is a collaborator?”

“I am not ‘half’ of anything,” South Chungcheong scorned. “Just as I am no collaborator. I desire to see the Japs gone as much as any true Korean. But ‘tis not my duty. ‘Tis yours.” She jerked her chin at he and the Countryhuman, not the waif.

“It’s all of our duties,” South Hamgyong said, her voice brimming with vulgar emotion. “We’re Provincehumans.”

“I am a woman first,” she dismissed, not deigning to look her way. “Do you think Silla ever lifted her hand personally ‘gainst Tang? No. Let the men fight their wars. I will stay where it is safe.”

“You can’t just-"

“South Hamgyong,” Korea cut her off, and she quieted obediently.

What an idiotic girl. Did she not understand the dangers of travelling in the wilds with men? Did she think she was safe solely because the boy with the sharp eyes was their Countryhuman? It was not as if Koreas of the past had not taken liberties with their territories before.

He had far more power than her. And South Chungcheong could tell that South Hamgyong let him have it. She would pay for it, someday.

Korea turned back to South Chungcheong, his face set. “You have a duty to our people-"

“Spare me any speeches.” She sliced his words in half with her tongue “I have a duty to myself and no other. I will not go, and that is final.”

“We could just knock you out and take you,” North Chungcheong suggested.

“And will you?” She ignored him, raising her chin haughtily at Korea, looking down on him, daring him to lay a hand on her.

“No,” he said immediately, not accepting her challenge. “I only need willing fighters. If you aren’t, then you’re useless to me.”

“So we’re just going to leave her?” North Chungcheong asked incredulously. He spun to her. “You realize they’re going to crack down on you even more now, right? You’re not even going to be able to breathe without them watching. You’ll be lucky if they don’t lock you up!”

“And whose fault is that?”

“Yours!” he cried, frustrated, though still low.

“Japan’s,” Korea corrected. “It is his fault and his alone.”

“Screw this.” The male province turned away, stomping from the room. “If my ‘sister’ is a nation-traitor coward, then I don’t want one.”

The front door slammed.

South Chungcheong was pleased. Good. She had no desire for a brother, either. Brothers were useful for three things- being head of the household after the patriarch died, marrying you off, and dying in wars. They had no father nor household, she had no desire to marry, and considering he likely would die once their little crusade caught the attention of Japan, there was no point in forming an attachment.

“You should depart as well,” she said, turning her backs to them. “I must wake at my usual time tomorrow, if I wish to avoid any suspicions over the deaths of my guards.”

“You can’t really want this,” South Hamgyong said, disbelief evident in her purposefully soft voice. “You can’t really want to stay here and keep selling yourself to Japan.”

“I am no woman marketing herself in a back alley,” she said cuttingly, casting a glare over her shoulder. “I am a government employee.”

South Hamgyong’s delicate face contorted, finally losing her mask of fake gentility for the briefest of seconds before it returned, her brows furrowing in a way that was sure to leave wrinkles.

“So you truly won’t come with us?”

“No.”

“But-"

“South Hamgyong.” Korea tilted his chin to the door. “Go. I’ll be out in a minute.”

The girl’s clearly callused and blistered hands furled into balls, but she departed, casting one last look at South Chungcheong, something between concern, bewilderment, and a darker force.

South Chungcheong cared not. She only cared that she was now alone with Korea.

Her grip tightened on her letter opener.

“I said spare the speeches,” she said, keeping her voice strong. “I have made my decision. I am not some waif that will bend as you please.”

“I wasn’t going to make a speech.” Korea’s eyes narrowed, piercing into her, though he made no move in her direction. “I only want you to know that you are not free. And if you stay here, you never will be.”

“Says who?”

“You.” His voice was low. “You know that no matter how hard you work, it will never be enough. No matter what you do, how much you slave away, you will still be nothing in their eyes.”

South Chungcheong’s expression cracked, her teeth grating off of each other as the words sparked off her heart as flint and steel.

“What do you know of my work?” she demanded, trying desperately to match his ice. “What do you know of me?”

“I know it chafes that they all look down on you,” he replied, still with his eyes locked to hers. “Every time they force you to do something for them, every time they laugh behind your back, it reminds you that you are powerless to stop it. That they are above you, and they could do anything to you and you wouldn’t be able to stop them.”

South Chungcheong’s chest rose and fell rapidly, her hand clenching rhythmically around her blade. “They cannot lay hands on me. I am a Provincehuman.”

“You are Korean,” Korea replied icily. “And they are Japanese. And you will never be one of them.”

Her lips wobbled and pressed flat.

“Pretend you’re content, pretend you’re fine with going through life being looked down on in your own country,” Korea said, his voice simmering with an ire that rivalled hers. “But no matter how much you do for them, there will always be bars on your window.”

He still stared into her eyes, pinning her to the wall without even touching her.

“So don’t pretend that you are free.”

He turned for the door.

How dare he. How dare he walk in here and speak to her like he knew anything about what she had gone through over these ten years. How dare he speak as if he were anything like her.

How dare he be right.

He said it all as if she were not aware. As if she had not long ago realized that the game she was playing was one that could not be won. That she was just as naïve as the fool girls in the office who batted their lashes and gave false smiles like it would protect them. As if she did not know that it was Japan's world, and more than that, men's world, and she was just living in it, trying to play by their rules while they leered and laughed at her for thinking she was a player like them, waiting for the day they would prove she wasn't.

"Which Provincehumans have you yet to acquire?" she asked suddenly, once her voice could be trusted not to sound like the waif's. "Aside from myself."

Korea half-turned. "The Gyeongsangs and Gyeonggi. He was in the Governor-General's residence on Namsan, but we think he was moved."

South Chungcheong flexed her fingers again, then said, "One week. I will get you the information you seek. But do not return here and do not attempt to converse with me ever again. Just because you stride in here as my Countryhuman does not mean you can simply get what you desire from me."

His eyes did not flicker at her words. "I desire our country's freedom. If you can do anything to get us closer to that, then that's all I need. Whether you join us or not, so long as you remain Korean, Korea is yours, and will be waiting for you once we win."

Korea left without another glance. The door shut and South Chungcheong was, once again, alone.

She would not follow him. She would not give her life into the hands of a man who, even if he held some honour, would lead her into battle against those who had none. She had power here, even if it was only a little, even if it could easily be seized from her. She still had it.

Out there she would have nothing. She would be just another girl at the mercy of the men that were undoubtedly hunting them.

South Chungcheong knew she could never win this game. But she would push back her loss as far as she could, for even one more day.

And now she was going to roll the dice and risk everything she had built for even the chance of what that irritating boy had said in his parting shot.

She was a Korean province. Korea should be hers.

Her eyes narrowed at the door, her hands clenching once more around her letter opener until her lavender knuckles turned almost as white as her country's flag.

'Bastard.'

If 'twere anyone lesser than she, they would not have been able to remain… at work. But she was able to.

All it took was tearing at her clothes, tugging the collar of her choson-ot askew and pulling at the goreum until they were half-undone, opening both the door to her room and that to the outside, then- after a grimace at how uncouth she was about to be- screaming at the top of her lungs.

'Twas not long before the pounding of feet sounded outside as those who guarded the next door manor burst in, their batons at the ready as they looked wildly around her small sitting room.

South Chungcheong quickly emerged from her bedroom, not wanting to let them set foot in it, clutching the collar of her jeogori.

“It took you quite long enough,” she said scathingly. “The fiends escaped before you lackwits even breached the gate.”

The eyes of the men darkened at her words, but she interrupted before they could say anything inane.

“Where are my guards? Are they not supposed to keep me safe from hooligans trying to accost me?”

“Ah, bad news Miss-"

“Ma’am,” she corrected icily.

“M-Ma’am,” the man said awkwardly. “Your guards are all dead.”

“Then what was their use?” She straightened. “I will not sleep here tonight. Take me to the Governor-General’s residence. I demand to speak with him at once.”

A bit of coercion and she got her wish, being taken to the residence at the foot of Namsan, where a bleary-eyed Saito Makoto listened as she recounted the false event with a suitable level of aggravation. Quite simple, since she was incredibly aggravated.

Perhaps the Governor-General and his men harboured suspicions on how a gang of thugs had infiltrated an affluent neighbourhood, eliminated six men without flaw, and vanished before anyone could arrive on the scene. But if they did, they were ground to dust under South Chungcheong’s heel as she demanded more guards and safer quarters so that there would never be a repeat of the incident.

What if it had not been Korea at her door? What if it truly had been a gang of hooligans, either radicals or simply those that believed they could make money off of a female Provincehuman? Or what if Korea had been the sort to take liberties with his subdivisions? The idea that her guards could be taken out so easily was unacceptable. And the more she had, the more difficult it would be for one of them to convince the rest to enact her initial fear from when that thump had first awakened her.

And perhaps it would keep those two fool provinces and their Countryhuman from attempting to sway her again.

In the end, she was given ten new men to watch over her, armed with batons and pistols, and a room at Namsan.

She did not approve of sleeping in the same building as men, or the Governor-General, but she accepted that the walls would provide some safety, as would having staff members nearby. Not that she trusted that any of the lower-class men and skittish women would be of any help in any situation, let alone one where her dignity was at risk.

Saito offered her the next day to rest, but she refused it. If she took days off, her usefulness would lower in his eyes. Yet if she went in after a traumatic experience, it would rise. She would become even more irreplaceable.

'You will never be one of them.'

Very well. But she could at least avoid being tossed out as trash.

Her routine returned to normal, with slight variations.

She arose in the morning, climbed into the personal car, was driven to the City Hall, entered, ignored the mundane greetings from the office filth, sat at her desk, went over proposals and laws, another against the wearing of white clothes, more police, bigger prisons, more Shinto shrines, more obedience to Japan.

She found her fingers digging into the papers, leaving inkstain fingerprints as she sorted them into order of importance.

Ignore those around her more, fend off unwanted advances, work late into the night, march by her guards, all awake and waiting, be driven back to Namsan, fall asleep as soon as her head hit the pillow. Arise and do it again. And again. For three more days.

On the sixth after Korea had so presumptuously barged into her life, she deviated. Not suspiciously so. It was not the first time she had supped with the Governor-General's wife. Drinking tea and nibbling on expensive foods with a woman of such high status was a way to claim even more of it for yourself, after all.

And for some reason, Saito's wife was enamoured with her, despite South Chungcheong making no effort to curb her tongue in her presence. The middle-aged woman invited her over far too frequently, even before she had shared a domicile with her. The province usually declined, since she could not stand the miserable wench.

"And then I said, 'I would say that obi adds twenty pounds to her at least.'" Saito's wife burst into titters at her own remembered comment, while South Chungcheong sipped her tea from the delicate, sakura-patterned cup.

"Quite," she said, then scrunched her face. "You," she snapped at the maidservant standing by the door.

The girl jumped. "Y-Yes, Miss?"

"That's ma'am to you, peon. Do you call this tea?" South Chungcheong tipped her matcha at her to display the vivid green liquid. "I understand you Japanese think this swill is palatable, but I posses a more refined palate. Bring me something that does not taste like grass."

The girl looked askance at Saito's wife with wide eyes, and the woman waved a hand.

"Go, go. Chuseinan-san is a guest, serve her what she likes."

The servant bowed at a sharp angle, then scampered out of the parlour with her head down, long skirt bustling.

Saito's wife took the opportunity to pull a small bottle from the pocket of her blush pink foreign dress, downing it in one swig. Judging from the reek of her breath, it was not her first of the eve.

South Chungcheong looked away in disgust, examining the white Western-style furnishings and gold-lined wallpaper with an equal amount of it.

For however much the Japs enjoyed imposing their aesthetics on Korea, they seemed to enjoy imposing Western aesthetics on themselves. It made sense, she supposed. Saito Makoto had studied in the United States of America, another meddlesome country with no sense of architectural integrity.

"I think you scared Kazuko-chan again," the woman giggled, another bottle downed, her usual formal Japanese washed away by it.

"A strong breeze would scare the waif," South Chungcheong said with disdain. "She lacks a spine as well as brains."

Saito's wife laughed. "Chuseinan-san has such a pretty face, but such a mean mouth. She'll never make a good bride."

"I have no desire to be one."

"No?" Saito's wife asked, frowning. "Every girl should want to be a bride. You're the perfect age for it. The younger you start, the better chance you have of bearing a son."

"I cannot bear children," South Chungcheong replied bluntly. And if she could, if ever were she forced to engage in the act to conceive, she would slit her throat before her stomach could start to swell.

"Truly?" The woman's brows furrowed. "I'm so sorry."

She was like all the other females, pasting on a gentle expression as if she were sorrowed, instead of revealing the darker emotion the province could see glittering in her eyes.

Saito's wife's voice held none of her envy as she said, "It's a shame that you wouldn't make a good bride. If you did, you might be able to marry Japan-sama."

"Bite your tongue," the province said sharply, but the woman had sunk too deep in her drink to pay her any heed.

"I suppose your standing isn't high enough, anyway," she sighed, slumping onto the table. "A country as powerful as Japan-sama could never wed a foreign province. It's a shame. Do you think the Korean Countryhuman is a woman? Maybe that's why she hides herself away. Your women used to do that, right?"

The province did not reply, letting her babble as she waited.

"It would be nice if your country and mine could wed," Saito's wife murmured. "Then we could… all get along, and everyone could be… happy."

She trailed off into a snore, able to sleep untroubled, though every joining of her country's and South Chungcheong's had always been forced, and always would be.

South Chungcheong wasted no time. The Governor-General had went on one of his 'tours' today, hosting banquets for the rich landowners and Western missionaries, which meant his private rooms were empty of all but his unconscious wife. And the hapless serving girl would still be in the kitchens, engaged in the time-consuming process of making proper tea.

The man's room was large, with more Western-style furniture, not even his private life free of foreign influence. The son of a samurai sleeping in a four-poster bed, an apt description of his country's empty 'Nationalism.'

South Chungcheong rummaged through one nightstand, moving swiftly and silently, deftly replacing anything she pulled out. Medals, matches, ammunition.

The other nightstand was the same. Despite this being a shared room, his wife had left little imprint on it, even in seven months of living here.

Her heart pounded as she sifted through useless trinkets and memorabilia. If the Governor-General returned and found her here, alone in his room…

Cursing Korea, she searched faster, hands shaking, and then, under a photograph of Saito Makoto dressed in a uniform, thirty years younger and forty pounds lighter, she found it.

A key ring, and on it, an old brass key.

She slipped it free and clutched it tight, its cold teeth cutting into her palm.

Success.

With a quick glance to make sure she had left nothing out of place, she departed, quickly marching down the hall to the parlour. She had barely slid back into her seat when the serving girl came back into the room with a tray in her hands.

“Here you go, ma’am-"

“Does it look like we are still taking tea?” South Chungcheong asked snootily. “Use your eyes, girl. My hostess has drank herself into a coma again. Escort me from her suite.”

“Y-Yes, ma’am.” The girl ducked her head and led her from the rooms, docile as a lamb.

She would be taken advantage of eventually, either by a member of the guard, a fellow servant trying to feel powerful by dominating one of the few people he could, or by the Governor-General himself, bored of his aging wife.

South Chungcheong did not care. She had acquired what she had came for.

The next step was simple. She knew where she needed to go. She had spent five years of her life in that miserable City Hall. She knew where every filing cabinet was, every office.

Every locked room.

She went to sleep, the key hidden inside her shift, and fell into an uneasy sleep plagued by dreams of men bursting into her room, tearing her clothes from her, taking the key alongside her dignity.

Arise, drive, ignore, sit, work work work, rise.

She gathered up her papers as usual, neatly tapping them on the desk, leaving those that the Governor-General would want out, while she put the other under her arm, striding through the dark, empty corridors.

Her heels did not click. They never did at night, when the lights were off and the offices were empty. The sound would be a beacon, letting any man still stalking the halls know that there was a woman with him. That they were alone.

Thin grey light seeped from the glass windows that showcased the offices, coming in from outside. It brushed her skin as she travelled through the darkness, down to the ground floor.

As she passed through the lobby, she paid no heed to her guards gathered by the door. They were already used to her ignoring them, as she had for the past week.

Her path brought her to the back rooms, where she filed away her paperwork, as expected. But tonight, she did not depart for the lobby at once. Instead, she found the stairs to the subterrain floor that housed the archives, the one that almost no one ever visited.

But she had, when sorting the old records of Seoul in an effort to be seen as even more dedicated to her job. And once, when she had been hidden among the dusty old shelves, selecting every file she could find from the year 1900, she had overheard the new Governor-General be informed by Japan's aide that he would be kept updated on 'their movements,' and that he in turn would update Japan. That everything that was known about 'them' was to be kept confidential, at risk of being charged with treason.

Information about Korea was to be kept top-secret.

The words had stilled her, as she had realized if she was caught overhearing them, even by accident, she would be in danger. She had quickly extinguished her candle and crouched among the old records, waiting, listening as a door was opened, then shut. When she had confirmed the two men were inside, she had hastened away. Returning later had confirmed that the old door, half-hidden by shelving sagging under the weight of its history, was locked.

She went to this door now, finding the lamp she always kept down here, and pulled the brass key from her shift, inserting it into the lock.

It didn't turn.

What a fool she would feel if she could not keep her word. She would be glad that she would not be forced to look upon Korea again, in that case.

She grit her teeth, removing the key and forcing it in, twisting it hard. This time, the mechanism turned, and the door swung open.

Heart racing, she stepped inside.

The room was small and dusty, along with most of the shelves, filled with old binders and scrolls. But the low light of the lamp revealed that one section was cleaner than the rest, the dossiers in it recently disturbed.

South Chungcheong went to them, examining unmarked spines. She pulled one down at random, flipping it open to find a grainy sepia-toned photo of a province with a snarl on her face, looking into the camera like a prisoner, a blur around her as if she had not been sitting willingly still.

'Heiannan-do, 1919,' the spindly kanji under it said. South Pyongan province.

She spared no time for the rest of the words, placing it back onto the shelf, pulling the others down, glancing briefly at the photos or sketches attached, along with the names. There was not time to find out who these people were. She had not desired to these past four years and she did not desire to now.

Gyeonggi's was the third she pulled down, a round-faced boy with an attached photo, his big eyes staring into the camera. She flipped through the thin dossier, noting his past locations, finding his current.

There. Last year he had been moved to a demesne outside the city, a Japanese politician's Korean home.

South Chungcheong brought out the paper and pencil she had shoved into her choson-ot, swiftly copying out the information before placing it back on the shelf, searching for the Gyeongsangs.

She found Korea's folder, thicker than the rest, glanced at the picture of him, four men restraining his arms and one with his hand squeezed around his neck, forcing him to look into the camera with furious eyes, and shoved it back. He thought he knew her. She did not need to know why. He was a male. He could never understand how she had been forced to survive.

South Gyeongsang's was thinner than Gyeonggi's, her photo only a sketch. She had never been in official Japanese custody, then. Her whereabouts were listed as 'unknown,' though her last known location had been South Chungcheong's own lands, ironically enough, two years ago.

North Gyeongsang's were unknown entirely. His last sighting had been in South Jeolla, but it had been in 1913, near the beginning of the Occupation. Near useless.

South Gyeongsang's information may as well also be. She had been sighted walking down a country road in the middle of nowhere with an unidentified woman. Two years was plenty of time to take that road anywhere.

But South Chungcheong had retrieved Gyeonggi's. She had done what she had said she would. Korea could not say she was not Korean now.

She replaced the dossiers just as she had found them, turned for the door, then spun irritably back, checking the first page of the remaining folders, ignoring South Hamgyong's, beyond noting that she had a photo, and that she wore a fake smile above the collar of an expensive-looking kimono, proving that her claim of South Chungcheong 'selling herself to Japan' had merely been projection.

North Chungcheong's only had a sketch. A boy in a white shirt with bags of grain slung over his broad shoulders, his face half-turned with a slight grin, not even aware that someone was capturing his likeness to create a profile.

She did not let her eyes flick over the words, putting it back with force.

She had gotten what she came for. She should leave. She needed to hurry.

Yet her hand reached out for the folder next to North Chungcheong's, pulling it down and flipping it open.

Her own portrait stared back, angled brows that were not yet arched enough, looking too concerned, a slight curl of the lip, but not enough to convey utter disgust at having to sit still for the photo, eyes that held more anxiety than disdain. A little girl that was pretending to be a woman.

'Chuseinan-do, 1910.' Her likeness had been captured on her first day of work.

Despite being in captivity since the beginning, her folder was one of the thinner ones, with only three pages, barely half-filled. The first held her physical details, her measurements and colouring. The second was her actions, detailing her start at Taejon with Pak Jung-yang and leading up to the current day, a timeline of her servitude. The final was a profile of her personality, listing traits and observations made by… whom? Pak Jung-yang and the Governor-Generals? Her unpleasant colleagues? Her guards? Or some other unknown observer?

'Subject 3 is a hard worker. Tendency to rise early and leave late. Irascible. Does not work well with others. Skilled at finding vulnerable points in conversation. Occasional use of anti-Japanese language seems to be a part of her general disdain for all around her; have a suspicion she would use anti-Korean slurs if she weren't one of them. Subject displayed no interest towards the uprising in March, and has referred to the riots following as 'fool radicals.' Once alerted task force to attempt to kidnap her made by anti-Japan group, May 1919. Despite her general bearing, there seems to be little threat of her willingly joining Subject 1 or compromising Subject 2. Loyal servant of His Divine Majesty.'

South Chungcheong's long nails scraped the back of the dossier as heat rose in her breast, tightening her jaw.

'Loyal servant of His Divine Majesty.'

There was a note under it to clean up the language as whoever saw fit before turning the notes over for Japan's personal files.

The idea of that country sitting across the sea, reading those words about her…

She deliberately placed the dossier back on the shelf and walked out, keeping her pace even and her expression cold. Precision, poise, grace. She had never been able to afford hysterics and she could not now.

In the lobby she walked past her guards, chin held high, ignoring them as usual, the key safely secreted back in her choson-ot to be replaced in Saito's nightstand on the morrow, loose, as if it had merely slid off the ring, in case he had noticed its absence.

Once outside in the damp spring air, she let the scrap of paper in her sleeve fall, not turning as it fluttered to the ground.

The men around her noticed not. Their eyes were focused outwards, seeing her not as a threat, but as a 'loyal servant.'

But if the fool boy with the sharp eyes and his falsely cheery female were watching as sharply as they had been, then they would get what they sought. If they were not, then more the fool them.

Either way, South Chungcheong could wash her hands of this business.

—

September

Of course, 'twas hard to keep one's hands clean when one's… distant acquaintances were off making theirs bloody.

In August, for some reason that the morons around her refused to elaborate on, South Chungcheong was suddenly sentenced to house arrest, no longer allowed to visit the City Hall for work or to even step outside of Namsan.

And the window in her guest quarters had been renovated. Bars now graced it.

South Chungcheong grit her teeth as she passed her fingers over their cool surfaces. The windows here were built in the Western style. There was not even any shoji paper to allow her to pretend she was not caged in.

Certainly it had been something Korea and his bands of fools had done. Perhaps they had found the others, and now she was the last province to remain in Japanese hands.

Which meant she could look forward to this imprisonment for the next few decades, or however long it took for them to win their war, if they even did. Lovely.

She was still brought work- proposals and budgets for her to look through. But she was no longer able to fetch the Governor-General reports or file them for him. She could not intimidate meetings into postponement or instruct others to get their work done on time. Staying up into the late hours to work was now pointless, as no one would see unless she descended to the sitting room, in which case she would be flaunting herself, practically daring any servants prowling the halls to accost her.

She could not stop them. They were not lesser workers toiling under her. They had their own, separate hierarchy that she was not a part of. She could see it in their eyes that whenever they heeded her demands for fresh bedclothes or more tea, they were simply humouring her at Saito's request.

No amount of bullying or scathing criticism could convince the Governor-General to release her. Because in the end, he had been the one to give her power to her.

And now he had taken it back.

South Chungcheong had not yet lost. But she would soon. The longer she stayed locked up in this manor, the less she became a secretary and the more she became just a woman in a room. A girl, undefended and alone. A simple household utility, like all females, ready to be used like one.

Her fingers wrapped around the bars, squeezing.

—

October

Arise, work on embroidery until her work was brought to her, there was no one to ignore or fend away in the room, so she could only work work work work work work with no one to bear witness to the hours she spent so dedicated and focused, be unable to fetch more when she was finished, so embroider more until someone came to collect what she had done, turn down an invitation from Saito's wife, pretend to be a proper lady by embroidering more, slumber, be visited with dreams of the door unlocking from the outside and portly Saito Makoto striding into her room, not even needing to creep, arise and do it all over and over and over and

—

November

Arise, embroider, work, finish, be unable to be useless for even a single minute so embroider again, hand over her work, embroider more, finally accept Saito's wife's invitation to come upstairs for tea.

Visiting her was a fine line. Drinking tea with the lady of the house imparted status on her. Yet now that she lived in the same house as not solely a guest, if she came at her beck and call, that status could be considered 'servant.'

"Your embroidery is so nice," Saito's wife squinted in the yellow light at the flowers South Chungcheong was stitching onto her jasu hoop. "I taught you how, but you're already better than me."

"You did not teach me," the province answered stiffly, threading the needle through the fabric. "You simply provided the materials. And you would be more skilled if you drank less."

Saito's wife laughed, her hands trembling on her tea cup. "My honoured husband likes me better when I drink. He says I act more like I did when I was young and fun."

"You are forty-seven," South Chungcheong said. "He should desire you to act like a lady."

"'Good wife and wise mother,'" the woman murmured, her eyes distant as she took another sip of her drink, tossing the tea back in a decidedly unladylike fashion. "Or maybe I should be more like you."

"You could never be like me," South Chungcheong denied. "You are far too pathetic."

There was no true danger in insulting the woman. She had no say in household affairs. So long as South Chungcheong remained of use, Saito Makoto would not discard her.

"You're such a bitch," Saito's wife slurred, resting her head on her arms, nuzzling into them.

South Chungcheong did not react to the epithet. 'Twas far from the first time she had it bequeathed unto her.

She had to be a bitch, a harpy, a cunt. She had to be whatever men wished to call her, so long as it was not 'seditious.'

"That's why I like you so much," the woman said unexpectedly, half-raising her head to look at her with a soulful brown eye. A strand of black hair had come loose from her artful bun to hang across it. "You're not afraid of what people think of you. It's like you want them to hate you."

"Is there a point to you telling me this?" South Chungcheong inquired, arching a brow. "Or is the drink simply running your tongue now?"

"See?" Saito's wife giggled. "I could have you caned for that. But you don't even care. You even stand up to the men."

She did not. If she stood up to them, then she would have stopped Pak Jung-yang from luring girls in, or ordered Saito to attend to his wife more, or demanded to speak to Japan, to tell him just what she thought of this Occupation of his, and to try to eliminate him.

All she did was lash out until she had made herself as undesirable as possible, because no one would reach for a fruit covered in spines over one limned with soft fuzz.

"If I were more like you when I was younger…" Saito's wife took in a shuddering breath, hiding her face. "Maybe I wouldn't be married to someone twenty years my senior. Maybe I'd be married to someone I loved."

"Doubtful," South Chungcheong dismissed. "You are a woman of good blood, if any Japanese can be said to be. You never would have been allowed to pick your partner."

"Hah!" Saito's wife laughed bitterly, her voice quiet. "You're probably right. But still, I wish…"

With a heartfelt sigh, Saito Haruko lapsed into silence. After a few seconds, she began to snore softly.

South Chungcheong left the dregs of her tea, marching past the serving girl, who was pressed to the wall as if she had not been listening.

"I can escort you to your room, Chuseinan-san," she said.

"Have you not seen that I have my own escort, or are you blind, girl?"

The servant flinched. "N-No, ma'am, but…" Her lips pressed together anxiously. "Please."

That was a poor sign. One that South Chungcheong wanted nothing to do with.

"Begging gets you nowhere."

She strode off, ignoring the girl as she scampered behind her contingent of guards, slamming the door in her face.

A few seconds later, there was a knock. And another.

"Ma'am?" the girl called. "The Lady of the House has been missing her favourite necklace since the last time you visited her. She was being too polite to ask you about it, but I told her I would search your room."

Oh, that little harlot. If South Chungcheong was accused of stealing-

She yanked open the door, her face cold. "Very well. Search. I assure you your mistress has likely misplaced it in one of her stupors."

The girl slipped im, closing the door on the guards as South Chungcheong went to the window, ignoring her.

"Chuseinan-do-san-"

"Speak Korean, wench."

"South Chungcheong-do," the girl said, her voice a mere whisper. "I have a message for you."

Her fingers tightened on the sill. "I do not wish to hear it."

The girl was undeterred, for once showing some spine. "It's from someone I know from the paper. They want to know…" She lowered her voice even further, a mere brush of sound. "Do you want out?"

"Did I give you permission to rummage through my wardrobe?" South Chungcheong asked loudly, not turning. "I will remove my things, you need not touch my clothes to search them."

"Yes, ma'am," the girl replied before switching back to a whisper. "I'm going to the market tomorrow. I can tell them if you want to be rescued."

'Rescued.' As if she were a damsel in distress instead of someone who had worked herself to the bone to be here in this cage.

"You're in danger, ma'am," the girl whispered, stepping closer. "I hear things. Saito-sama is worried. I don't know why, but he thinks you might betray him, and he doesn't want to take the full blame and be executed if you do.

“He wants to invite Japan here to meet you.”

South Chungcheong’s nails dug into the sill as her insides turned as cold as the dark, snowy mountain outside.

Japan. Whom may as well be the most powerful person in the world. Whom she had done so well in avoiding all these years, until now that the lackwits in charge had decided that since Korea and the other provinces were taking action, she might as well.

She had worked so hard, made herself so useful, and still…

‘You will never be one of them.’

“Ma’am.” The girl was right behind her now, her voice low and fervent, her native tongue clunky after so much disuse.

“Do you want to be free?”

South Chungcheong did not want to be one of them. She had never wanted to be Japanese, or a man. She was Korean and a woman and she wanted this world that belonged to Japan and men like him destroyed. She wanted Korea and his band of idiots to succeed.

But she had nothing to contribute to that. If she were freed, she would be naught but a dead weight. She was a girl. She could not fight, could not hunt or survive in the wilderness. And she did not want to, and should not have to. She was a lady, like Silla had been.

If she were dragged into the frigid winter landscape beyond her bars, she would be useless. And useless women were fated to die at the hands of men, or worse.

At least here she could wear fine clothes, have a warm meal and good cup of tea before she parted her throat, unsullied.

“No,” she said, not turning around, her voice as cold as the frosted bars. “I do not want to be free.”

There was a silence. Then soft footsteps, and the sound of a door closing. The lock *‘snick’*ed shut.

South Chungcheong inhaled shakily, then went to bed to continue her routine, falling into dreams of a bloody red sun rising above the horizon, burning her to ash.

Arise, embroider, work work work, demand more work, work, work hard enough that she could not be discarded, finish, embroider with hands that would not stop shaking however much she cursed them, stare out the window, slumber, try not to remember her dreams, arise and do it again and again as the sand in her hourglass ran out, counting down to the day she would lose the only thing she had ever had.

Until she woke to find the house on fire.

She was crammed in her chair by the window, her knees drawn up to her chest, clutching her jasu hoop to it, holding the embroidered mountain magnolias close, the wooden band that contained them leaving imprints cut into her fingers.

At first, she knew not what had awakened her. Perhaps some shadow that had flickered by outside. Her room was dark, the lamp long since burned out, the only light illuminating the stitches she set in her lap coming from the window, pale scarlet flickering across her numb legs.

Scarlet. And orange. It crept into the room, rusting her gleaming new bars like the ones on her old house. ‘Twas not the silver colour of moonshine.

Just as she stood, kneading feeling into her tingling thigh, men’s voices raised in the hall, alarmed and loud. She spun, pressing her back to the bars, too disoriented to compose herself as the door burst open, one of the guards clearing her room with a gleaming rifle.

“What is transpiring?” South Chungcheong managed to say, trying to recover from her lapse. “Tell me.”

“Fire on the grounds,” he clipped, eyeing her window.

She straightened, trying to still her heart. “Then should we not evacuate?”

“No.”

“I do not wish to be here if there is a fire outside my window.” She stormed the door. “I demand you tell me what is going on.”

“Go back to sleep.” The man left, and her lock snapped back into place.

There was nothing she could do to open it, and any further demands or shouting would only make her appear childish. She huffed, gripping her jasu hoop as she went back to her window, straining to see the fire.

Namsan Residence was built on the slopes of the titular mountain, her window facing its low peak. Her room was in the southwest corner, farthest from the dark treeline. Her view of the rest of it was blocked by the asymmetrical southeast wing, but it seemed that was where the firelight originated from.

A forest fire? The summer had not been so hot as to kindle one, so it seemed unlikely now that the leaves had turned.

Her pointed nails scraped chips of white paint from the sill.

As if she could sleep when the cries of men echoed from within and out the manor. Fire, regardless of what had started it, meant chaos. And chaos meant the disintegrating of hierarchies and rules.

It meant danger.

She turned her chair to the side, pointedly ignoring the window as she set back to work on her embroidery, dipping her fingers in water to slick the fraying thread as if it were her nerves before starting on the next magnolia petal.

She had never seen the flower with her own eyes before. It grew not in the Governor-General’s gardens, a more wild plant than the hibiscus that she ordered brought to her office at the start of every week. She had only ever seen it in paintings, a sea of white at the foot of mountains she would never catch more than a glimpse of.

Her hands shook on the needle and thread, and her next stitch went astray.

She trembled with the desire to draw her knees to her chest again, trembled with how badly she desired not to. Ladies did not bury their faces in their knees and stain their work with tears. They held it back with anything necessary. Tears were weak, and a weak woman was vulnerable.

Her eyes closed tight as she clutched at her jasu hoop. But it was not hers. It was Saito's wife's, which meant it was Saito's, which meant it was Japan's. Like the room she was sat in, the bed she slept in, the room she inhabited, the manor she was in and those before it. Everything in her life was someone else's, down to the clothes she wore and the food she ate and the thread she used to make these worthless little flowers.

There was no world in which it was not. Even if she had been born to a free Korea, she would still be a woman. Her possessions, her power, her body, would have only ever been hers courtesy of the men above her choosing to let her keep them. She would have been like Saito Haruko, her bedroom full of things that were not hers and a man she did not choose, her only freedom that of drowning herself in drink.

Her things had never been hers, and her power had been repossessed. The only thing South Chungcheong had left was her body, and not even that. It was captive within these walls, as it had been in the City Hall and the Provincial Office.

All she truly had left, the only thing she had had since the start, was her dignity. For however long she was allowed to keep it.

She pressed her face into the mountain magnolias, crushing them to her with her knees as she held them close, desperately fighting the tears attempting to force their way from her, knowing it was a game she would lose, like every other.

She was, in the end, only a girl.

She barely noticed as the door was opened again and she was dragged from her chair, jasu hoop still dangling from one hand. Any attempt to right herself would quickly be undone by her small body and their long legs. Any attempt to smack the hands off her would only result in laughter from the men, or perhaps a strike in return since the situation was serious enough for the stench of smoke to be crawling through the unlit halls.

She could not bear the indignity. She could no longer bear it.

Saito and his wife were gone, evacuated long before the rest of the household. Or perhaps just before her, as the servants were already gathered on the drive, dressed in their nightclothes, cries of confusion and alarm rising with the smoke coming from the trees behind the house, and now the building itself. It looked as if the southeast wing had been set ablaze, flames rising from below the tile roof.

Not an accident of nature or man, then. Very well. She cared not.

When the shooting started, she did not care, either. She only hoped that one of the bullets would strike her dead before whichever idiots had thought to ‘save’ her this time reached her. Even then, she would not die. She would awaken and have to accept whatever had been done to her body as she had recovered, her only possession stripped away before she stripped her own life away.

She had not been able to fetch her letter opener. As her guards started to hustle her down the road amidst the chaos of fleeing servants, she could only stumble along on useless legs. If they desired to rape or sell her, she would not be able to stop them. She never truly had. But at least she could have given them the dissatisfaction of a cooling body. Now she could not even do that.

She only broke from her stupor when one of the men holding her went reeling back, and something hot sprayed her. Blood.

A serving girl screamed, and one of the house guards roared from towards the manor, “THEY’RE AVOIDING SERVANTS! GET THE PROVINCE IN WITH THEM!”

One of South Chungcheong's guards wrapped his arms around her waist, lifting her as effortlessly as a cat, more touch than she had ever been forced to endure, and something in her snapped.

"Don't touch me!" she cried in revulsion, struggling fiercely, her elbow finding ribs.

"Don't shoot!" someone shouted. "You'll hit-!"

"I've got it!" a girl, this time familiar, called back, and the arms restraining South Chungcheong finally slackened as the man grunted in pain, staggering back with a bullet in his side.

South Chungcheong hit the ground, scrabbling back, the night a confusion of screaming, roaring flames and cracking guns.

She ran.

She didn't know where she intended to go, only that she needed to get away, away from the men that owned her, away from those that would if they could, and away from the stupid boy that apparently could not take no for an answer. Here in the burning night, she was nothing and everyone was a danger.

There was nowhere to go. By separating herself, she had put herself in more danger, like those fool girls that lingered in the office alone, without even a sharp tongue to defend them. But staying would have been a danger, too. Enraged men with their blood up, whatever little reason they possessed dispersed by the thrill of combat.

Nowhere was safe. Her blade and shield were nothing in the woods, she was nothing, and the person she could hear pounding behind her, calling out, had almost caught her.

There was another call, a snarl of irritation, then she was being sent to the forest floor as someone plowed into her back. She was spared the cut of twigs and stones as her attacker twisted in mid-air so that he- of course it was he- hit the ground instead of she. But the breath was still driven from her lungs by the force of her impact into his chest, with no chance to recover it before she was tossed aside, rolling away.

She blinked up at the stars glimmering through the canopy, not bothering to brush away the leaf that spiralled down onto her chest, nor to move. She would not give him the satisfaction of fighting back. What was the point when it would only humiliate her further?

No man's face blocked her view of the stars, though. There was only a cough and rustle as her assaulter sat up.

“Ssi-bal, what is wrong with you?” Korea wheezed angrily, still less out of breath than she even after being crushed betwixt her and the ground. “Didn’t you hear me calling your name?”

“I… do not have to… come when called.” South Chungcheong managed to sound as haughty as she usually did, though still breathless, unused to exercise.

“Where were you even going?” he demanded.

“None of… your concern.”

She would never be safe, no matter where she had went. The most she could hope for was a steep cliff or a cold river.

South Chungcheong made herself sit, trying to regain some dignity, though her legs trembled too much to stand. The jasu hoop was no longer in her hands.

“Do you make a habit of accosting women in the woods?” she sniffed as Korea brushed leaf litter from his Jap cloak.

He stopped to glower at her. “Only when they take off running in the middle of battle after saying they wanted to be freed.”

The audacity.

She arched a brow. “And just when did I say that? I recall saying that I never desired to see you again.”

“A worker here, Oh Sang-yong, knows an… associate of ours.” Something flickered across the male’s face at the words, vague discomfort. “She told her you wanted out.”

That must be the true name of the serving girl, though South Chungcheong had only ever heard her referred to as Kazuko, as Saito Haruko had difficulties with Korean names.

‘That little viper.’ Why ask her in the first place if she intended to disregard her answer? She must have truly wanted South Chungcheong away from her.

“Well, you were misinformed,” she said, looking away. “I still possess no desire to-"

“Shut up.”

Jaw feathering, South Chungcheong said coolly, “Excuse me? Do you think just because I am a province, you can order me to-"

“I’m telling you to shut up because you’re being an idiot,” Korea growled, shifting onto his knees. “I know that you want out of there. I know you want to be free.”

Her teeth creaked. “You know no such thing.”

“The rest of my provinces are risking their lives and their freedom back there to save you.” Korea flung a hand in the direction of the road, where gunshots still echoed.

“And did I ask them to do that?” She raised her chin. “No.”

“No, and I didn’t ask you to get me Gyeonggi and South Gyeongsang’s information,” Korea retorted. “But you did. You risked your life to do it.”

“I risked nothing,” South Chungcheong said stiffly, but he spoke over her.

“Your information allowed me to free them,” Korea insisted. “I have almost all my provinces now, thanks to you. All but one.”

He leaned towards her, though he was not close enough to invade her space.

“And I am not going to lose my final province to Japan because she is too stubborn to admit she wants to be free.” His jaw was set and serious, his eyes pinning her in place, though she wanted to try fleeing again. “I only want you with me if you’re willing, but I can’t leave you here now.”

His gaze gleamed with a raw intensity that made her give in to the urge to cross her arms.

“I’m not going to let you get hurt because you were too scared to escape. I won’t.”

“I am scared of nothing,” South Chungcheong replied stiffly.

“You are,” Korea growled. “You’re afraid of fighting for our freedom. You’re afraid of trying. You think the torture you know is better than what might happen to you if we lose. You’re an idiot and a coward.”

“Bite your-"

“But we are not going to lose.” Korea stood, but came no closer, spearing her to the ground with his glare. “We are going to win. And I am going to have all of my provinces there when we do. I am not going to lose anyone- because they were too scared to leave.”

His hands curled into tight fists before one extended to her.

“So get up. Come with me. Come make our country ours again.”

South Chungcheong stared at the palm proffered to her, the moonlight coming through the trees revealing the callused pads and scars that marred the lines on it, like that other province girl had had. Her heart beat in her chest like an animal trying to escape.

Her throat worked dryly, until the words came out. “You said it yourself, did you not? I will be of no use to you.”

Korea’s gaze did not waver. “I would rather have you useless than dead.”

“War is no place for a woman,” she tried.

“Revolution is the place of anyone who wants to free themselves,” Korea refuted firmly. “And women were in chains long before Japan ever Occupied us. You have more reason to fight than most.”

His gaze did flicker then, back towards the gunshots, for the briefest of moments.

South Chungcheong’s fingers curled into the folds of her chima. “You are a man and my Countryhuman, but you would make me fight. You would make me risk everything I am to fight for you, when it should be you fighting for me."

“And what are you?” Korea asked, his voice as icy as the winter she would be heading into if she went with him. “What exactly are you risking?”

“My dignity.”

“You have no dignity,” he replied scathingly, making her bristle. “You worked for the enemy, helping them Occupy us, and now you sit and rot in a Jap’s household. You have nothing.”

She could not make herself reply, nails digging into her skin.

“The only thing you are is Korean,” Korea said. “That is all you have. And no matter what happens to you, you will still have that. Unless you keep working for Japan.”

“I had to,” she rasped, the shame she had spent so long trying to smother flooding her breast, making her traitorous eyes sting. “Do not act as if I did it willingly. I had to.”

Korea’s palm remained implacably offered. “And now you don’t. I am fighting for you. And I want you to fight with me.”

The breath South Chungcheong had previously caught had escaped her, her chest rising and falling rapidly as he stole her air from her again, her fingers clenching over and over in the moist carpet of leaves.

She did. She still had to. What else was there? If she left on this mad crusade of his, then it meant every day would be one in which her body could be stolen from her, her pride expunged, made to be nothing but a-

Just like here, where she spent every day playing a game that was winding down, one she knew she could never be a victor in.

But if she left with him, then it meant it had all been for nothing. The burnt history, passing on proposals to restrict their culture, serving vile men that would sooner have her bent over their desk than handing them budgets for stupid fucking coasters. Selling herself. The fine line. The game.

"You were not there to protect me." She raised her head to Korea, trying to make it sound more like a judgement than a childish scold.

"No," he said plainly, his face shadowed. "I wasn't."

"Then you will now," she said, making herself look someone fully in the eyes for the first time instead of through them. "If I go with you, you will protect me. It is your duty as a man and Countryhuman."

"I will teach you to protect yourself," Korea responded, unmoved by her demand. "But I'll tell you what I told the rest of my provinces- I will never let you get taken by the enemy. We are at war. You will get hurt, you will starve and get sick and suffer."

He took another step forward, further into the moonlight, staring down at her yet not looking down, though he now stood over her.

"But you will never be enslaved again. If you choose to be free, then you will remain free. I promise."

His voice was as impassioned as his gaze, filled with more emotion than she had ever seen in a man. One that was not anger or lust, anyways.

It was disgusting. His passion was based on nothing. He had no way to guarantee her safety, and would not even promise to protect her wholly. She should not have to learn to protect herself- 'twas his job. His job that he had not even attempted to fulfill until ten years into this cursed Occupation.

And yet, when Korea bared his pointed fangs and ordered, “Now get off your damn knees and be a Korean,” South Chungcheong stood, holding herself steady.

At least she had not had to take his hand. Small victories.

“Good.” He said nothing more about her giving in, turning his back to her and pulling a firearm from his holster, firing it once into the air. “We need to get to the rendezvous point. Stay close.”

South Chungcheong hesitated, yet unwilling to follow a male deeper into the woods alone, Countryhuman or not.

Korea paused, picking something up from the ground to hand to her. South Chungcheong snatched the jasu hoop, taking care not to brush his fingers. She need not have bothered. He pulled back as swiftly as she.

The province brushed grit from the white flowers, eyeing his back as he walked away.

All males were dangerous, yet after that display of emotion, it seemed likely that he was the sort lacking in the manhood needed to violate a woman. He was too delicate in constitution, though not in the completely unimpressive sort of way that would have kept her on the ground.

Korea realized she was not following and looked back, impatient.

‘Tch.’

South Chungcheong raised her chin, striding by him in her house sandals, not acknowledging when he outpaced her by a step, leading her off into the dark, away from the silence now coming from the road, and the fires that rose over the mountainside.

Even if he did not want to take liberties with her, he had to want something. Men always did. Though he had said he would rather have her useless than dead, he likely expected her to feel some feminine urge to play house for him by stitching and cooking. ‘Twas likely why he had handed the jasu hoop back to her.

Well, he would be sorely disappointed. It did not matter if she had to wander blindly off into the wilderness at his back- if he truly wanted to play the saint by freeing her from women's obligation to be useful, than she would take it. Her days of being a servant were over. Let others scurry and fuss, like that waif surely did. 'Tmight teach him a lesson for thinking he could shut her up and degrade her.

She may have nothing more than being Korean, but she was a Korean lady.

So South Chungcheong walked away from the life that had never been hers, clutching her mountain magnolias firmly under one arm, head up.

After all, only a fool kept playing a game she knew she would lose.

She's a misandrist, she's a feminist, she hates women, she's racist, her and North are opposed on almost every issue that matters, except for the one that matters the most, she's exactly like him in all the worst ways, she is South Chungcheong province and my special princess.

I put the hint in there about North's folder being thicker than the others because South is also in it. South Chungcheong came a few pages away from learning where he was being kept. You might wonder why once she learned about South she didn't tell North about the dossiers that could possibly tell them where he was. This is because 1) North said they weren't going to try again, and 2) She did not want to free South. She didn't like that he'd taken a picture with Japan, or the emotion he inspired in North. Even if North had wanted to go get him, she still wouldn't have told him. She doesn't have a secret soft spot, she is a hater to the core. She has a secret good spot, but that doesn't make her not a hater. Also Hae didn't have a folder at all. Japan wanted her entirely to himself.

Pak Jung-yang was a real guy, and a hardline collaborator. He opposed the March First Movement so much that he created a group against it. You might think to yourself, 'Author! You can't just make all the men you don't like rapists!' But apparently he really was charged with sex abuse before the accuser 'suddenly died' and the charges were dropped. So have you considered that maybe all the men I don't like are rapists. Saito Haruko is also a real person, but I did invent her being an alcoholic. To my knowledge.

Also Koryo and Goguryeo are both spelled the same in Korean (because they're Koryo and old Koryo)- 고려/고구려. But I like these romaji . And to add- the common sense South Chungcheong receives about Sinsi's (mythological first Korean city/state) formation doesn't confirm that it was real. The common sense gave the Korean provinces and Countryhumans knowledge of its existence, but it's because those stories of Hwanung and Sinsi are enshrined in Korean common sense. They have no more way of telling if it's just historical metaphor or if there really was a place/Countryhuman like that than people in our world.

Once A Fool

1952

South Chungcheong burst into the hall, storming for the exit. She needed to get out, needed to get away before he could add any more steps to her humiliation ritual. She fled blindly down the dim hallway, reaching for the door-

"Ah!" She couldn't hide the cry that left her lips as the Command not to leave the building seized her hand, leashing her intent with ropes of fire.

She could not leave. She was trapped in here, nowhere to go until she was given permission, nowhere to hide from those who had witnessed her humiliation and he who had caused it, and still cursedly smiling.

Her mind started to fray as her desire to retain what dignity she had left clashed with that to leave at all costs, and for once the former lost as the door behind her opened.

Blind panic filled her. 'Twas one of the men come to collect on what he believed he was owed, to push her up against the wall and treat her like a common whore while the guards just outside listened in and said she was getting what she deserved, and she would have to take it with a smile on her face.

Her shield had been torn away. If the men who were her jailors realized that, they would break into her prison and make good on their threats to punish her for not being as meek and submissive as her country, the way men always had to punish women. Her blade was useless, half-tied in its sheath, and even if the Commands allowed her self-defense, she could not overpower the burly men without a weapon. She could not even kill herself to escape it. They would violate her the way they had violated the Jeollas and the harlot and she would be driven mad and lose the only thing she never had.

'You are powerless to stop it. They are above you, and they could do anything to you and you wouldn't be able to stop them.'

She threw herself at the door, rebounding off it again and again as she tried to claw her way out and the Commands clawed what was left of her presence of mind into shreds.

"South Chungcheong!"

She bared her teeth as she regained her senses, though composed her face as she spun around.

"Do not approach a lady from behind," she said sharply.

North Chungcheong looked around the corridor. "We're in a hallway. Not much choice?"

She grit her teeth, trying to still her heaving bosom as she smoothed her skirts. He had only seen her attempting to haul the handle and muscle the door open, he could not know that her frantic actions had been driven by terror. He would assume fury.

That was almost as humiliating. Any kind of hysterics were. And this annoying smile was already humiliating enough.

North Chungcheong appeared unnerved by the pleasant curve of her lips, looking away like it was something he should not gaze upon as he rubbed his eyes and blinked, attempting to moisten them after being forced to go so long without closing.

South Chungcheong did not speak until she was sure her voice would not waver.

"Come to gloat, have you?" she asked imperiously, attempting to look as haughty as possible even with this rictus grin on her face.

His jaw feathered as he lowered his hands. "I didn't. But you know you wanted this, right? This is what you chose in two years ago."

'Wanted.' As men always said women wanted things they did not. She had chosen this, she had agreed to it. That did not mean she wanted it.

"That guy-" He thrust his thumb over his shoulder at the hall door. "Is who you followed. That's who you chose over- over-" He bared his teeth as the name was stolen from his tongue. "That is who you chose over our country."

The snap inside her skull was audible as the last few threads on her good sense tore asunder.

"And did our country reward you for your choice?" she snapped. "Were you rewarded for flouncing away from your capital to join the People's Army? Any of you? Were your praises sung, heaped upon you as h-h- As you were told it was oh-so-good to see you?"

The moron fate had decreed was her brother winced, and she knew she was right. He would have been reprimanded.

"Or were you criticized for the same adventurism you were criticized for during the Occupation? Were you told you would have better served staying in Cheongju and guiding your people?"

The words came without thinking, forced out by the weight of over half a decade, tired and furious and hysterical, like any other stupid girl.

"Were you told you should have followed some imbecilic boy-child to Busan to keep him safe and feed information back so our country would be able to take the city as swiftly as possible when the army reached it?!"

Her cry echoed in the hall. South Chungcheong stood with her hands balled into fists, panting, and felt her fury drain with her blood as she realized what she had just confessed. North Chungcheong stared back, the violet leeching from his own skin.

"Noona, you-?"

She spun away, trying the door again, trying to force the terror flooding her to make her mindless enough to open it, even though she would just spill out into their jailors and be shoved right back in.

The imbecile must actually possess a brain because in a voice of horrified realization, he said, "That handler that helped assassinate that guy. He wasn't Gangwon's. He was-"

'CRACK!'

He blinked stupidly as her palm met his cheek. The Commands had let her do it. It was self-defense.

"He was nothing!" she hissed, keeping her voice low to avoid being heard from beyond the door. "I am nothing. You heard nothing."

A laugh echoed from the main room and North Chungcheong flinched, eyes darting around the corridor as if just realizing what that they were in public, that someone could have overheard.

"Why didn't you-?"

His furious whisper cut off as he realized. The same reason none of them had known each other's handlers in the five years before the war, the same reason none of them knew if the others even had handlers, the same reason none of the KPA's vital logistics had been able to be retrieved from her idiot cousins after they were captured- so the information could not be Commanded out of them in case of war. War that had came after all.

And now there were two people South Chungcheong's secret could be torn from.

They were both silent as her brother understood what this meant.

"You need to come back inside," he said in a low voice more serious than any she had ever heard from him.

"I need not do any such thing," she stiffly replied, heart hammering against her ribs.

She could not go back before those eyes, so lascivious and objectifying. She could not.

"South Chungcheong, you could be-" His shoulders hunched as he looked around again. "You need to be careful."

As if she did not know that.

"I am aware," she said scathingly. "I have been being careful with no reprieve for seven years now."

And she had been playing the game for much longer than that.

North Chungcheong ran a hand over his smooth head. "He Commanded me to bring you back. If you don't walk..."

He grabbed his wrist as it twitched for her against his will.

South Chungcheong's jaw creaked. "You will say nothing to anyone about this. Ever."

"The others should-"

"Ev-er," she repeated, as icy as the night she had put a bullet in her handler's skull. "I am not so weak as to care if any of you see me as a traitorous bitch. I care only for not ending up another of Rhee's casualties."

South Chungcheong would not be subjected to the same brutalities the Communist women were. She would not be put in a position where she had to end her own life, even if it would teach Korea a lesson about keeping his promises expediently.

"After the war-"

"Does the word 'ever' mean anything to you, you byeongsin?"

Korea had vowed he would not tell her cousins of her actions once their country was Reunified. 'Twas part of their deal. She had no desire for them to see her as some self-sacrificing wench like the harlot when she had only ever agreed because she would not stand to see her country conquered once more. And she especially did not want South Hamgyong to see her that way.

North Chungcheong stared at her, and she curled her lip at the look on his face.

"I'm... sorry for being a dick," he said quietly.

"Your apologies mean just as little as your slander." South Chungcheong moved past him, head up. "If you ever speak of this, I will do what I must to make you regret it."

He touched a hand to his face. "How did you hit me, by the way?"

She did not answer. All her focus was on making sure her hands were steady as she opened the door back into the den of inequity.

The band was playing once more, and South was out on the floor, standing by one of the tables as he spoke with the men at it, his face still glowing with pleasure at being addressed. She was shocked he had even returned to the table to release the others from their Commands to sit and stare.

He looked up as they entered. South Chungcheong wanted to meet his eyes, to show him how much she despised him.

But she did not. She walked past, ignoring the compliments that stuck to her like nettles, to take a seat at the foot of the table with her cousins. Their judging eyes landed on her once more, telling her that she was just getting what she had wanted, when she had only done what Korea wanted, and what she had judged worth the risk.

She did not care. She never had and never would.

North Chungcheong quietly took his seat to her left. His look she did care about. She wanted to wipe it off his fool face.

South returned to the table, almost skipping into his chair.

"Everyone says we sounded really good," he enthused, eyes alight. "Didn't you hear them trying to praise you?"

'Twas not her singing they were praising. She had sounded amateur, far worse than he or the harlot. 'Twas her beauty, the pleasure she brought their eyes, the pleasure they thought they could receive if only they bribed her with enough sweet words. The pleasure they would take if given the chance.

"That American guy in the uniform really wants to talk to you," he said, nodding.

She did not follow his gaze, knowing it was the disgusting pig that had winked his unnaturally-coloured eye at her.

He would not have dared do it before. None of the men that had jeered at her as she passed would have. South had stolen her thorns from her, and now even if she brandished them again, every man in here and every one of their pig friends they told about this would think they were only a front. They would accept her frigidity as a mask and her smile as genuine because it was what they wanted to see. They would convince themselves that she had some buried softness she hid only to be coy, to encourage them try harder. And so they would, rooting at her with their snouts until they found the sweet pulp they were looking for, or what they could convince themselves was it. They would never stop.

"He would live to regret it."

South sighed. "You could try and be a little nicer, you know."

"Release me from this Command," she said coldly, and he wilted, almost as if he had been expecting her smile to be genuine as well, as if she would return and be grateful he had just violated her in front of these worthless peons.

"Right, sorry," he said quickly. "I would've, but you ran off. South Chungcheong, you can stop smiling."

Her lips finally fell, leaving her cheeks sore. She gave him one long look from under her lashes, removing his smile just as easily.

And then she said nothing else. And she would say nothing else.

The tension had fallen back over the table, no matter how much South prattled on about how much fun they would have when their country was fully conquered by America, when they could feast and entertain foreigners like this every night against their wills while Koreans starved outside the nightclub lights.

So long as he denied them their freedom, it would never lift.

North Chungcheong kept sneaking looks at her that she refused to return.

There was no kinship in sharing a secret. No camaraderie. There was only danger. Her brother was a fool, and sharing secrets with fools got you killed. Or worse.

It did not matter that South already knew where her allegiances lay. The more that had the knowledge, the greater a chance there was of a leak. If America ever demanded that he Command the provinces to make sure they were still 'loyal,' the Chungcheongs could have it forced out of them. Her imbecile brother might still tell one of their cousins against her wishes before the night was over, thinking he was doing her a favour. One of those who was in the know was a drunkard who would spill anything you asked, if you only gave him a taste of the connection he so desperately craved.

And South was a man. A weak-willed, ignorant man. He had spared her once. Now that it was clear that had not earned her affinity, he had no reason to do it again. If she was too abrasive, too powerful, he might feel the need to put her in her place, the way all men had to do to women who threatened them. And if Rhee's regime, or worse, America, had the opportunity to punish her, they would take it. They would do everything she had feared in her time working under Japan, in Korea's guerrilla army, during her five years of information-gathering, and ever since this war had began. And worse.

South Chungcheong would lose.

She should not have trusted a man to keep his promise. Not when she knew Korea was an idealistic fool whose heart had more control over his mouth than his head.

But she had not trusted him, had she? She had not trusted him when he said the southern one would not use the Commands before Taejon was Liberated, nor had she trusted him when he said he and the Korean People's Army would be in Busan in under half a year if a war were to break out. She had not trusted the words that made their way to her in the port city after the army retreated, telling her he would be back soon.

And still she had gone. Just as she had passed on his instructions to Pak Seo-nam when it had not even been an order. He had not let her be taken by the enemy. He had sent her, and she had left. Because he was not a man- he was her country. And he had kept his promise to free her from Japan, he had kept his promise to destroy the old system in the north, and he had kept his promise to win, at least once. Even if he had broken the most important one.

'You will never be enslaved again. If you choose to be free, then you will remain free. I promise.'

She was not some petty, simple-minded waif who would whimper and whinge over it. That promise held nowhere near the import of the other he had made the last time they had seen each other before the war, as he took her aside after she had refused to be placed into American custody and sent south, and that he had silently repeated in that burning holding camp the year before last.

'I will Liberate our country, South Chungcheong. I promise.'

She had done what she could for that. She had taken his risks and done what he requested, against her better judgement. Now she could only wait, and try not to lose.

She should not have to worry about losing or winning or about this stupid game. They were supposed to have destroyed it by now.

But she did. The game still existed, and she was trapped in it, like every other woman and true Korean. Surrounded by wolves, by weak-willed boys and degenerate nation-traitors and a foreign nation that would like nothing more than to take Korea's women and her for himself. To take Korea for himself.

There was no way to win a fool's game. You could only survive it. So she had to play by its rules, its unfair, unconscionable rules that had been designed against people like her. She had no choice. No matter how a Korean province should not have to keep her footsteps hushed in her own country, no matter how badly she desired to skin the wolves and nail their gore-streaked hides to the doors of National Assembly Hall, she could not. The Commands had taken root in her spirit, in her mind and body, wrapping invisible strings around her joints. Even if Korea called again, even if she was so foolish as to stick her own neck out again, she could not.

She had to behave.

She lifted her eyes to the head of the table, where sat the South of Korea, laughing as he spoke with the miguk-nom that desired her, and who was plying him with a fresh bottle of expensive liquor.

They had already lost, if only when it came to him. If she had not been able to sway him, then South Gyeongsang would not either. Ladies did not change men's minds. Perhaps back when he had been throwing up in her sink, back when he had still been sorry. But not now. The Yankee would not have dared leave if he was any less than certain that his puppet's grooming into a man was set.

South may be a fool, but this was not his game. He did not control it. He only played his role as a pawn within, a pawn with more influence and power than anyone like her, but a pawn nonetheless. But he had resigned himself to this with no true disdain.

Korea would argue it, but she knew it was true. They had lost the South of their country to America.

That South smiled at her tentatively, teeth stained red with wine, and she lowered her gaze, the way a woman should around a man with more power than she.

South Chungcheong province would survive. She would not lose, no matter how despair filled her chest with its oily black slick. She was not a stupid little useless girl. She was a Korean province, and she was almost as big a fool as her Countryhuman.

When Korea kept his promise, when he came for her, she would raze the Republic of Korea to the ground.

And until then, even if this was a game she was destined to lose, South Chungcheong would play it.

—

The news came eight days after the bombing of Pyongyang, delivered in an unobtrusive press conference about steelworkers' wages that wouldn't have ever made its way back to Korea if North hadn't been monitoring every single statement the American Countryhuman gave his media.

When asked if he was planning to return to the front once the strike was resolved, America had waxed poetic about never giving up his 'holy' duty to defend Korea from the Communists, but that he couldn't just sit back while his own people needed him. He had assured the press that he would still be head of the United Nations Command, and maintain close contact with both Mark Clark and 'South Korea,' but that he should be in the United States for the changing of the president later this year, the first since World War II. He had said South was capable of handling things on his own.

It had been a lot of words to say 'no.'

And so almost exactly two years after he had first arrived in Korea, boldly announcing to the world that he would destroy Communism and free the south in time to be home by Christmas, America slunk away with a quiet, unofficial statement, something that didn't even make the front pages of his own news.

It was a victory. But North couldn't feel anything over it. He couldn't feel much of anything beyond the bone-deep throbbing pain that pervaded every inch of his body.

They had denied America his easy victory, forced him to head home to manage his own country. But his army was still here. His 'negotiators' had just spent another week still refusing to sign the armistice, then taken another recess. They were still denying North and China their people. The germ bombs and regular bombs still fell. Rhee still lorded over the south, imprisoning and vanishing anyone who spoke too loudly about the legitimacy of the upcoming elections.

And America could always come back. Even if he was on the other side of the world, Korea was still just a plane ride away. North's brother and provinces were.

And there was that lurking unease. They had forced America, the most arrogant country and Imperialist in the world, to give up. Even if it was just a personal relinquishment, it was still a relinquishment. The other countries with troops in Korea would see that. Even more, they might question why their soldiers were still dying in a foreign nation while the Countryhuman in charge could go home. They wouldn't care about their men, but they would care about their pride. And America knew it. It was why his exit had been so subdued.

If he decided it made him look too weak...

North's fists clenched, waves of pain rolling through his arms as that feeling from when that first fake atom bomb was dropped over Pyongyang last year filled him, the same one that flooded his chest as they stood by the rail line and he waited to see if the incoming plane was for reconnaissance or destruction.

It had taken over a thousand sorties to inflict the damage the US Air Force had on the 11th. It had taken hundreds of thousands to turn his capital into the mess of rubble and cratered roads around him since the war began.

It would only take one day, one atom bomb, to wipe Pyongyang off the map entirely.

North's skin crawled, tightening around his bones at the idea of how it would feel to be washed in nuclear fire, but he blocked it out. The damage to his body wouldn't matter. He would live. Tens of thousands of his people, a hundred thousand when you added the pollution, the radiation, the factories and fields they would lose, and the strike at the front that would surely come with the detonation, wouldn't. Any pain he felt would be deserved for being unable to stop it.

He couldn't stop it. He tried to use the fact to push the thoughts away and focus on the present, but it just made them close in.

He couldn't stop it. If America wanted to prove his strength against his country, he couldn't do anything to stop him. The planes, the starvation, the destruction of their power grid, the executions in the south, he couldn't stop any of it. The B-29 Superfortress could be in his sights, directly above him, ready to drop its load on his city and turn it to the same ashen shadow that Hiroshima and Nagasaki had been reduced to, and he wouldn't be able to do anything but watch it plummet towards them, knowing it would murder and sicken his people, burn his resources, and engulf him with the greatest agony his body had ever felt, worse than anything Japan ever had or could have done to him, all because he hadn't won when he was supposed to.

And he couldn't stop it. He wasn't able to stop any of it. He never had been.

North suddenly rocked forward, slamming his skull off the wall, trying to replace the raw pulsing pain in his burns with the sharp impact of his head against smooth cement, to smash his thoughts back into place and stop the spiralling feeling inside him.

It worked. Blinding pain flashed through him, a flare of white light in the dark room, distracting his body from the burns.

But the momentary relief quickly faded, the chest-tightening agony creeping back in, now matched by the pounding in his head. The shadows swirled around him, and he staggered back, slumping down onto one of the pews in the lecture hall to hold his temples in his hands.

'Idiot.'

But at least he was thinking clearly again. As clearly as he could when-

No. He was thinking clear. Everything his body felt was back to being nothing. He just... needed the dark behind his eye to stop spinning.

The stone clicked against his teeth as he made sure he hadn't swallowed it. He didn't think South's trick was working anymore, but it was better than nothing.

South.

He was fine. As fine as he could be. Still in Korea, not imprisoned or vanished. Two days ago he had even gone to a nightclub with all the southern provinces, letting one of North's agents make proper visual contact with them for the first time in months, confirming that they were all well, at least physically.

A nightclub, when they were at war.

He shouldn't begrudge that. It was a good thing. It looked like with America gone, South might be releasing the provinces from the solitary confinement the foreigner had kept them in. Even if he couldn't, and was just using Rhee's false republic's 'Constitution Day' as an excuse for the day since he couldn't visit them in private without suspicion, North knew his provinces wouldn't miss an opportunity to try and educate him.

'Or talk sense into him.'

Maybe they had succeeded. Maybe if he went now-

No. He had made his decision. It couldn't be risked. Not just for their country. If his provinces were getting more freedom, maybe even a reprieve from the Commands now that America wasn't around to make sure South used them-

'I told you America wasn't on the radio with him. It was only South.'

-North couldn't risk jeopardizing that. He didn't need to see his brother or have him here. He just needed him to be ready for when the armistice was signed. He would have to be there. With North at his side, he would have the confidence to stand up to America and tell the reporters that would be there, tell the world, that both halves of Korea wanted a real end to the war and to finally be Reunified. Even with the Yankee watching, he would know his brother would keep him safe.

Hopefully his provinces would have more chances to prime South for that. Though he also hoped South Chungcheong wouldn't stick her mouth out. Not while she was still in enemy hands.

She wouldn't. She was clever. And had too much self-preservation. It was why she had been the one he had chosen to accompany South once he had grudgingly accepted that war was likely inevitable. And from his book of names being hidden in the hills to the successful assassination of Rim Gun-hon, he knew he had chosen correctly.

'I promise I will come for you.'

He would. Even if it wasn't in the way they had planned, and it was too late to avoid her wrath. He would accept being smacked across the face for once if it meant he had all his provinces back with him.

And he would keep that other promise, too. The most important one.

North exhaled, his skin crackling in the quiet room as his ribs sank in. Then he rose, a wave of pain and exhaustion and h-

It crashed up against the barrier he erected against it, dulling. He was fine. He had work to do.

Pulling the stone from his mouth, he wrapped it in a small scrap of fabric and tucked it in his pocket. The last thing he wanted was for Choe Yong-gon or Deng Hua- the acting commander of the PVA now that Chen Geng had returned to his country to establish the Military Engineering Academy- to realize he was sucking on a rock while they talked strategy. China would be even worse.

Maybe South's trick was still working. Somehow his insides felt even hollower without the stone to occupy his mouth.

But he was fine. His stomach hadn't protested its emptiness in months. And no one could feel the ache. No one but him.

North pushed down the throbbing pain, overcoming it. He had been needing to take more of these breaks lately, slipping out of meetings to compose himself. He needed to stop being weak. It was nothing and he couldn't let it interfere with his duties.

He placed his general's cap on his head, adjusting the brim so it covered the dark bruise he knew had to be rising on his blue skin, and strode out into the hallway.

The bulbs attached to the walls of the military complex were dark, but dim light spilled out from around the cracks in some of the doors he passed.

The power was back on. They had managed to get the Supung Dam back in working order in two weeks after it was bombed. It still wasn't entirely repaired, but the Amnok River was flowing again, its current powering their hydroelectric plant.

It wasn't enough. America was still striking their other plants- Pungsan, Puryong, Changjin, their transformer stations everywhere- over and over again, fresh- deepening burns eating away at North and his provinces every day. He could feel them now, burning down into the tender skin below his right armpit, digging for his ribs.

They didn't even have ten percent of their power back. What they did have was powered mostly by their few thermoelectric plants, like the one in Wonsan. Energy rationing was more severe than ever, all of it directed only to vital locations, like factories and hospitals.

The light that brushed North's boots as he passed the doors only made the pressure inside him build. It came from lamps and candles, not bulbs.

But at least he had North Pyongan and North Hamgyong back, and the Liaos. Now that morale was on the rise again and repairs were moving smoothly, he had recalled them from working on the dam to return to their provincial duties. The Supung had been safer than anywhere else so long as America wasn't targeting it, but the constant tension in his shoulders from watching enemy planes soar in that direction, waiting all day to hear if they had struck the dam, had worsened the permanent ache in his spine.

He would still feel that way, jaw clenched as he waited for the day the hydroelectric plant was hit again, and he could do nothing but hear about it happening. But at least he could stop fearing that he and China's provinces had been broken with it.

He stopped outside the door to the war room, taking a deep breath.

Before he could go in, someone said, "Excuse me, Comrade Korea. Can I have a moment?"

North twitched slightly, hoping it hadn't been too obvious he was bracing himself, and turned to see one of his generals coming down the hall.

"What is it, comrade?" he said, coming off too flat, but needing to hide the strain in his voice.

"Sorry if you're busy, Comrade General." The man gave a quick bow. "But I promised my daughter I'd ask you if you're making a Liberation Day speech in person this year."

North's molars grit together. "I am. I'll be at Moranbong Theatre on the 15th. Jin-yong is welcome to come."

His comrade kept his military mask, but the broad shoulders under his epaulets visibly relaxed. "She'll be glad to hear it. It means a lot you make them open to the public."

He meant 'It means a lot you're actually making one this year.'

North bid the man farewell, watching him walk away lighter than he had came.

He had deprived his people of that relief last year. He could never do that again. He would have to have it announced in the papers that he was making a speech for Liberation Day so no one would be dreading that he wouldn't.

Even if it was his fault their country wasn't free yet, he couldn't let that cripple his people's morale. He couldn't let them blame themselves for his weakness.

With his composure restored, he marched into the room, taking up his spot next to Choe Yong-gon to discuss the limited probing actions they would take to assess the Americans' troop build up like he had never left, though too conscious of China's eyes on him, mask off in the safety of the war room.

Deng Hua had recovered from the shock of finding out his Countryhuman was still in Korea by now, though his eyes still flicked to him every once and awhile, wondering the same thing North had been for almost two years now.

Another of China's National Days was coming up. And though North tried to deny it, something told him they wouldn't have an armistice by then.

'Go home,' he thought across the table while Deng Hua and Choe Yong-gon talked germ warfare safety measures.

China smiled back at him like he could hear what he was saying, but was choosing to ignore it, as usual.

North broke eye contact.

Whatever. He had accepted a long time ago that he wasn't responsible for China's decisions.

Even if he was responsible for him being here at all.

He shook his head, trying to dismiss the thought. America was responsible. America and no one else. He couldn't start wearing those wheel ruts into his mind again. Not on top of everything else.

He managed to hold them back for the rest of the talk, though when they were done, they rolled back in alongside the pain that had never truly left.

"Want to come dine with my soldiers tonight?" China asked as they padded through the narrow cement tunnels.

North hesitated, then shook his head. "I'm busy."

He... would. But if he did, he would have to eat.

"Giving your rations away again, I assume."

"I've never done that," North denied flatly, then changed the subject. "But you can invite some of your comrades to my Liberation Day speech."

China brightened. "Am I invited?"

"No."

"I'll make sure to get there early." The other country tapped his finger on the flashlight in his sleeve. "By the way, I hear you're having an important trial tomorrow."

North grimaced. 'North Pyongan.'

"It's just a normal trial," he said.

It was. Out of all the reactionaries they had tried, Pak Chae-eun wasn't anywhere near the worst offender. He hadn't done any raping or murdering himself. He hadn't sabotaged food stores or cut power lines. He had only led someone into a trap. It was only an exceptional trial because that someone had been a Provincehuman.

And because North had personal interest in it. Even if he had been trying to hide that, asking for another delay after North Pyongan's truck had been set back by a bombing run on the drive back here had shown his hand slightly.

"If you ask me, you should save the effort," China said breezily. "Pull the trigger on a priest and there's a high chance you'll be doing the world a favour. And we know you would with that one."

North had decided by now that one of the things China actually didn't have a say in in his country was how they handled religion. If he did, he was sure Chinese Christian priests would have been a dying breed.

"I have no issue with priests," North said as they exited the underground system, not leaving the small shack that had been rebuilt over the entrance until they were sure the drone of jet engines was far away. "Only the ones that get my provinces abducted."

"I suppose I don't have to ask what you want the verdict to be then," China hummed. "Though I wonder what you're expecting your province to do when it comes to testifying."

"None of your business."

"Even after my poor, sweet Xi'er got shot foiling that wicked priest's plan?" the other man sniffled.

"My trials are internal affairs."

China made a disappointed noise, his lip losing its fake wobble. "Not even a little hint?"

Before North could answer, new pain flared through his side, making his feet falter. He planted them in the blackened dirt before he could stumble, clenching his fists and jaw until his 'ears' rang as he was faced with the assault of the edges of the burn gash tearing open, hot liquid soaking his side.

China turned, and he bared his teeth, prepared for him to ask if he was alright. But as usual, the other man just waited patiently.

It never left. He only grew used to it. Enough that he could move his feet again, pushing past his comrade.

"The coasts, I assume," China said idly.

North unlocked his jaw enough to grit out, "I don't know."

"Mm. You know, I don't think you ever properly thanked me for my little sister's help in retrieving your province back then," his comrade remarked as they headed for the city proper. "Or for anything, ever."

North never knew if he should feel glad or irritated by how his comrade didn't acknowledge his flare-ups any deeper. He knew if China looked at him with anything like pity, he would snap. But he also didn't like that it felt like the man was allowing him to pretend he didn't feel them at all, the way you would tell a child with a skinned knee that you knew they were brave when they denied their pain as their lip wobbled and tears welled in their eyes.

It wasn't like that. North didn't cry, no matter how bad his pain ever got.

W rithing on the floor, fire in his insides, blood burning his skin as that gleaming blade cut him over and over and-

And this pain was nothing anyway. He just didn't like that China thought it was bad, and was laughing at him for pretending it wasn't.

Either way, a glare was the proper response. "I thanked Comrade Liaoxi like I said I would. You still did nothing."

"I seem to recall me playing a fairly important part in the operation."

"I don't," the Korean said bluntly.

"Hmmm. Maybe war damage can cause short-term memory loss."

"Maybe you just didn't do anything that important."

He would be less averse to thanking China now if the man wasn't so intent on it. As it stood, he would rather dig his hands into either side of the gash in his torso and pull.

China smiled at him from under his old scarf, and North looked away.

The air over Pyongyang was still thick with the smell of char and burning chemicals, even over a week later. Major repairs had been finished swiftly, only hampered slightly by the lack of electricity, but there was still too much to do. And they had lost too many supplies. North tried not to think about that string of zeroes stretching into infinity until he was behind the chair in his office, occupying his mind with other things in between responding to China's banter until then. Anything but the heat pulsing in his left side, the blood soaking through his bandages and hopefully not another uniform, and the empty pit inside him.

Pak Chae-eun. North wanted him dead. And even though he had helped design the system that gave him no direct control over who would be involved in the people's court, he was sure he would end up that way, so long as his niece didn't back out, which she hadn't yet.

As for what he wanted North Pyongan to do... He wanted him to have some self-respect for once, some outrage over what had been done to him. But that couldn't be what he wanted from him when it came to the trial, just like he couldn't want him to make his decision just to prove Korea's provinces were no longer tethered to any god but their people. What North wanted North Pyongan to choose...

He wanted him to make his decision how North had made his to withhold military information from his provinces, how he had chosen to send South Chungcheong off with the enemy. How he had chosen to leave his brother behind, twice. How Korea and his provinces should make every one of their decisions.

He wanted him to choose what was best for their country.

It should have been obvious by now, but there's the confession- South Chungcheong has been a spy for North since day one! The world's worst woman (affectionate) has been playing the long game and is prepared to play an even longer one.

South Chungcheong hates domineering, 'manly' men because they have all the power in a system that was built for them, but she hates weak, less stereotypically masculine men more, because the system was built for them, but they allow themselves to be ran by it. All they have to do is change their attitudes and they can achieve all the power, control, and respect that they want, unlike women (her). It's like you have this access to a power she used to only be able to dream of, and that's still out of her grasp, but you don't use it. Yes she also despises men that do use it, but at least they're playing their role the way they're meant to, were designed to. She is very much a biological essentialist when it comes to sex. Except North gets to transcend his because he is also her country. 'You are like a concept to me.' (or because she doesn't entirely hate him and she refuses to not entirely hate a man)

Theirs Alone

North Pyongan stood in the hall, his heart lodged in his throat like a pearl in a clam.

The Central Court had been moved from the Kumsusan residential district, forced further towards the outskirts by the bombings. A scant few dim bulbs lit it, flickering halos only glowing when court was in session, or about to be. He wished he could see the sunlight, though he knew no amount of illumination would make his choice any clearer.

"Well?" Korea's face was unreadable as he prompted his province.

No matter how North Pyongan had mused over his decision during the weeks of working on the Supung Power Station, he still wasn't any closer to knowing what he should do. What his people would want, need.

He breathed in, preparing to dive into deep water.

"Can I speak with him first?"

Korea tipped his head slightly, single eye piercing into him like a spotlight. Then he nodded curtly.

A handful of minutes later, North Pyongan was standing outside the remand room, an unadorned wooden door flanked by armed Public Security.

"He's pretty frail," one told him as he unlocked the door. "You shouldn't have any problems. But if you do, just call."

North Pyongan swallowed nervously, and the door opened, giving him his first glimpse in over a year of the man that had betrayed him, and their country.

Pak Chae-eun sat behind a small table on a rickety chair, looking just as much so. 'Frail' was not the word for it. He had been frail last year, when they met in Seoul. Now he was decrepit.

The lines on his face had deepened so much they could have been carved with a knife, and his cheeks and eyes sank in between them. Only a few patches of wispy white hair still managed to cling to his spotted skull. He trembled, even sitting still, not from fear, or from cold in this stifling room, but weakness.

The door shut behind North Pyongan with a soft thump, and Pak Chae-eun looked up. For a few moments they only stared at each other in silence.

"F..." North Pyongan tried again. "Pak Chae-eun."

The old man blinked wearily. "That's me. Forgive me if I don't stand. I'm not what I used to be."

No. He wasn't.

"It's alright," North Pyongan murmured instinctively, then didn't know what else to say.

Pak Chae-eun did. "So. Did they send you to finish the job?"

"You aren't... Your verdict hasn't been reached yet," the province told him. "I'm just here to..."

He didn't truly know. Was he looking for closure? Some excuse not to go through with this? Or something that would make him feel better about sentencing the man to death?

"Talk to you," he finished lamely. "Before your trial."

The old man smiled bitterly. "Which I'm sure will be fair and impartial."

"We try to make sure all our trials are."

But people could never be impartial. The accuser, the jury, the judge, the defendant. They all held biases and views and emotions that could twist their decisions. They were all human, all had their own idea of what was a crime and what was justice.

"We aren't what you think," North Pyongan told the man sadly when he only shook his head disbelievingly. "Do you really think I would walk with Korea or join the Worker's Party if they allowed things like that?"

"I don't know," the old man said tiredly. "I don't really know you."

His heart squeezed in grief, engulfed by a sudden sense of loss. He had spent years, decades, thinking of this man fondly as the one who had set him on his path, as the one who shaped his faith in God, as a beacon of goodness in a dark world. As a saviour.

But he guessed, in the end, neither of them had actually truly known each other.

North Pyongan opened his mouth, then found his words. "Why? Why did you do it?"

"I thought I'd told you," Pak Chae-eun said. "Our country cannot fall to sin."

North Pyongan didn't cry out this time. There was no ice beneath his feet to crack. Only the tepid waters of sorrow.

"And you were willing to betray a friend for that." He shook his head before the man could respond. "I never would have been grateful to you."

There were no cobwebs over his eyes to fall. Only scales over this man's.

"You don't think," Pak Chae-eun replied. "And maybe you're right. But I've always tried to live my life by what I think God would want. And that's what I did."

"You truly think God would have wanted me to be torn away from my family and put into the hands of those that killed yours?"

"America and the Southern Korea weren't the ones that started this war," the man said. "It was your side that did that."

"America bombed your family." North Pyongan knew he wouldn't see past the propaganda, so tried to make him see this instead. "His pilots targeted them, even though you were civilians."

"He is fighting a holy war," the old man said tiredly. "If that was the price we have to pay to keep our faith, then it's one I can accept paying. God knows better than me."

"Korea isn't taking anyone's faith."

"Isn't he?" Pak Chae-eun lifted his eyes to him. "How's yours?"

North Pyongan hesitated, glancing away, and he gave an unamused chuckle.

"You see?"

North Pyongan knew Korea would rather he renounced God entirely. He would rather he had never found Him.

But he had also never tried to dissuade him from his beliefs. Even his disparaging comments about God being cruel or useless, or religion being an opium, had only ever been brought on by North Pyongan bringing up the topic in the first place. He had never told him that he needed to stop believing, or even outright that he should stop believing, even in those early days when he was a bundle of brimstone and fury.

The only time he had ever tried to strip North Pyongan of his beliefs had been a test that he had failed by allowing him to.

"No," he said firmly, looking back to Pak Chae-eun. "I don't see. Korea has never tried to take my faith in God from me. The only thing that has ever shaken it has been those that proclaim they follow His will while plunging knives into the backs of their countrymen."

It was Pak Chae-eun's turn to look away.

"Korea does not want to take our faith," North Pyongan said softly. "He only wants to give us faith in ourselves."

"And if we have faith in ourselves, then what use is there in believing in Him?" the man asked lowly. "No matter how you look at it, even if you folks up here aren't murdering men of the cloth and banning Bibles, what your Worker's Party is trying to do will turn people from the Lord. Faith in mankind degrades faith in the divine."

"Even if we turned away, so long as we do good on Earth, God would forgive us."

"Ha." Pak Chae-sun gave short laugh. "You've become something worse than a Godless Communist- you've become a Catholic."

"No," North Pyongan said, wincing as he thought of Sang. "Belief in God is what saves. But I think a belief in His goodness counts, even if someone doesn't mean it to."

Catholics believed they could commit acts with sin in their hearts, then simply confess them to be absolved, only to commit them again. And they believed as long as they did good works, they would see Heaven.

But what about those who did good works solely to achieve Heaven, out of fear of Hell and greed for His kingdom? Surely they would be turned away at the gates. They might believe in God, but they didn't believe in His good.

"Good actions don't always mean someone will be saved," he said to Pak Chae-eun. "And cruel ones don't always mean someone will be doomed."

"Aren't you just saying that to reassure yourself?" the man challenged. "How many Commandments have you broken with your Communist Korea? How many lives have you taken?"

"I have never taken a life I didn't think I had to," North Pyongan said, thinking of that boy in Anju. "But still..."

He looked down at his hands, spreading the bandaged fingers, the skin under them as soaked in red as if the blood of all the Japanese, traitors, Americans, and southern soldiers, forced to fight for Rhee or not, stained them.

"I might not see Heaven," he admitted, remembering the nothingness he had experienced after drowning, the same one shared by Hae. "Whether Provincehumans cannot, or I have just made too many mistakes."

He curled his fingers in, hiding the scarlet flower on his palm, looking back into Pak Chae-eun's eyes.

"But I want to help Korea create a world where we don't have to sin to keep ourselves alive, or others. A world where no one has to steal or lie or kill to survive. Where everyone receives what they need and gives what they can, and isn't swayed towards evil."

He knew there would always be evil in the world, those who wanted more than they deserved, or wanted others to have less. Those driven towards cruelty by forces beyond society's control. But he also knew there could be less of them. The Pyongans never would have stolen if they had the clothes, food, and medicine they needed. His sister never would have killed Guk Gun if their country hadn't been colonized, their people turned against each other, made desperate for money they needed to survive. He never would have killed at all.

And that boy in Anju, Ahn Chun-hui, Oh Tae-min, Hyun Han-jin, Kim Kang-sim, millions more of their countrymen, dead or maimed or displaced, would still be alive and well in their homes, never given the opportunity to enact evil or have it be visited upon them if America had never Divided their country in the first place, turning neighbour against neighbour.

"And if I can never see Heaven because I've spent my life fighting for that, if none of my good intentions or belief are enough for God to forgive me, then that's fine. So long as I can help create paradise on Earth, so that one day our people can all rejoice in His Paradise." A smile graced the corners of North Pyongan's lips. "Then that's a price I'm willing to pay."

"You said you read the Bible," Pak Chae-eun said slowly. "But I don't think you understood it. 'You shall have no other gods before Me. I, the Lord your God, am a jealous God, punishing the children for the sin of the parents to the third and fourth generation of those who hate me.' Do you think a God like that would tolerate you setting yourselves up as idols? Joseon and the old guard were stricken down for that very same sin."

"The words of man can be twisted. And Joseon was stricken down by Japan, because he held no love for our people," North Pyongan corrected. "We aren't trying to make ourselves idols as they did. That goes against everything we want. We don't want to be worshiped, we want to serve our people."

"The people you say would have twisted God's word in the Holy Bible."

North Pyongan could have pointed out that it was not Koreans that had written the Testaments, but instead he said, "Yes."

'Do you think people are good?'

He had to. There was no other choice.

"And you believe God would want you to serve them over him?" Pak Chae-eun man asked skeptically.

"I believe if God made me, then He made me to protect our people and guide them towards a better world."

Why else would the Lord have made Countryhumans and their provinces? If He despised idols, then why would He have given them their swift healing and conditional immortality, things that could be and had been so easily taken as signs of divine power, and the ones that held them to be gods to be worshiped, unless it was so they could better serve their people as His hands?

"And I have faith that the world Korea wants for us is that better world." His fist closed over his heart. "I believe it is what God would want for us. And if it isn't then...

"He would not be a God worth following."

Pak Chae-eun gave him a long, unfathomably sad look, then shook his head. "I don't think we can understand each other."

"No," North Pyongan admitted sorrowfully, remembering what he had said about being an old man stuck in his ways. "But perhaps if you had tried, we wouldn't be here now."

"Or perhaps you wouldn't be."

"I will always be by Korea's side."

Even if he went down that road he was so afraid of. If he started walking too far ahead of their people, if he didn't notice they had fallen to their knees, North Pyongan would grab his hand and reel him back to them.

A silence fell over the small grey room, as fathomless as the sea. There wasn't much more to say, but North Pyongan found himself reluctant to leave, knowing that when he did, he would have to give his verdict. And then he might have to sit in the courtroom outside and look Pak Chae-eun in the eyes as he sentenced him to death.

"Why did you take the money?" he asked quietly.

Pak Chae-eun hadn't been put in manacles. His thin, shaking hands clasped on the table.

"Because I wanted to get enough to get Eun-yu out of Korea before I passed."

"She's testifying against you today."

His swollen, arthritic knuckles tightened, bulging like knots in driftwood. "Yes."

"I'll make sure she's taken care of." North Pyongan put his hand over his breast. "I swear on the Lord."

"Then I'll trust that you at least think you still believe in Him," the old man said wearily. "I suppose that's all I can do."

North Pyongan hesitated, then asked, "Do you regret it at all?"

The man was silent for a long moment, his jaw working, before he answered, "No. I did what I felt He would want. And I would do it again, even if I still ended up here."

Perhaps North Pyongan should hate him for that. Perhaps he wanted to. Maybe he had come in here searching for a villain, hoping Pak Chae-eun would rub his leathery hands together and tell him he had wanted the money to buy better tea and suits that didn't have patches on the elbows.

But he didn't find that. Staring into those rheumy brown eyes, the same ones that had looked at him so kindly on the night he saved he and his sister's lives, only older and sadder, he only found an old man who had thought he was doing what his faith would want, but had lived his life too dogmatically to see that it was not.

"Thank you," North Pyongan said, finally finding what he had come here to say. "For saving my sister and I back then."

Pak Chae-eun's clouded irises hid from sight. "I would do that again, too."

The province turned to go, looking back over his shoulder as he did.

"Goodbye, Pak Chae-eun. I hope our God isn't as cruel as you believe."

"And I hope you never have to face His judgement at all."

North Pyongan stepped over the threshold.

The guards didn't close the door behind him. They went in, taking Pak Chae-eun between them and marching him off for the courtroom.

North Pyongan let out a shaky breath. No relief welled inside him. If it was closure he had wanted, he hadn't received it. Only a deep sense of sorrow and regret.

"And?" Korea asked as he slowly made his way down the short hall towards him.

North Pyongan didn't look up from his boots. "Those guerrillas on Yebong Mountain. Pak Jeong-ri. Pak Yun-sung. Choe Ki-bin." The names fell like stones from his mouth, those he didn't know weighing even more heavily. "They died because of me."

Korea had been the one to say those words to him. Yet a touch of heat lurked under his response. "They died for you."

He supposed he could accept that. The men had given their lives not because he had held too much blind faith in a man that shared his, but because they had wanted to save him, so he could keep guiding the rest of their people forward. And because someone he should have been able to trust had been even blinder than him.

North Pyongan inhaled deeply, then gave his verdict.

"I won't testify against Pak Chae-eun."

Korea didn't react. His gaze bored into him, waiting for him to continue.

"I think he should face justice," he quietly told him. "His actions led to the deaths of our people. He betrayed our country and he would do it again. But I don't think I should play any part in delivering it to him."

"Why?"

"Because I don't think we should make Provincehumans testifying a precedent. If I went out there and told them how he betrayed me, some would think I was doing it because I wanted revenge."

He didn't. In the end, how could he want revenge against the man who had saved his sister's life? He only wanted justice for his shattered trust, and what Pak Chae-eun had tried to do to their country. And for the lives lost for him that shouldn't have had to be.

"They would think I was doing it because of my personal feelings," he continued. "And that any of us could. People could fear sharing their honest thoughts if they think they could upset us, and end up on a defendant's stand with a province on the other side."

Like how Korea didn't want them involved in executions. But instead of executioners, they would become witnesses, someone who could seal your fate with a few words. It didn't matter if a person had no intentions of ever committing a crime- it could still make them uneasy.

"Justice is difficult enough," he told Korea. "It's hard for a judge and court to be impartial. If any of us got up on the stand, they wouldn't be. The verdict would be decided in our favour every time, even if it shouldn't be."

It was hard for them to be impartial, too. And for Korea. Even if they were provinces, they were still people, prone to being blinded by emotion and beliefs. North Pyongan knew that well.

Maybe one day they could have a world where their masses would hold them accountable if they were seeking vengeance instead of justice. But not yet. Not when the memories of jade-green veils and nine-ornamented crowns still lived on in many.

They couldn't depend on divine, omniscient justice down here on Earth. They could only depend on their flawed human version of it. And they couldn't muddy those waters any more than they already were.

"Are you sure you aren't just doing what you always do?" Korea asked coldly. "Shoving the decision off on someone else so that you don't have to be the one to bear it?"

North Pyongan didn't flinch at the accusation, but he did look down as he admitted, "Maybe part of me still wants to. Pak Chae-eun isn't an evil man. Only misguided. And perhaps part of me doesn't want to be responsible for the death of someone that helped me once. But..."

He lifted his eyes. "That isn't why I'm making this decision. I think judgement should be our people's right alone, unswayed by us. They're guiding us as much as we are guiding them. We should trust them to guide us on this."

He smiled at Korea, giving him the reassurance he needed. "And I trust that they will get me my justice today."

His Countryhuman stared at him, considering.

North Pyongan straightened under the pressure of his gaze, feeling calm as he said, "I truly believe this is what is best for our people, and the future we want for our country. I understand if you don't agree, but this is my decision. I won't testify."

Korea's eye pierced him for another long second, like he was trying to see to the bottom of the ocean floor. Then he nodded.

"Very well." He spun on his heel and marched away. "You can stay in the area until the trial is over," he called, not looking back. "Then head back into the city to help with repairs at the Rubber Factory. Bring me the verdict at the muster point tonight."

And with that, he was gone.

North Pyongan wished Korea would give him some indication of whether or not he thought he was doing the right thing, or if he agreed with his decision, as he wished he had been more open about his issues with him from the start.

But he supposed it didn't matter. He hadn't made the choice for him.

The trial was short, only four hours. They couldn't afford the bureaucracy that could stretch a case out for weeks right now, not for such a straightforward case that had been waiting for over a year to be decided. They had one witness- Pak Eun-yu, who never retracted her statement- and one defendant. Two sides to the story. And North Pyongan felt both would tell the truth.

Eventually the doors to the low hall of the Central Court opened, and a lone figure walked out, collapsing onto the steps, burying her face in her hands.

North Pyongan hesitated, knowing it was best if he kept his distance. But her shoulders started to shake, and he went over.

"Here."

Pak Eun-yu looked up at the handkerchief he held out with glistening eyes. "Are you sure?"

He nodded, and she took it with a trembling hand, dabbing at her eyes, fresh droplets replacing those she wiped away.

"I gave my testimony," she whispered in her quiet voice. "Lord forgive me, I did."

"He will," North Pyongan softly assured. "It wasn't false."

Pak Eun-yu nodded, crumpling the handkerchief in her trembling hands as she looked down at her feet.

"I'm so sorry," she whispered. "I should have told you sooner what he was planning, or tried to talk him out of it, or- I should've..."

She buried her face in the fabric again.

"It isn't your fault." North Pyongan rested his hand closer to her on the sun-warmed stone. "It was his decision."

"I didn't want him to get in trouble," she sobbed. "But now- I know what he did was wrong, but he's my only family left. I couldn't keep my husband safe, I couldn't protect our boys. And now-"

She raised her head, bleak eyes staring out at the ruined city.

"I'm killing my own uncle."

Perhaps part of North Pyongan had wanted to escape the responsibility of sentencing Pak Chae-eun to the executioner's bullet. But part of him also wished he had taken it on, if only to be able to help his niece shoulder the burden.

"You aren't," he said gently. "Your uncle made his choices. Those are what are killing him. Even if you hadn't testified, he would still be found guilty. You only saved us time."

It could be a lie. It could have also been the truth. What mattered was lightening her soul of at least a piece of the guilt.

"I just..." The mousy woman let out a shaky sigh. "I wish I had stopped him."

"You didn't know until the day it happened." North Pyongan had read the statement she had given while in custody.

"But I knew he was doing something. Going places alone, talking to people he shouldn't. Talking about Korea the way he did." She dashed at her eyes. "I just..."

"No one wants to believe those they love are capable of betrayal."

She nodded mutely.

And she had just lost the rest of her family. No one could blame her for not wanting to see the truth, especially not North Pyongan.

"Thank you," he said, because he hadn't had the chance to. "For testifying, and for telling me about the trap."

"Some good it did." She sniffled. "I should've told you sooner. If you'd been gone..."

"Regret poisons the soul, comrade," he told her. "We can't change the past. You aren't at fault for being scared, and I'm not at fault for going. Pak Chae-eun was, for putting us both in danger."

Even though the money had been for his niece, he had put her in danger by having her in the house when he brought the reactionaries. He had let the lip service Syngman Rhee and America paid to their religion convince him that they were just, despite what he had seen.

Or maybe he just hadn't expected North Pyongan to put up any resistance. Maybe he had thought that he would turn the other cheek.

"It's hard to tell my soul that," Pak Eun-yu murmured.

"I know." So very well.

The sun's rays whined in place of the insects they had eradicated, the glimmering golden ghosts of cicadas.

"Can I ask why you warned me?"

Pak Eun-yu stretched the handkerchief out in her hands, staring down at the unembroidered ivory fabric.

After a moment, she recited, "'He has told you, O man, what is good; and what does the Lord require of you but to do justice, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with your God?'"

The verse he had quoted to her as they sat in the rickety little shack, trying to fill the silence.

"I don't know anything about politics," the woman said, raising her watery brown eyes to his. "But you were kind to us. What he wanted to do wasn't justice. And it certainly wasn't kindness."

North Pyongan's throat felt thick. Wordlessly, she handed the handkerchief back to him.

"Will you...?" She swallowed. "Will you pray with me? If it's allowed."

North Pyongan took her hand in his, and they closed their eyes.

It felt right for this to be the last time he prayed with another. The first time had been on a pew in that little church as a blizzard wailed outside, a Bible in his lap and his hand in Pak Chae-eun's. The last would be on the steps of a courthouse on a stifling July day, comforting his niece as the former Father was brought to justice behind them. Not a full circle, but a distorted reflection, like ripples on sun-filled waters.

He didn't pray for God to lighten Pak Eun-yu's burden. That was his job. He instead prayed for that same nebulous thing he always did, beseeching of whoever was out there, whoever could hear him,

'Please, keep us safe.'

Even if that was his duty, too.

As the sun crested in the sky, beating down on the cracked and blistered city, and North Pyongan's battered body, the doors behind them opened once more, and the two Public Security men escorted Pak Chae-eun out. The old man hung between them, listless with the weight of despair.

The verdict had been made.

The former priest saw the province and his niece holding hands in prayer on the steps. He turned his head to them as they passed.

Pak Eun-yu kept hers down. But North Pyongan met those old, tired eyes, unflinching, until they disappeared into the maze of the homes destroyed by those who had destroyed both of theirs, and whom the man that had once been kind to him still believed were on the right side of a holy war.

The hand in his squeezed, and North Pyongan squeezed back. And bowing his head, he murmured one last prayer for the soul of the man that had once shaped his life.

I love North Pyongan. I really like writing his perspective because I'm not religious at all (I'm more on North's side of 'God is either useless or cruel, either way why would I serve that?), so it's a very fun exercise. I know I'm the one writing him, and his eventual future is one where he doesn't believe in god anymore, but it genuinely makes me a bit softer on the idea of faith. His views on religion are filled with a great love, and that's comforting to me. If only religious people like that really existed. uu

For the 'nine-ornamented crowns' part, for most of Joseon, the king of Korea wore nine emblems (because twelve was reserved for China). So Joseon and the provinces also wore these. After the Korean Empire was declared, the Emperor started to use the twelve emblems, so Joseon would have, too, to show that he wasn't a tributary state anymore, but an Empire. Though I do think Gojong had a very loose definition of what an empire is. So he would have had the twelve-stringed (on each side) crown. But the provinces stayed at nine (inequality growing). Though I do like to think there was an argument about moving to ten strings/ten beads on the strings, and Hwanghae was like 'Ten?? Since when is ten an important number? You want more strings and less meaning!' And the others were like 'You never wear anything but that stupid horsehair hat anyway!' And then Hwanghae said 'My apologies for not wearing half the treasury on my head every time I wish to walk the gardens.' And then Joseon remembered why he did n't just have all the provinces live in Seoul and said 'Nine strings or I demand more taxes' and won the argument.

Straining

North watched Pak Chae-eun's execution from afar, unseen by those carrying it out. Part of him had wanted to follow through on his threat to the man by having it done in public, but he'd decided against it. He didn't want anyone prying into his crime, and then into North Pyongan's history with him.

As the old man's corpse slumped to the ground with a bullet in his skull, he left, pretending he didn't see the splash of sky blue through the trees as someone else slunk away, too.

The former priest's body would be returned to his niece to be buried, before she was relocated across the country, far from the front. He had a patch of land ready for her to farm, seized from another traitor to their nation. He couldn't bring her family back, but he could give her the chance to start a new life.

The year in prison had broken the old man down entirely, leaving him incapable of harm. But it still felt good to know he was dead. It was the only true assurance that he would never again try to sabotage their country.

And he deserved it for betraying his province.

North Pyongan had done well. He had just done what he should, so as usual, he wouldn't be receiving any praise for it. But he was making good progress. And since Pak Chae-eun had been found guilty, North had nothing to criticize.

His province wasn't walking as close to him as he should yet on their path. But his Countryhuman now knew he would catch up.

He wondered if he should have it enshrined in the Constitution that he and the provinces couldn't testify in court, but quickly discarded the idea. There could be times when one of them was the only witness to a crime, especially if it was a financial one in the upper echelons of their government. He would just keep them away from the courtrooms unless it was necessary. And if it ever did become necessary, he would make sure they only graced it for officials who had betrayed their people.

And now he could make space and stop thinking about this. Pak Chae-eun was dealt with. He could walk away with the same lesson that North Pyongan had, one he had already learned and he wished his province hadn't had to.

Anyone could betray you. No matter what they had done for you or how good of a person you thought they were. Betrayal didn't come from outside- it came from within.

And he would walk away with the names of those Yebong Mountain guerrillas who had sacrificed themselves for his province as well. And the vow he had made to those who lived.

'I'll return here when Korea is free to thank you all in person.'

Or to find their graves.

The dull pulsing heat in North's side threatened to overwhelm him, but he forced it down with gritted teeth. He wouldn't keep his promise by giving in to pain.

Liberation Day was coming up. As he got up on that stage in front of his people, he couldn't be anything but unshakeable, invincible. An unyielding promise that they would be free, that he could free them.

North went to go keep trying to do that.

The four weeks passed just as successfully as all the months before. America's negotiators kept coming back to the table, only to retreat again for another week. When they were at Panmunjom, the only thing they brought were more spanners to throw into the works.

They had run another useless calculation, and now said that eighty-three thousand soldiers wanted to return home, one of the smallest numbers they could manage with the seventy-eight thousand on Geoje they had admitted were demanding it. But looking closer at the list showed that they had included over six thousand Chinese soldiers from the Jeju camps in the number. They had cut the seventy-eight thousand to seventy-six thousand three hundred, and tried to make it up by adding them. They had removed one thousand four hundred of those who had said they wanted to go home before, along with seven thousand 'reclassified civilians' from the seventy thousand moved from Geoje, and the over five thousand prisoners that had rioted in the mainland hospital camp back in May. And they hadn't said anything about the two thousand left out of the earlier Geoje count.

The number of those who wanted to go home kept decreasing, and North knew what the reason had to be. The same tortures his escaped soldiers had reported experiencing. The steam cages and rapes and beatings. Either that or America's insidious lies finally breaking them down.

And America was lying about the numbers in the first place. The Yankees had only publicly published one of their screening results, done after the massacre on June 10th. By their own numbers, only two percent had said they would forcibly resist repatriation.

Ninety-eight percent of North's soldiers wanted to go home. And America was refusing to offer more than eighty, and even less of the Chinese. His negotiators insisted they would only return thirty-two percent of China's soldiers, all while picking at the wording of the draft armistice and leaving the table whenever they pleased, always without joint agreement.

North knew why.

Across the sea, the steelworkers' strike had ended, the workers satiated with a pay raise, smaller than they had demanded, but enough to send them back to work with no qualms about producing the steel used to kill North's people now that they were a few cents richer. The kink in America's supply chain had only been felt in the flagging probes at the front, but now even that sagging chain was pulled tight as the weapons began to flow again. It would take a few months for his stockpiles to return to the overwhelming force the Imperialist was used to having, but when he did…

North knew if they didn't have a ceasefire by then, the talks would be doomed. Even if they did…

He couldn't think about that. He could only focus on doing everything he could to get an armistice. Even if it was difficult when your negotiating 'partner' refused to even sit at the table with you.

The weeks passed slow and hot and painful. North didn't know a day where his uniform wasn't plastered to his skin by blood, sweat, pus, and the other fluids that leaked out of the holes being eaten into his body. He couldn't escape the suffocating constriction of his bandages or the thick smell of rotten meat thrown onto a fire that clung to him and everything he touched, or the gaping hole inside him.

And he couldn't escape watching his provinces deteriorate around him.

They weren't like him. They hadn't known pain worse than this before. And the way their skin split whenever they moved and the constant throbbing agony were starting to wear on them. They tried to hide it from him, but he could see it in the white eyes that stared wearily from the masks of red and black that obscured their flags, just like he could see their accusations.

'You said this would be over by now.'
'You said we would be in Busan by Liberation Day.'
'You promised we would win.'
'We shouldn't have to burn anymore.'
'We should be free.'

"Where are you going?" the words came out sharper than he'd meant.

Hae turned to look at him with big eyes from the edge of the clearing. "The latrines."

She was lying. He could see it in the way she wiggled her shoulders and puffed her cheeks. She was lying to him, he knew it.

North opened his mouth, then caught himself, forcing his hackles flat and giving Hae a curt nod. She skipped away.

He was being paranoid. He knew his provinces had to be judging him for the war still waging, but it wasn't like it would turn any of them towards the enemy. Especially not Hae. She had never lied to him directly before, and there wasn't any loophole in her answer for her to wriggle through.

He ignored SH's furrowed brows from the log across from him as he finished stitching the tear his field uniform had received while hauling rubble away from Moranbong Theatre. When it was satisfactorily closed, he stood.

"Douse the fire when you're done," he ordered, even though they always did.

"Are you sleeping here tonight, Korea?" North Pyongan asked. Kangwon dozed on his shoulder, recalled from the hospitals to get some rest for tomorrow, so he spoke softly.

He had been quiet ever since Pak Chae-eun's death. Part of North's mind tried to whisper that he resented him for the execution, but he shut it out. He had tried to protest it even back before he'd been broken of his blind obedience. And unless it came to his sister or someone's feelings, North Pyongan didn't lie, either. If his province said he wanted to see the man who had betrayed him face justice, he meant it.

"No," North said to him when he realized he had been silent for too long.

He was just at the bunker to fetch his dress uniform and wash this one, as he had to do every day now. He would need to bandage himself even more thickly than he had last year. He couldn't afford to have blood seep through the white fabric while he was before his people.

"You could get some rest, too," SH tried, but he was already walking away.

His shoulders prickled as he left, filled with the certainty that they had started talking about him the moment he was out of earshot.

The air under the dark canopy was cloyingly hot. Sweat trickled down the side of his face, down into the bandages and the open wounds under them. North stifled a hiss.

Though he was alone, he kept his spine straight and his breath locked behind his teeth, only opening them to slip the stone between his lips.

At the washbasin, he made himself methodically fill the hearth with the stockpiled wood, steadily holding his matches to the kindling until it caught. While he waited for the water in the large tub to boil, he set to washing his uniform in the smaller one they had for laundry now. Thankfully he didn't have to wait for that. Cold water for bloodstains. Or lukewarm, the heat having been leeched out of the air and into even the river water.

North took off all his clothes, his skin immediately crawling at being exposed. He preferred even the choking fabric to being vulnerable like this.

But even in the thin moonlight coming down through the leaves, he could see everything from his boxer shorts to his undershirt was soaked with dark patches. Though thankfully his field uniform was safe tonight. He washed it first, hanging it on a bush to dry before starting on the stained clothes.

Scrubbing his knuckles across the rough fabric made him grit his teeth. He had taken the bandages off his palms to stop them from getting soaked, and couldn't help but feel like every pass of his skin only scraped off more flesh, staining the clothes worse. The water had grown even darker with the blood, leaving him unable to tell if that was true. The flames trapped in the fire cage flickered and roiled, casting confusing shadows, and he couldn't turn on his flashlight because if he had to look at the charred and cratered wasteland of dead flesh his body had become he was going to smash the bathing tub.

He just wanted his clothes to be clean. It was bad enough he had to spend every day soaked in the fluids leaking out of his body, choking and burning alive, feeling filthy and grimy and unable to be truly clean. He couldn't take his clothes being dirty, too. He couldn't fix the burns, but he could fix them. He should be able to.

He scrubbed and scrubbed, faster and harder, dirty water sloshing as he ground his formerly white undershirt into the bottom of the stupid fucking washbasin until he used too much force and his knuckles slipped off the fabric, scraping across rough wood and sending a lance of pain up his arm.

Fury surged in North and he seized his shirt in his hands, prepared to tear it apart.

He caught himself in time, dropping it and pulling his hands from the water.

He couldn't waste another shirt. They were just underclothes. It didn't matter if they were stained. No one else would see them. It didn't matter if he would be able to feel the stains underneath his general's tunic like another layer of dirt he couldn't get rid of. No one else would know they were there.

But he would try again. After he had bathed. He would get fresh water and keep scrubbing, even if it took all night. He didn't need to go back to Jonsung complex tonight. He just didn't want to sleep here.

North pulled the sodden underwear from the tub, arranging it over a different bush, and getting a surge of satisfaction as he got to kick the basin over, bloody water pouring across the dark ground, flooding the undergrowth. He might have kicked it harder than he needed to.

The water in the large tub was boiling now, bubbling with a sound like someone murmuring behind his back. North let it boil a bit longer while he unwound the bandages from around himself, making sure it was sterile. Then he realized he should have left the washwater to douse the fire, did it with his canteen and a lot of stomping, and climbed in.

He let out a shaky exhale as the heat singed his dead nerve endings and burst through the living ones like long-delayed detonations, a rush of heat so intense it felt cold. The sound made his teeth grind.

He should be used to this. Everything had been worse last year, and the one before it. When he held the burns from all his provinces, when more targets were being hit instead of the same ones over and over again, when they had been crammed up against the Amnok with no food. Even his sympathetic fever had been worse when he had the real one.

The pain shouldn't be getting worse, he should be getting used to it, even if the idea of his provinces doing the same made him dig his nails into the sides of the tub.

North lowered himself further into the water, forcing himself to bear the way the heat made his chest tighten even more, holding himself there until the screaming in his body faded to a pained hiss.

He wasted no time, starting to wash his body, sloughing away bits of skin and fibres from the dressings. His eye roamed the dark shadows beyond the trees as he did, heart pounding.

He had always hated bathing. He hated being exposed in a river or tub at the Secret Camp, his weapon on the shore and his clothes off, having to leave his provinces alone because he couldn’t bathe with the other males. Even after Liberation, when they had a bathhouse and no one hunting for them, it took up too much time. North couldn’t stand not being clean, but if he could, he would snap his fingers and be that way.

Even his first bath hadn’t been a relief. It should have been, as he scrubbed away nine years’ worth of filth and was finally clean for the first time since the day he had been formed. Even with Kangwon sitting on the shore behind him, back to him, North had felt relief as he dragged his nails down his arms and rediscovered that his flag was white, not grey.

But then that same feeling from his first meal surged back up, and any sense of relief had died. He knew South wouldn’t be clean. He would still be caked in all the misery they'd gone through, starving and alone while North frolicked in a river with a full stomach, his flag sparkling like snow his brother would never touch, while his was still the same dull grey of the cobwebs he always cleaned from the corners of their prison.

If he was even alive.

It hadn't felt right to be clean. It felt… All the dried blood, bile, piss, and dirt that had built up on his skin for almost a decade had been disgusting, even after Kangwon had wiped him down in his sleep. But it had been filth he'd shared with his brother. Digging under his nails, scraping at his limbs, straining to reach his back after turning down Kangwon's offer to do it, washing it all away felt like… he was washing him away.

North's knees half-rose to his chest, but he forced them down, staying cross-legged as he rubbed his hands along his thigh. With the both of them together, they could almost fit around it. He switched to using one.

South wasn't being imprisoned now. He had been left free to roam, even if he had guards. The agent had said they all stayed outside the nightclub. Surely there would have been secret observers inside, but for America to trust South to even think he was alone with the provinces…

The southern elections were over now. Rhee had won, suddenly far more popular than in any election or poll before it, especially with the military brought in to supervise the voting. Not a single leftist had been on the ballot.

And still South walked free.

Another reason North hated baths. It was harder to stop thoughts he didn't want to think from crawling in.

He ran his hand along the old raised scar on his chest. The sensation of pressure against the dead tissue and the burns that still had nerves in them made his skin shudder, like unreal fingers were dragging across it. But it was still better than washing that gash. He would save it for last, as always.

His brother wasn't free, he knew that. He was watched by guards and America's agents. And even if North would have seized the opportunity to gather his provinces and free them from the Commands so they could fight, the elite unit doubtlessly able to break free from Busan and disappear into the wild, South wasn't that sort of person.

'Can we please not do that again?'

He never had been. From the start he'd always been-

Something moved out in the woods, and North froze, skimming the trees. He didn't move until he heard the beat of wings and panicked dying chirp as a bird was taken by some small night predator.

His provinces' bodyguards were in their dug-out barracks by the road, and patrolling the area. If there was an enemy, they would spot them long before they breached the trees. And he knew he didn't have to worry about his provinces spying on him, even though he sunk down lower in the tub anyway.

And China wasn't out there tonight, waiting to offer to wash his back for him again (which North had taken to calling him a freak for). He had left for the border this morning with the Liaos, off to do something which he had said was 'None of your business' since it involved his politics. Which was not the same as when North said it because this was his country. Everything the other country did here was his business.

He tried to ignore the little voice that said China had finally grown tired of his… still admittedly poor demeanour, and left. It would be good if he had. He wanted him to. And it would get Liaoxi away from North Pyongan.

The idea of the man walking out of Korea without even waiting for North to dismiss him pissed him off, that was all.

He sank down even more into the water, until it lapped at his chin. He wrapped a hand around his throat, scrubbing at the lines of his neck, trying not to feel how the skin dipped between the cords, and how much his clavicles stuck out. Tracing the line of rough skin that hurt to touch showed that the burns were still staying off his face. They stopped just shy of touching his chin, lining his jaw all the way back to the bone, then swooping down slightly around the nape of his neck, before rising on the other side, lopsided.

Those sitting at the front of the theatre hall would be able to look up and see the burns that marred the underside of his chin, and any dressings he put on them. He would have to dress them, or he would get blood on his collar. Medical tape, maybe, and lighting that would cast more light on his flag than his body. That would be good. But he didn't know how to ask the stagehands for it without making it clear why he was.

China liked the theatre. Maybe…

No. He didn't need a foreigner to help him set up lights. He would figure it out on his own. He didn't even know if the man was coming back yet. He probably wasn't.

North struggled to reach his back, the pull of his arm as he twisted it tearing open the scabs around his underarms, dirtying places he'd already cleaned. Still he persisted, rubbing at his-

'Too sharp.'

-shoulder blades as best as he could.

He knew he should probably ask Kangwon to come clean it for him. But he couldn't. His province had been working even harder ever since the ISC had came to investigate, and was finally getting a chance to sleep and escape the pain he had to deal with constantly. North couldn't disturb him.

He watched the treeline in the direction of the camp, almost expecting him to emerge without being called, here to force care that he didn't want on him.

But the undergrowth around the trail they'd worn through it stayed silent, and North twisted back around, redoubling his efforts to claw at his own back.

'Stupid.' He knew he would just have to scare him off anyway.

He couldn't let him see him like this.

He had never gotten to bathe with South before. Even during the few blissful weeks after Liberation. His brother was too nervous about washing outside, so North had made it his duty to watch the perimeter, close enough to talk, but not in the water.

But even that had been nice. So had South singing (and splashing water at him) while North washed up. It was a shameful little desire he would never admit to anyone but his brother, but… he had always wanted to take a bath with him before they were Reunified. To wash each other's backs like they should have been able to when they were young.

North brushed his fingertips over the edge of the burn gash, feeling the sting from the sores.

His body didn't bear the burns of Seoul anymore. But still, now the idea of his brother running his hands over burns that could have been from it, skin that had once reflected the damage from their capital, damage he had caused was…

Agony lanced through North as he suddenly plunged his fingers into the gash, scrubbing violently at the soggy scabs and raw flesh inside, refusing to stop as the pain pushed against his temples.

Good. The pressure drove away any thoughts he didn't have time for. He needed to hurry. For once in his life he needed to think about what to say at the speech tomorrow, and then to prepare for that guest who would be here for the first time since 1949.

He didn't have time to think about unimportant things like pain or hunger he couldn't feel, or how he couldn't reach all of his back properly, or whether or not China would return. And as for South…

He would deal with that when the war was over.

Very fun weekend. I am bloated with sun. I tried to update last night but I came home, squinted at my phone for a few minutes, felt like I was being Trotsky'd and decided it could wait.

Hmmm. Halfway through editing. I was looking ahead at an initial chapter in this part. Did you know the outline originally said ninety chapters? We are at one hundred and six.

I'm going to be honest if a man pissed in my water bottle because he had a crush on me I would commit an act of violence. I mean this without exaggerating. I would hurt him and I would hurt him badly. It would be a visceral primal reaction and I would leave him unable to piss ever again. Luckily all my coworkers are women because boss says men don't know how to work hard (boss is a man, boss is possibly class conscious and aware he is stealing our labour).

Sealed With Solidarity

[image] [image]

North slunk into his room at the bunker in the early hours, when only South Pyongan was awake on watch.

It was still empty.

He didn't look at China's cold bedroll. Just started dressing himself for the day in his now-dry field uniform. He would change into the dress one after dealing with his guest.

Once he was done with his bandages and clothes, he put the roll of fabric back in his bag. His fingers brushed something smooth as he did.

He grit his teeth. After a second, he pulled the wooden tiger out, gazing at it in the light of his flashlight, seeing Gangwon's white eyes staring back, anxious to be told he'd done a good job carving it.

The last time he'd seen him was on February 20th, when he had gone off on Kangwon for hiding Hae's… coma from him. After that, North's condition had deteriorated, and he'd avoided the Quarantine Hospital. And then Kangwon had convinced him to rest.

And then he had woken up, and his province was gone.

He couldn't even remember his last glimpse of him properly. His mind had already been growing fuzzy. He'd been standing in the corner as North ordered Kangwon to fill him in on the anti-germ warfare measures, watching him nervously, probably already suspecting he was sick.

North should have… He didn't know. It wasn't like he could have known he would be gone when he woke up.

But he should have.

Exhaling, he placed the tiger back in his bag, hiding it with his other painful mementos. The heart-shaped stone, the sketch of Seoul, the bloodstained pottery, the dried pink jindallae, the photograph of the 63rd Army platoon. The-

His fingers reached, then curled in.

He couldn't look at that picture of him and South, no matter how badly he wanted to see his brother's face. Like after the occupation of Pyongyang, he knew it wouldn't be wise. He'd glanced at it after returning from the south to make sure it wasn't damaged, but it hadn't seen the light of day since then. Neither had that scrap of paper.

'잘못했어.'

Closing his eye, North went to go start the anniversary of the day they should have been free.

Alone.

"Shoulders back, stand up straight," North snapped, moving down the line of his provinces standing for inspection outside the air raid shelter. "I said straight."

He didn't wait for North Hamgyong to comply, putting a hand on the small of his back and using the other to shove his chest, ignoring his wince and the 'crack' as his bent spine straightened.

"He's not even here yet," his Provincehuman grumbled.

"No talking. Stand up taller," North barked at Hae.

"This is as tall as ah get," she complained from her place between Chagang and North Hamgyong.

"I don't care."

Hae puffed out her cheeks, straining as she tried to make herself look taller without standing on her tiptoes.

North snatched the flatcaps South Pyongan was juggling, slapping one on her head and the other on North Pyongan's, then took a few steps back to appraise his unit.

South Hamgyong and Chagang were best at hiding pain, so they were in the middle, the first ones an eye would land on. Flanking them were South Pyongan and South Hwanghae, also at least appearing less affected. At the ends were North Pyongan and North Hwanghae, shifting slightly in discomfort, but still doing far better than the two he had tried to hide in the middle, Kangwon, still with heavy shadows under his eyes even after a full night's rest, and North Hamgyong, miserable even when he wasn't grimacing in pain and rubbing his back. Hopefully his guest's gaze would skim over them.

"Korea, it's hot," Hae whined, tugging on her collar. "How long do we got'a stand out here?"

They were covered head to toe, from the tips of their gleaming black calf-length boots to the white undershirts peeking out of their uniform sleeves to the red-embroidered collars done snugly up to their chins. Their generals' flatcaps perched on their round heads, covering some of the burns there. North would have made them cover their hands, too, but gloves in the middle of sweltering August heat would have only drawn attention to what he was trying to hide.

"Until he's here."

North stepped in to fix Hae's collar, straighten North Hamgyong again, and brush an invisible speck of dust off of Kangwon for good measure. He took another cursory look at Hwang, but SH had already fixed his belt orientation for him, and since North had snatched his short course drafts, he hadn't been distracted enough to mess it up again.

His eye skimmed across his provinces, searching for any signs of weakness. They all had perfect military posture, backs straight, chins up, hands braced behind their backs. Even North Hamgyong had finally stopped his slouching. The stars on their golden epaulets and the buttons on their uniforms were polished to a sheen, as were the crimsom star pins on their hats. Not a thread was out of place.

But there was nothing he could do to conceal the bandages crawling out from their cuffs to wrap around their hands, or just visible under their collars. And not even those bandages could hide the raw red skin and blackened edges around their eyes and mouths, places they couldn't cover. South Hamgyong and Kangwon had done their best, but unless they cocooned their entire heads in fabric, their guest would see them.

North could see them. And he could see the glare in the eyes he couldn't hide either.

He turned away.

"Be on your best behaviour," he clipped, bracing his own arms behind his back. "No unnecessary speaking, no breaking position."

"It isn't like we didn't have to do this once a month for three years," North Hamgyong grumbled.

"Though I would say our reception was allowed to slacken somewhat after that," Hwang ventured.

"We are greeting an allied nation during wartime," North responded, not looking back at him. "This is proper form."

He couldn't have his provinces feeling relaxed enough to let their guards down. They needed to be a unified, unflinching force.

"Aiya," a voice said as someone stepped out from behind a tree off to North's right. "Fairly excited about our special guest, aren't you?"

North stiffened. Ssi-bal, how long had he been standing there? Someone had been facing the forest ever since he lined them up.

China padded out, his mask and scarf off. As North reflexively scanned him for injuries, he noticed he was wearing a different uniform than he usually did. Instead of the lighter olive of the PVA summer infantry uniform, he was in the well-fitted black lapelled coat of the dress uniform his commanders would wear if they were at a formal event.

Epaulets graced his shoulders, the boards almost matching North's- a red star on each with his national emblem above them. Golden thread, more extravagant than the lining he had on his other uniform, decorated his cuffs and the tips of his lapels with half-laurels and stars. A golden braid bordered the red band around his black peaked cap, and a gold star cradled by a gleaming wreath perched in the middle.

For once China actually looked like someone that could be in charge. North was both glad he didn't wear it normally, and irritated that he hadn't worn his own dress uniform, not wanting to get it dusty before tonight.

Though there was one non-regulation difference between the uniform and a regular commander's- China's, of course, had long, pinned-up sleeves.

His comrade had startled him, but somehow that wasn't first thing he felt at his voice.

North crushed that feeling, and instead of saying what he wanted to say, took a step back, glaring. "I am not excited."

He wasn't. He didn't want this visit to happen. He would have rejected it, if he couldn't use it. And if he had been given the chance.

"Mm." China smiled, scanning his provinces, then called, "Little Sisters! You can come out now!"

A few minutes later, Liaoxi and Liaotung emerged from the road their vehicles had worn between the trees, hauling a large chest.

"Could we not… just… take the Jeep?" Liaotung asked between gritted teeth.

"It would have ruined gege's stealthy entrance somewhat," China replied.

"I am going to ruin your- We could have… brought it in… after you got here," she forced out.

Her Countryhuman paused. "Ah. You're right. Well, lesson learned for next time."

"There won't… be a next time."

The two provinces slammed the chest down on the dirt. Liaoxi immediately slumped over it, panting. North gave North Pyongan a look, stopping him from going to her.

"A little to the left, maybe?" China asked, then at Liaotung's glower said, "Mm, no you're right. It looks good there. Thank you, Little Sisters. You're dismissed."

Liaotung flattened her lips at him, then helped her sister up, hauling her away along Jangsan.

"Happy Liberation Day, gege and comrades," she called.

Liaoxi was still panting too much to talk properly, but she gave North Pyongan and the others a small wave as she gasped out, "Happy... Liberation Day I say."

North was focused on the chest. It was large, made of dark lacquered wood and decorated with the curling geometric shapes China's people loved, and that had seeped over into his country. The corners were bound with brass, and a large keyhole was placed in the center. Somehow it looked like what he had always defaulted to picturing when his brother would tell a story about bandits finding treasure from one of their common sense folk tales.

"What is that?" he asked suspiciously.

China perched on the lid, crossing his ankles. "A chest."

North glared. "What is in the chest?"

"Treasure," he said idly, fanning his face with a red hand. "I'm sure we'll find out what kind soon enough."

"Comrade Korea!" a voice called before North could press further, and he stiffened as someone jogged out of the trees. Song Ki-gon, one of SH's bodyguards.

"Is he on his way?" North demanded, pulse spiking.

The man nodded. "Truck coming up the Pyongyang highway with the escort, make we were told to expect."

The news didn't excite North. He just nodded and ordered, "Point him to the road when he gets here."

The man saluted, taking off again.

North gave his provinces one last scan.

Kangwon's eyes kept closing tight. The Hwanghaes were squirming slightly, Hae even more than usual when she had to stand still. And North Hamgyong's face was lined with permanent strain.

Wonsan, the Sariwon airfield and the front, and the rail lines.

It put North on edge, especially that last one. But if the vehicle had made it, he was clearly fine. North hadn't been informed of his departure time or ETA to prevent communications leaks, but he assumed he would have crossed the border in the middle of the night.

As satisfied with his provinces' state as he could be when they looked and smelled like something their guest would normally cook (or more like Hae would), North turned to face the road, straightening one of his epaulets and taking a step away from China and his pristine black uniform as he came to stand next to him.

North eyed him, trying to think of how to ask his question.

"Does he do that…" he began, not looking at him, trying to be quiet enough that his provinces couldn't hear him clearly. "Greeting with you?"

"Greeting?" China asked, innocently enough that North knew full well he knew what he meant.

He grimaced. “The Socialist fraternal kiss of brotherhood.”

He was going to die of shame just saying the name.

“Has he done it to you?” his comrade questioned back.

“No.” North suppressed a shudder at the thought.

Once a Soviet man had tried, overexcited by their victory over Japan. CCCP had intercepted him the way you would intercept a child heading for the edge of a pier, plucking him up by the back of his uniform and redirecting him before North could have an excuse to reject the trusteeship after all. The Soviet Countryhuman had never tried it himself.

But that did not mean North was not on constant guard for it.

“Does he do it to you?” he repeated.

China met his side-eye, smiling. “I suppose you’ll just have to find out.”

North was going to permanently exile them both from his country.

“By the way,” his comrade said idly. “Make sure not to mention how extended my stay here has been.”

The Korean looked warily at him. “Why?”

China smiled, eyes on the road. “Because CCCP doesn’t know I’ve been fighting in Korea.”

Before he could interrogate him, North heard the rumble of an engine and quickly straightened up, thrusting his shoulders back and tilting his chin, arms locking firmly into a brace, crushing all hints of pain.

Down the forest path crept a military-green, heavily-armoured vehicle on six thick black wheels.

“BTR-152,” North Hamgyong muttered in admiration.

“Shh,” North hissed.

But it was an impressive vehicle. They had only recently gone into production, and were mostly being exported to the Warsaw Pact countries right now. North wanted one.

For the army. Not himself.

The BTR couldn’t pull all the way into the clearing, blocked by the chest China had brought. It stopped, the engine cutting, and the person barely visible behind one of the small windows climbed out of the driver’s seat, unfolding his impressive stature from inside the cramped space in a way that always brought North a small amount of pleasure because of how ridiculous he looked doing it.

Then CCCP stood at his full height before them, reaching back into the truck to grab his furry brown ushanka and set it on his head, despite it being high summer, the same way he wore his long brown coat over a sweater that was only slightly thinner in response to the heat, red this time.

Good. He hadn’t worn his uniform. He never had for the trusteeship visits, but North had been worried the war might change that. The man’s size was enough, he didn’t need to see him in the peaked cap and formal uniform Kangwon had described.

CCCP’s single eye went right to him, the stern lines of his face briefly softening, then to China. Despite the man saying he didn’t know he was staying here, he didn’t look surprised to see him.

“Sons,” he greeted, his deep voice like summer thunder.

North heard North Hamgyong ‘tch,’ and tapped his finger against his wrist, signalling him to shut up, though he didn’t like the moniker either.

“Comrade.” China gave North a mischievous glance before stepping forward, swishing for CCCP.

He opened his arms willingly as the Soviet held his out, and they met in that irritating hug the Chinese man had forced on North when they first met, pressing their bodies against each other’s sides, left, right.

North tensed. China stood on his tiptoes, tilting his head up-

Then he met CCCP in the middle for the third and final hug, his cheek against his broad chest due to their height differences. He gave North an amused look over his shoulder, and the Korean hid a grimace.

CCCP broke the more formal hug by patting China on the back with one of his large hands, something the Chinese man didn't seem bothered by.

Hadn't China said they had only met in person once? Yet he didn't seem to have any problem giving or receiving the embrace.

Then again, he had hugged North the first time they met. Meeting twice was probably grounds for swearing a blood oath for him.

He wondered if he had hugged South when they met.

China stepped away after a long moment. Even though they hadn't touched lips, North debated exiling them both from his country anyway.

"Comrade CCCP," he greeted, fixing his face as the Soviet looked back at him.

He made no effort to approach, forcing the large man to come to him.

"Son," the Soviet greeted, as warm as the sun beating down from the sky, though his face was still severe.

He experimentally moved his arms slightly away from his body, and North tensed, letting him know that a greeting hug was still not appreciated.

By the end of the meeting, he wouldn't have a choice, and would be pulled into an embrace before he could fight it. But the Soviet's sense of propriety hadn't been worn down yet, so he stopped a safe distance (but still too close) away from him.

Ssi-bal, he hated the way he towered.

"It is good to see you," CCCP said, his eye flicking over North in a familiar way that put his hackles up. "I am glad to see you are well."

He could at least still act it.

"Your message was too last minute," North said coldly. "We agreed I would always be informed of any intention to visit a week in advance."

He could turn down the visits now, as he had been able to since 1948. But he couldn't if he didn't have time. Just because he hadn't rejected any yet didn't mean he wanted to accept every one.

"I am sorry," CCCP apologized. "I did not want there to be any chance of my visit being leaked. If America knew I was here, he would surely target your city and any roads I could take in an effort to draw me into war with him. I did not want to risk your people's safety any further."

Ssi-bal. It was a good response. Now North couldn't complain without seeming unreasonable. But he still wasn't going to thank him for it.

"This is the last time it happens," he ordered, conscious of his provinces behind him.

He hadn't wanted them here, but he needed to show the Soviet that they were all still alive and… functioning. And presenting a united front.

The man dipped his head. "Hopefully so. With luck, this war will be over next year, and I may visit freely."

Luck wouldn't stop America from bombing them.

"Not freely," North said scathingly. "That is the point of writing ahead. So I can decline it."

And he was going to decline the next one now.

“Aiya, he’s such a pedant, isn’t he?” China asked, walking over to stand next to them, ignoring North’s glare as his shoulder brushed CCCP’s burly arm.

“You two have been becoming acquainted?” the Soviet asked.

North held his tongue for a second, seeing what China would say. This was his lie.

“You could say that,” his comrade said. “We’ve been exchanging letters, you know. Though I’ve always been of the opinion that you need to meet someone in person to truly get to know them.”

“We have been becoming acquainted,” North said flatly.

He tapped his finger rapidly against his wrist, telling his provinces not to ask questions.

He had thought the Soviet had known what China was doing. He knew people like Yakov Malik, charged with voting for his innocence at the UN trial wouldn’t have, but he thought CCCP would.

Then again, when would China have told him? Their one time meeting had been before the war, and he wouldn’t have risked writing a letter or sending any sort of communication, just like North and his leadership had never mentioned China’s presence here in theirs.

“That is good.” CCCP sounded pleased. “It is good for all the democratic nations in the world to be family.”

North twitched at the word, and China said, “Aside from Yugoslavia, yes?”

A stormcloud passed over the Soviet’s face. “That is not my decision. He would be family if he would set aside his useless antagonism and stop cozying up to the American.”

“How is Comrade Stalin?” North cut in.

The Socialist infighting annoyed him. Korea and Yugoslavia should have nothing but warm relations, but the Countryhuman refused to be entirely against the war being waged against North's people solely because CCCP was. He didn't want to be dragged into someone else's problems any more than he already had been.

CCCP had sobered at his question in a way that made him tense. "He works himself too hard, no matter if I tell him he is supposed to be taking a break for his health."

Another thing they couldn't talk about over mail, and public information was understandably kept quiet, but the Soviet had mentioned before the war that his comrade had been having health issues.

"It is declining," he said heavily.

North could hear the sorrow under his usually stony voice. Joseph Stalin was seventy-three. Even if his health recovered after this, he wouldn't be around much longer.

He knew the Soviet had been forced to watch Lenin waste away after his strokes. He could… He could admit it grieved him that his comrade would have to watch it happen again.

And it tightened his own chest with panic. The idea of a once fiery man fading away as his body turned against him…

It was their goal to create a world where people died of old age, withering in bed surrounded by their loved ones, he tried to remind himself, as he had with Song Dong-nyo. Countless revolutionaries had died young, and even if they had gone out in glory, they all would have preferred to live with glory, to survive the war and live to an old age, and die in a free country. Joseph Stalin had been a great man that accomplished much, and would get to die at the side of the country he had spent his life fighting for. Every Communist should be so lucky.

It didn't make North feel any better. He wanted to see his General.

"I'm sorry," he made himself say. "Tell him Comrade Korea sends his regards."

“Ayuh!” Hae burst out. “Tell him we hope he gets better soon!”

North glared at her as she clapped a hand over her mouth, and CCCP nodded.

“He will not appreciate me sharing it with you,” he admitted. “But I will. Do not tell this information to anyone.”

“Are you sure you should be telling us?” China asked, tipping his head.

CCCP patted the top of his hat. “I trust you will not share it with our enemies.”

No. But North would share it with his Premier. They had to start preparing for any shifts in policy a change in Soviet leadership could bring. Along with China, they were their biggest trading partner, and the number one source of materiel support in this war. If any of that could change, they would need to be prepared.

“My lips are sealed,” China agreed with him, and North could tell that he planned to tell his leadership as well.

“Good.” CCCP’s voice froze over again. “Let us not talk of unchangeable matters. It is Korea’s Liberation Day. And I have brought gifts.”

The Korean’s teeth ground. “We do not need your charity.”

He could feel the provinces staring at him.

“It is a gift, son.”

“I’ve heard he’s unfamiliar with those,” China chimed in, earning another glare from North.

“I know what a gift is,” he ground out. “I just don’t want any.”

He could… tolerate them on his Foundation Day, so long as his people stuck to letters and art, like the boy last year, whose artwork was another aching memento. If it was for his people’s benefit, he could accept them. And he could also tolerate the knife from China, considering he'd given it to him selfishly. Even if it wasn't his birthday, so long as others saw it as that, a gift was just a gift. He supposed. But on his Liberation Day, a day for his people and country, not him, it was hard to not see something from another Countryhuman as a bribe. Or worse- pity.

"You will take them," CCCP said amicably, striding for the truck.

North bristled at the order, intent on never taking anything from him again, but before he could snap, he heard SH click her tongue. He snapped his head back.

She looked at him with round eyes, along with some of the others. Hae's were the roundest.

'Please?'

'No,' he glared.

SH's eyes flickered to Hae for the slightest second, becoming less light-hearted. 'Please.'

North grit his teeth, turning back to see CCCP pulling what he had expected from the passenger seat- a canning box packed with jars of pickles and dark jam separated by thin dividers. North knew the one under it would be filled with cans of sprats, the shiny pink tubes the Soviets called kolbasa, dried fruit blocks, and maybe even the weird sweet blood bars that Hae liked too much. Army fare designed to give as many calories as it could and last as long as possible. The same as he had brought on his first visit after the Division, before the food issues had been resolved.

CCCP was already heading for the cooking area with purpose, so North said grudgingly, "Fine. I'll take them."

He needed to keep his provinces fed.

The Soviet set the boxes on some of the log seats they had, making sure they were in the shade.

"You will," he confirmed, making North's teeth grit again. "You are working hard. You must eat well. Keep these cool and they will last for some time."

The dug-outs would be good for storing food. If he gave some of the canned goods away, it could give a few of his people a week or so of relief. At least those his provinces fed on the weekends. The leftovers, along with Hae's garden and the rations, should be enough for their unit.

Well, no. They wouldn't. But it would have to do.

CCCP returned. "I can assume the sausages I sent previously did not go to who I intended."

"We received them," North said vaguely, and thankfully Chagang didn't elaborate.

"I would like you to eat at least one thing from what I have brought personally."

"I will."

"I haven't known him very long," China leaned up to stage-whisper into CCCP's 'ear.' "But I think our comrade is lying."

"I am not," North lied.

He peeked over his shoulder, seeing Hae's eyes fixed on the tops of the pickle jars, practically drooling. SH gave him a grateful look.

North averted his eye.

It was necessary to keep at least some of the goods. His provinces had never truly complained all those long years of starvation during the Occupation, when the food situation was much worse. But the years after the war had let them forget what hunger was, proven by Hae's idiotic stunt with the clams. Even though they hadn't said anything about it in months, he knew they had to be hungry. He didn't want their empty stomachs to make their wills start wavering.

Food would keep them loyal.

“Thank you,” he said grudgingly to CCCP.

Behind the Soviet, China’s thin brows shot up. North ignored him.

“You are welcome.” CCCP placed a hand on his shoulder. “Anything I can do for my son’s war effort. I am sorry I cannot do more.”

North tried not to twitch at the word again. “The assistance you have offered so far is enough. Korea can handle this on our own.”

“Not so alone,” China hummed. He smiled at CCCP in a conspiratorial way that made North bristle. “Should we give him our other present now?”

North tensed, hand moving subconsciously for his pistol.

China caught the movement. “Aiya, about to point a gun at an ally during our first meeting? Our correspondences didn’t give me that impression of you.”

He was enjoying this too much.

“What present?” North asked, not entirely abandoning his stance.

“You didn’t think I came all this way just to congratulate you on your Liberation Day, did you?” China asked, moving for that big chest. “You’re at war, you know. And while it’s okay for a Countryhuman to pay a day visit, so long as they don’t spend the night, that would still be far too much of a risk, considering the accusations America has been levering against me. And why would I risk my nation by coming here for no good reason?”

Enjoying this far too much.

“I came to help our comrade give you a joint gift. Something to lift your spirits a little in these trying times.”

China went behind the chest, bending to unlatch the lid, straightening as he lifted it, exposing the contents.

“Qiangqiang,” he chimed, a self-satisfied smile on his face.

North edged closer. Inside the large chest was what looked like… paper.

Tentatively, he reached out to pick one up, finding it was a thin, folded sheet. Inside were Chinese characters, written with the sort of careful, mechanical hand North knew belonged to someone that was just learning how to write.

'Comrade Korea, real glad you're giving those paper tigers what for. I'd come fight for you myself if the Japs hadn't taken my leg. As it stands (and I don't) wish you good luck and keep kicking Yankee ass! -Wu Jianwei, peasant from Taotian Village, Fujian'

North blinked dumbly at the paper, turning it over like he would find an explanation on the other side. "A letter?"

"En." China smiled as CCCP plunked a heavy cardboard box from the back of the BTR on the ground next to them.

"I had been gathering letters from around my country to send to you for this anniversary," the Soviet said. "I was surprised when China wrote to me last month to ask that I do what I was already doing."

"Luckily I had the idea myself," the Chinese man sniffed. "Otherwise you would've shown me up."

North didn't pay attention to them, blinking at the papers burgeoning from the chest, and those neatly packed into the box CCCP had opened.

"These are all letters?"

"For you," China told him. "From all across China and the Soviet Union. And a handful of other nations, if our Soviet comrade managed to accomplish what I asked."

"I did," CCCP confirmed. "As I am sure you remember, on my Comrade Stalin's seventieth birthday, the international proletariat came together to send him gifts and correspondences. I went through those same channels this year to receive some for you."

“You’re looking at well-wishes from around the world,” China said, sweeping his hand at the hundreds of letters that had to be there. “Congratulations, apologies, thanks, cheers.”

He looked North in the eye. “All for Korea.”

North felt his throat close as he reached into CCCP’s box, coming out with a letter from a man at the Gorky Automobile Plant in the Russian SFSR, hoping North’s army was getting good use out of the BTR-40s they had sold them. Another was from a woman in China’s Hunan Province, fretting over if he was eating enough. Another was in a language he couldn’t read, but had a sketch of his flag crossed against that of Peru at the bottom, coloured with some sort of red pigment so he could tell that was what it was.

“I did not have time to have all of them translated,” CCCP said regretfully. “But I wanted to include them regardless.”

North stared at the Peruvian flag. Peru was currently under a right-wing regime that had already massacred and imprisoned thousands of Communists. Even if that wasn’t what the person who had drawn that flag was, even sending this letter to CCCP for him would have been dangerous.

He pulled more out, eye flicking over the ones he could understand and the ones he couldn’t, one after another. From Poland, from the Turkmeni SSR, Indonesia, the Philippines, the Democratic Republic of Vietnam. From people who had been through their own struggles for liberation and were going through them. Congratulating him for holding out for so long against America, urging him to keep fighting, telling him he and his people were beacons of hope for revolutionaries across the world.

“Korea?” SH said from far away. “Can we see?”

“…Yes,” he managed after a moment, and his provinces swarmed the letters, picking some out for themselves.

South Hamgyong found one in Mandarin, her eyes shining as she worked through it. Chagang picked up a small scrap with characters crammed onto it, but looked more at his cousins than at the words.

Hwang chose a Russian letter, reading part out loud to North Hamgyong, who *'tch'*ed and looked away.

Hae rummaged around, coming up with one written in Choson'gul, beaming as she read it.

"Look, Korea!" She shoved the cheap paper in his face. "This guy says he's from the K-Ka-ja-khu Soviet Socialist Republic! He learned Korean just to write and tell us we're doin' a good job!"

North opened his mouth, then closed it, not reaching for another letter, just looking at the three he was holding. A Chinese peasant, a Russian worker, and someone who could have been anyone, but was risking their life to write to Korea. To…

"We even received a few from the United States," CCCP said, reaching into his coat. "And one that came with a specific recipient. Kangwon."

North jerked over to see his province blink, lowering the Mandarin letter he'd been reading.

"Me?" He looked confused, relaxing his Countryhuman. When he looked at him, asking permission, he nodded.

Kangwon took the letter he was offered, one in a proper envelope with a stamp from 'Mississippi.' His name was on the front in English letters. He opened it and his eyes widened, scanning the foreign words.

"It's from Jepp," he said, sounding stunned. "The American I helped in Taejon."

"The one you had me search the camps for?" Hwang asked, leaning over his shoulder and adjusting his glasses.

"Yeah. He…" Kangwon read more, lips moving as he sounded the English words out. "I think he says he was in the Pyongyang hospital camp when the American army took it over. He got medically discharged and sent home. He's alive."

The words were filled with equal disbelief and relief. He pulled something out of the letter, showing it to them.

It was a sepia-toned photograph of a broad-shouldered, dark-skinned man in a suit, standing in front of a rose bush with his arm around a plump woman in a white flower-patterned dress, tightly curled hair pulled back into a bun, her warm smile a white crescent on her face. In her arms was a baby.

"Guess they tried hard enough," Kangwon murmured, smiling crookedly as he kept reading through the letter.

Part of North wanted to snatch it from him before whatever the foreign man had written him could undo his progress.

But he didn't. He really… He really didn't want his province to feel the same way about foreigners as he did. He didn't want him to mistrust all of them, just like he didn't want North Pyongan constantly on the lookout for another Pak Chae-eun. He just needed them to. He needed them to be safe.

He let him keep the letter.

"If you root around in there enough, you'll find the letters from my provinces," China told South Pyongan, hunting through the chest. "They should all be bound together. Hebei, Shaanxi, Yunnan, Xinjiang, Tibet- I'm officially allowed to correspond with him now, so don't worry about the paper trail- and the other assorted sundry."

"I brought some from my own provinces and republics," CCCP said, pulling a large sheet from his coat and holding it out to North.

He didn't take it, but SH did, snatching it, her eyes lighting up.

"This is so nice," she said, slightly choked. "Korea, look."

North was forced to.

The paper had been covered in words arranged to look like his flag, blue inked borders at the bottom and top, red ink making up the band and the star with negative space in between to make the white. The handwriting ranged from childish and scribbly to flowing and refined, belonging to CCCP's younger republics and older oblasts, krais, and other subdivisions, and was in more languages than North had ever seen. The Cyrillic of Russian, Ukrainian, Belarusian, Uzbek, and many more, the flowing script he recognized as Georgian, several that had to be Baltic, Yakut, even Korean, likely written by Primorsky Krai. And dozens more he couldn't identify.

It looked like there were translations on the back, but North didn't want to read them. It looked like they were all just variations of the ones he could.

'Do your best!'

'Roshka says hi! And beat the American pig up!'

'Stay strong, comrade!'

'I hope you win.'

"My children each wanted to write their own letter," CCCP said with the proud twinge he always had when talking about them. "But I had them make this to save space."

North stared at the center of the star, where 'Good luck, Korea!' was written. He felt the inane urge to tell CCCP that writing someone's name in red ink meant that they were going to die.

"But Belarus insisted I let her make her own as well." He took another paper from his coat.

North didn't take this one either. SH did.

"Your daughter made this?" She sounded touched.

"Yes," CCCP said fondly. "She is my little People's Artist. I have told her that one of Korea's provinces is an artist as well. She would enjoy meeting you one day."

SH's lips trembled as she gazed down at the drawing, the shine in her eyes turning to a glisten as she held her hand over her mouth.

North tried not to look. It was on the same side as his eyepatch, so it should be easy. But he could still see what was drawn.

Him, dressed in a rudimentary uniform, holding hands with CCCP on one side and a little girl in the white shirt and red ascot of the Soviet Young Pioneers on the other, under a cloudless blue sky and yellow sun. Her green, red, and white flag said she was the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, and their figures were helpfully labelled, 'Карэя, Тата, Я.'

They were all smiling. Even 'Карэя,' though North didn't think he could make the expression if he tried.

'Мір, зямля і хлеб!' read the words under their feet. Peace, land, and bread.

"Korea." SH's voice was thick. "Can I keep this?"

He wanted to snap at her not to cry in front of the other countries. Instead he stiffly nodded, and she smiled, holding the drawing close to her chest as tears trembled on her lashes.

His provinces were all similarly affected. Hwang's glasses misted over as he read a letter from a Filipino revolutionary writing in crude Mandarin, hoping they could read it so that they could know she wished both their countries could be free from America; South Pyongan was grinning as North Pyongan read her one from a Tibetan serf, learning how to read now that the peaceful liberation of Tibet was underway, but still needing a PLA soldier to scribe for him, hoping the PVA could help do the same for Korea; Hae was bouncing as she excitedly showed a message from a Korean child in Liaoxi's province promising he would come home to fight one day to Chagang; Kangwon shook slightly as he read another letter from an English speaker, struggling through it, the letter from the man whose life he'd saved clutched tightly in his other hand; and even North Hamgyong held a Korean letter, penned by one of their countrymen that the unjust Sam Francisco Treaty had made stateless last year, taken away to Japan during the Occupation and still unable to come home, his jaw feathering as he read through it.

CCCP looked pleased, his eye glowing as he watched them.

He should. For these letters to have gotten here only a month after China suggested this, a lot of these people would have had to write them right away. They had truly wanted Korea to receive them. It was a unique show of solidarity, one that was only possible between those fighting for a better world, those in the democratic nations and those trapped in countries like America and Peru alike.

One of the letters Kangwon had set down lay open on top of the cardboard box. North could just decipher a scrap of the English.

'-sorry my country is doing this to you. But I want you to know Korea is showing workers all around the world that we have a chance. Your country is an inspiration to all of us.'

North averted his eye, finding China watching him, smile muted. The man tipped his head at him, asking a silent question.

He looked away.

"Hey, is this…?" Kangwon's eyebrows went up as he tried to read the Russian under an Arabic letter, written on better parchment than most. "Is this from Palestine?"

North jerked over, snatching the paper from his hands and going over the Cyrillic characters, not even attempting the Arabic ones.

It was a long letter, but his eye settled on the last few lines.

'Those who walk with evil will never win. Allah will see both Palestine and Korea free, by our own hands. Until then, do not let our oppressors bow your head, and may every year find you well-being, friend.'

It was signed 'Palestine' twice, by the one under Egyptian control and the one annexed by Jordan, both of them once ruled over by the British, and now having their homeland stolen from them by Israeli settlers, their people being driven from land they had tended for years, or being massacred and buried under it. Just like North's people, but with no State to stand for them, the way it had been under Japan.

"Other Countryhumans sent letters?" he said after a moment, passing Palestine's back to Kangwon so Hwang could read it for him.

It wasn't abnormal to receive well-wishes on this day. But they came through official channels, not personal ones. The only personal letter North had ever received was from CCCP during the Occupation.

“Several.” CCCP nodded to his box. “The true Vietnam and our bloc. And there are a few that I find suspect.”

China plucked the one the Soviet chose from his hand. It was unsigned.

“Hm.” He made a considering noise. “Tagalog. Though I’m afraid I can’t read it.”

“I will attempt to get more of them translated into Korean and Russia, or Mandarin if possible,” CCCP said to North. “Or English, since Hwang can read it so well.”

The Korean looked at the overflowing letters. Part of him told him that there wasn’t any way all of these were well-wishes for him. That CCCP was lying, translating them as he saw fit, knowing North wouldn’t be able to read him, snickering to himself that he could ever believe this many people would give a damn about his country.

But even if only the ones he could read directly were sincere… It was a lot. Hundreds, not counting the messages signed by several people in order to save paper and money. One was even signed from an entire Chinese village, one of those just across the border from the Supung Dam, congratulating their shared work teams for fixing it. And him.

“And there are more letters coming,” CCCP said. “Even as I departed for your country, more were being placed on my desk.”

“I had to leave three chests behind,” China said competitively. “I’m sure by the time I return home, I’ll have five more from my people alone.”

CCCP gave the man a fond look, then pulled a last letter from his coat. “I have one more whose sender insisted I give it to you personally.”

North didn’t want to take it. His arm was stiff as he did, opening the crisp envelope with the Berlin postage stamp- a dove perched on a hammer surrounded by laurels.

It had been carefully written in Russian, with pencil, many smudges showing where mistakes had been erased.

‘Greetings from the German Democratic Republic! I know we’ve written before to establish relations, and on our holidays, but I wanted to send something more personal this time. Congratulations on your Liberation Day, and for holding out against America for so long. I know how annoying him and people that you have to deal with that are being influenced by him can be. My people tell me living through his bombing is even worse. I’ve seen the aftermath at least, and how hard it is to rebuild. I want you to know that when it comes time for Korea to, East Germany stands ready to help.
I don’t have anything too important to say. I just wanted to tell you that your delegation at the Youth Festival for Peace and Friendship last year was impressive, and that-‘

There were more smudges than the other lines here, the ghost of words written and erased over and over again.

‘I know what it’s like to be split. And I hope one day Korea and Germany can meet when we’re both Reunified.

-East (for now)

Also Father- stop reading over Comrade Korea’s shoulder, you helped edit this, you are aware of what it says.’

CCCP and China both leaned back as North lowered the letter.

‘I know what it’s like to be split.’

But North wasn’t split. He had been Divided. East Germany had been formed one nation partitioned into two. North had been formed the second Countryhuman of one unified country. His brother wasn’t someone who had been torn away from him soon after they existed, only met at tense meetings, only known by his public face, his expression set by America before they had ever gotten to know each other. South was the person he had been with every day for nine years, who he had known for decades, who sang to him when he was hurt and helped him drink when he couldn't and pressed his back to his at night. Who he knew never would have burned Seoul or taken his eye before America had gotten his talons into him.

He could never know, never understand what it was like. East Germany was missing half of his country. North was missing his brother.

He shouldn't feel this way. He shouldn't feel this way about any of it. It was wrong. Hundreds of people, maybe a thousand, from all across the world had written to his country, struggling to learn languages they didn't know and scrounging money to pay for postage to the Soviet Union and Beijing, risking their lives and reputations just so Korea would know that the eyes of the world were on them, that they weren't on their own. He should feel the way his provinces did, the way he had felt back when CCCP had sent that first letter, solely appreciative, hopeful, like his people weren't alone in this fight.

But he could still hear the droning of the planes.

"East is looking forward to meeting you," CCCP said, using the directional name for Germany, unlike how he did for North.

"Tell Comrade Germany that I'm looking forward to meeting him, too."

His voice sounded normal. China still looked at him. And maybe SH and Kangwon did, too.

"Thank you for these," North said, trying to sound more forceful, directing the words solely at CCCP. "Tell those you can that Korea is grateful as well."

He would try and write back to East Germany and the Palestines, and the other countries that had written. The ones it would be safe to. He would think of something to say that sounded like something he should.

“And does China get any thanks in there?” China asked, slinking to CCCP’s side.

“Tell your people Korea is very appreciative.”

China clicked his tongue.

“But we should put them away.” North kept his eye off the slew of solidarity. “I need to attend the city meeting with my Premier, and listen to his broadcast with my people. And Comrade CCCP and I need to take this opportunity to discuss our relations. I can read through them later.”

He would let his provinces do it. They could keep them in their rooms, to read to raise their morale, since it seemed to work for them.

He carefully folded the three he'd read, placing them back in the chest.

“I can carry these inside for you, son,” CCCP volunteered.

North went to tell him he could do it himself, before remembering all the times he had picked up rubble while rebuilding and his sides had ruptured like stuffed pork stomach. He had spent too long making sure his bandages were perfect this morning to get more blood on them now.

He let the Soviet handle the box he’d brought, directing North Hamgyong and Chagang to carry the chest (which China looked pleased by). North picked up the boxes of food, fending off SH to carry them into the air raid shelter.

He tried not to look down at the vibrant emerald and deep purple of the pickles and jam. His stone sat heavy in his pocket.

China had followed, unobtrusively placing himself between the door to their bedroom and CCCP, forcing the Soviet and the provinces to set their cargo on the hallway floor, crowding it. North almost snapped at him before realizing they couldn't let the other man see the second bedroll in there, or China's collection of tech that he was still fiddling with even now that his handheld radios were finished. CCCP knew North didn't have any hobbies like that. Or at all.

"I'll organize everything later," he said, though it itched at him not to do it now. "Let's head into the city. Go mingle with our people and meet up at Moranbong Theatre later," he ordered his provinces.

The others headed for the GAZ, but SH and Kangwon lingered.

"Korea…"

"Go," he commanded, and they did.

Commands. South hadn't released the southern provinces from them. In the month between the false Constitution Day and now, they hadn't left their prisons.

Rhee's 'presidential' inauguration would be today. North wondered if his provinces would be trapped inside, imprisoned on the day of their Liberation, or if they would be forced to attend, to stand in a stiff row with fake smiles on their faces, swearing in a puppet as American planes flew overhead, in the same place they had once received the news that Japan had surrendered, that they were now free. He didn't know which was worse. Both of them. All of this.

'Everything.'

CCCP patted his shoulder as he passed, lightly. Too lightly. He had felt the pad of bandages that swathed it the last time. He knew that the only reason North was filling out his uniform was because he was suffocating under layers of them.

The Soviet climbed into his BTR, waiting for China to get in. But the Chinese country stopped North, subtly turning them so that neither vehicle could see their faces.

He opened his mouth, about to say something, and North braced himself. Then his eyes flicked in CCCP's direction.

"I'm looking forward to your speech," he said, and North got the sense it hadn't been what he had been going to say. "I was disappointed I had to miss last year's."

Then he flitted off, joining CCCP in his truck. The Soviet started the engine, rolling down the path so the GAZ could get out.

North, conscious of his provinces' eyes on him, didn't linger. He climbed into the driver's seat, pain pulsing in his haunches as he sat on the seat, bent his legs, wrapped his fingers around the wheel.

"Liberation Day time!" Hae sang from next to him as they passed under the trees. He'd been too focused on the knives shooting up his spine to realize she had taken the passenger seat.

"Day off!" South Pyongan cheered, drumming the side of the truck. "Kinda sorta. Not really."

"I hope we're not just leaving Comrades Liaoxi and Liaotung," North Pyongan fretted.

"Nah, they've got the Jeep."

"Make sure not to divulge their presence here to Comrade CCCP," Hwang advised. "It might give away Comrade China's ruse."

"'Ruse?' Who are you- South Chungcheong?"

"I don't believe I insulted SH even once."

"Make sure you don't get your uniforms too dirty today," SH told them. "We'll be in the light tonight if there's no raids."

"They wouldn't be able to see my uniform if I was wearing my anti-germ suit," South Pyongan muttered.

"Korea said not today," SH scolded. "We need to look good."

"Yeah, I guess you're right," her cousin preened. "We are 'inspirations to the world' or whatever."

Despite her flippancy and discomfort at not wearing her protective gear, she sounded undeniably proud.

North throttled the steering wheel as the pale light on the other side of the woods came through his windshield. His provinces' bodyguards were waiting, and so was CCCP's truck, letting him take the lead into the city.

"I can't believe everyone would do that for us," SH murmured, her words almost lost to the morning. "It's… nice."

"Ayuh!" Hae chirped, twisting in her seat to look back at them. "Everyone's cheerin' us on! That's why we're goin' to win the war an' send the Yankees packin', just like we sent 'Merica packin'! Everythin's goin' to be over by next Liberation Day, right Korea?"

"We are prepared to fight a protracted war or end this tomorrow," North parroted the words he and his General had been saying for a year now by rote. "It is up to the enemy."

"And we're goin' to make 'em pick the second one!"

"That's the spirit, Hae," South Pyongan said, kicking her legs up on North Pyongan. "Keep saying it every year, and one year you'll be right."

"Ah'm right this year," Hae declared confidently. "Korea said so."

He hadn't.

North swung his head to look out the passenger window, locking eyes with North Hamgyong as he did the same thing in the back.

His province's gaze pierced into him. North could see where the blisters escaped his bandages, starting to grow across his eyelid.

He stared back, then broke away, pressing harder on the gas, trying to outrun the stifling unease inside him.

He had a speech to give.

If you're wondering why Hae pronounces Kazakh(stan) so weird it's because 1) she's never seen the Korean word before. And 2) Kazakhstan is 까자흐(스딴) in Korean. Which is something like Kkajaheu(seuddan) in romaji.

I think it's funny when people say 'My family fled Communism in North Korea before the Korean war because they were landlords who got targeted!!' And it's like, you weren't fleeing Socialism, let alone Communism. There isn't anything inherently Socialist about land reform. That was just the start of the democratic revolution. Your family was fleeing democracy. They got a taste and said 'Not for us, thanks.' 'Democratic? Yeah right, they stole over a 1000 acres from us.' Riiiiiight. Because your family was capable of working a thousand acres by hand. They took land whose harvests your family stole and gave it to the people that actually worked and owned it wwwww. Those families never lose their sense of entitlement, they just pass it down to their children. And those children resent that they never received the stolen wealth they 'should have,' even though their living conditions are still ten times better than those of the peasants whose lives they owned. This applies to a lot of places. You weren't fleeing Socialism- you were fleeing the loss of the privileges you enjoyed at the expense of others, and hoping you could keep exploiting them in the places you fled to. Die mad.

SH's burns are way more severe than this, but I can't draw burns. ㅠㅠ

Seven Years Separated

Seven was an enormously large number.

There were times it could be small. The number of divisions remaining in an army, the number of soldiers left of a twenty-two man platoon. The amount of buildings left standing or rice sacks in a granary.

But too often, it was terribly large. Seven years was one thousand one hundred and thirteen days spent caged in a prison shack like an animal. It was six hundred and twenty-two tallies, each one smaller and harder to make than the last, and three extra strokes, still with over a hundred to go. It was sneaking into Seoul alone with a tension that tightened every year, as he grew closer and closer to having spent longer without South than with.

Seven years was the time that had passed since they were Liberated, and he had been supposed to get his brother back.

North stood inside the doors of Moranbong Theatre, the voices outside seeping through, making him want to retreat back into the depths of the underground. It had been a mistake to think he could do this in the light.

Seven years ago he had stood in Busan, bathed in the light of the golden sun, and told his people that after thirty-six long years, longer, they were free.

And now he had to look them in the eyes and remind them that he had been wrong. He had to, because for seven years, he had left them to suffer alone.

North breathed in, his hollow stomach pushing his ribs into his burnt skin. He felt that aching cord inside him. Then he pushed open the doors.

Sunset light flooded the crowd. Oranges and golds and ambers poured down from the western sky, illuminating the hundreds of people gathered near Moran Hill, before the crumbled theatre. Railway workers, the Rehabilitation Corps, Rubber Factory workers, and more, peasants and refugees and non-essential workers come down from the hills, allowed into the city to see their Countryhuman speak.

It was dangerous to gather so many in the open like this, especially on a holiday, when the bombs always fell harder. But North could feel them falling elsewhere, on the power plants and rail lines and frontline positions. And Pyongyang had already been destroyed. The buildings beyond his people, the debris some were sitting or standing on to see better, the factories and supply depots, hadn't been restored enough for America to bomb again so soon, not when his steel production wouldn't be back in full form yet.

It was a risk, but North had decided he needed to meet his people in the light while he still could, despite the marring on his chin. It saved electricity, and he didn't know how long it would be before the burns finally invaded his face, turning it into a death mask like his provinces'.

They were lined up on the bottom of the steps, looking up at him standing between the shattered pillars, their flag hanging over his head, swaying listlessly in the summer heat.

Were they judging him? Was that resentment he saw in the eyes looking out from the bandages and burns, knowing that whatever words he was about to say wouldn't make up for the fact that they still weren't free?

North tore his eye away.

"Comrades."

He had a microphone today, a row of them bristling from the podium he stood behind, casting his address out. It echoed off the columns and rubble, before being eaten by the still air.

All eyes had already been on him, voices hushed from the moment he stepped out into the shadow of what was left of the theatre.

They'd been waiting for him to arrive, and he could see the tension that left smooth faces and worn alike as he did.

In the future, no matter what happened, North would never let another Liberation Day pass without his people hearing from him in person.

"Today marks seven years since we cast off the chains of Japanese imperialism." North projected his voice, refusing to let his words be swallowed by the summer heat. "After thirty-six long years, our people shattered the talons clutched around our Peninsula and drove the Japanese back across the sea."

He could have said 'with the Red Army's help.' He knew CCCP was somewhere nearby, his large frame hidden behind debris, able to hear him. But his Premier had been grateful enough, both in the meeting and his broadcast. They hadn't needed the Soviets- they had only been there.

And North already had to modify his speech.

"Seven years ago, for the first time, Korea knew what it was to be free."

His chest squeezed, remembering the broadcast, Japan's bleak voice, the cries that filled the streets, not pain and terror for once, but joy, wandering through a city whose colours suddenly seemed brighter than any had ever looked, his people's eyes glowing as they looked up at him, an invisible weight lifting as he told them what they had been waiting decades, their entire lives, to hear.

And his brother, emerging from the crowd, his face filled with the same emotion North's was, like a ghost come to haunt him, but somehow real.

'I missed you.'

"We should have been free," he told his people, making an effort to fill the words with certainty instead of the frustration bubbling in his throat. "And we would have been, if it wasn't for America."

A murmur of discontentment rippled across the crowd. He caught eyes lifting to the sky, and dragged them back down by raising his voice.

"Preaching that Korea needed 'guardianship,' he invited himself into our country, cut it in half, and refused to accept the Soviet proposals or the will of our people to Reunify."

'The Division would only be a few months.' He had been so stupid, so blind, even with two eyes. He had known what sort of country America was. He shouldn't have accepted the trusteeship, shouldn't have left South in Seoul, shouldn't have walked away again.

"He told us that we needed his guidance," North spat. "That without him, Korea would never recover from what had been done to us. But we did. Here in the north, we nationalized our factories, our banks and transportation. We freed women and peasants from slavery, put the land into the hands it belonged to, and destroyed the remnants of colonial lopsidedness left on us by Japan. The Soviets assisted us with trade and cooperation, but it was our hands that did the work, our workers that rushed to learn the skills denied to them for so long, to rebuild what the Japanese had razed, our peasants that tilled the lands and fed Korea's people, that carried out the Agrarian Reform, the first of its kind in Asia, and our intellectuals that unlearned what they had been taught by foreign powers and channelled their efforts into drafting laws and uprooting bureaucracy in the offices and schools, educating our youth the way they always deserved.

"It was our people, led by our Worker's Party, that created a truly people-first system for the first time in Korean history."

The words tasted bittersweet. The other half of Korea should have been by their side for that. South should have been by his side. He should have been there on March 5th, 1946, as the Law on Agrarian Reform was passed and the peasants took to the streets to celebrate finally owning the land they worked, and July 30th, when Korea's women had been freed from their bindings, and North had been pulled into their mass celebrations and drowned in colourful choson-ot and banners, he should have been there when they formed the Communist Party and passed the Labour Law and opened their university and held their first elections, standing proudly at North's side, knowing each achievement meant they were another step closer to being one.

"But in the south, our countrymen were still in chains." How many times had he reminded his people here of that without it changing? "The peasants were still chained to the landlords, and are still chained to poverty. The 'reform' the Syngamn Rhee clique has launched is for the landlords, not them, compensating them for the years they spent exploiting our masses, turning them to capitalists and sending them into the cities to exploit workers, while our peasants still slave away, their harvests stolen from them for unjust taxes and paying off the land the puppet republic's 'government' bought.

"The women were still kept in concubinage, made to produce commodities for the capitalists while being denied their rights, and now forced to mobilize in the factories for Rhee's army, while being treated like cattle by American and reactionary soldiers."

From the bottom edge of his eye, he could see South Hamgyong's burnt face darken.

"The intellectuals whose minds should have been turned to moving our society forward were instead shackled to the old ways, wearing suits and horsehair hats alike as they left the old colonial laws untouched, using them to keep our people in chains, imprisoning hundreds of thousands whose only crime was desiring to see our country Reunified and free."

The hills of Taejon, covered in corpses, flashed across his mind's eye.

"And our workers were kept in chains, not using their labour for themselves or their country, but still breaking their backs for comprador capitalists and foreign masters, only no longer Japanese, but American, forced to work their mines on the land they 'inherited' from Japan, the land that should have been ours." North let the snarl into his voice, then restrained it.

"And it showed. The south could not develop as fast as we did, because our people's spirits were not in it. They yearned for the same liberties we had here in the north. For all of the technicians and money America pumped into the south, all of his loans and companies, he failed."

And there was still victory in that, the same pulse of excitement as in 1948, when Rhee had declared his false republic. As furious as North had been, there had been a smug relief under it as he compared the two halves of their country, one that had started without even the single university Seoul had, with less land, less farmland, less people, and less foreign aid, and could see objectively that despite all odds, they had done better. His system had done better. Even budding Socialism had improved his people's lives more than feudalism or capitalism ever had. He had been right.

"America failed," he repeated, and despite everything, still savoured the words, something he could see reflected in South Pyongan's grin and more than a few blazing eyes in the audience. "We progressed far faster in the north, for all our people, not just a select few. We proved that Koreans didn't need foreigners to chart our course or build our country for us- the only thing we needed was a People's Korea. We proved him wrong."

He sobered, his voice going grim. "And he couldn't accept that. He had to destroy what we worked so hard to build."

He cast his hand out, circling the city behind the crowd, directing their eyes to scan the blackened rubble and flat skyline where sloped tile roofs and smokestacks had once stood, before drawing them back to him, not wanting to let them linger on the destruction for too long.

"Two years ago, he launched his attack with the Syngman Rhee puppet army, blaming their actions on us and using it as an excuse to bomb the base of our people's power before even officially joining the war."

'Korea, ah thought you said he wouldn't stick his mouth out.'

He had said it. He hadn't believed it.

"He has tried to destroy us," North bluntly announced. "He has bombed every factory in the north into the ground." Almost the entire Light Metals complex at the end of July, almost hitting a POW camp with it. "He has targeted our peasants in the fields and drenched them in napalm. He has cut our rail lines, over and over, trying to stop the flow of lifeblood in our country, so that even when our people overcome all hardships to send materiel to the front and food to the cities, our trains cannot carry it.

"America has brought to bear every single weapon he can to make Korea crumble," North declared, knuckles tightening around the edge of the podium as his blood rose. "From napalm to white phosphorous to chemical weapons he swears to the world he isn't using, but that leave our soldiers blinded and maimed in ways no regular bomb can. Germ bombs dropped on us and our Chinese comrades to sicken our soldiers and peasants, to kill our livestock and rot our crops, to weaken us enough for him to make one last push. Blockading our coasts, starving our fishermen and preventing millions of tons of produce from reaching our markets, bribing saboteurs with food he has deprived them of to turn against their neighbours and sabotage our People's Army, holding our prisoners of war hostage, trying to force them to break, and to force us to accept them trampling international law and our human rights in order to sign peace.

"And he has failed this, too."

North knew it was dangerous to say. He knew America would be monitoring what he said the same way he monitored what he said. That his words could infuriate him, push him over the edge to bring even more force against his country.

There was one weapon, after all, that he hadn't yet used against Korea.

But he wasn't going to bite his tongue on praising his people just because a foreigner could see it as a taunt.

"When his napalm burns our villages to ash, our people move underground. When his plague insects come, we annihilate them. When his saboteurs act, we halt them. When he bombs our power plants and plunges our country into darkness, we fix them. And when he tries to make our soldiers break, when he threatens them with death and sends them into the north as spies, they come willingly to set down their arms and return to the embrace of their country, knowing that the lies the enemy spews are false."

He nodded to Yun Jin-tae, standing in the sea of people with his little sister and father. The man raised his hand, saluting grimly back.

"And like us, the comrades they have left behind in the death camps in the south refused to break."

North took a subtle breath. This was too dark to make his people think about on Liberation Day, but he needed them to understand why they couldn't just let America get away with his 'voluntary repatriation.'

"Even now, as you stand in Pyongyang, free to celebrate the Liberation of our country from Japan, our countrymen are facing abuses in the American camps. Last year-"

After he had been driven back.

"-as our prisoners on Geoje Island marked our nation's Liberation, even in captivity, they were murdered for it. One hundred and twenty-five men and women cut down for celebrating their freedom from a country America tries to claim he defeated. The women's compounds invaded, our female comrades forced to bear indignities beyond imagining."

But the people before him could imagine it. Most of the crowd were women. They had faced it during the Japanese Occupation and the briefer American one. His civilians wrung their hands, and the militia and Chinese soldiers he'd invited gnashed their teeth. SH's eyes were closed, flickering behind her lids.

And North didn't have to imagine. He had read the reports. Even from the International Committee of the Red Cross, surely watering the atrocities down, they had made his blood boil.

"On the day we Liberated ourselves from Japan, the day Korea should have-“

*‘Should have should have should have’

“-been free, over one hundred thousand of our soldiers and our Chinese comrades are imprisoned in the south of our country, made to slave away for the enemy, enduring abuses and tortures they never should have had to again.”

Abuses he had promised would end before this day two years ago.

“And Syngman Rhee, the traitor-puppet responsible for the death of hundreds and thousands of our countrymen on Jeju, in Taejon, in Suncheon and Yeosu, in Pyongyang, in- Seoul-“

‘잘못했어.’

“-is sworn into power again. Our people know he is a traitor to the nation, they know he is corrupt, another puppet to a foreign nation like the rest of his government that danced on Japan’s strings, but they were still forced to vote for him at gunpoint. The world knows what kind of man he is, what sort of government he runs. They know his crimes.”

They knew it all. Every Red Cross bulletin about his women being kept as pets by Yankee officers, his men tricked out of the camps and told they were going home only to be gunned down and tossed into the sea, every Women’s International Democratic Federation and International Association of Democratic Lawyers report about what the American soldiers and their puppets had done to the land and people they occupied.

And they didn’t care. And even the ones that said they did…

“Yet they call the south a democratic nation and label us as the aggressors, denying our calls for peace, denying our demands that they follow the laws they created. They watch a murderer force his way into power again because they know he will keep Korea a colony.”

North bit down, stopping his tongue from running away. That wasn’t what today was about.

“But our southern kin are still fighting.” His people’s were anyway. “Thousands refused to vote, or have been targeted by Rhee’s police for protesting the trickery and violence he used to win. And our brave southern guerrillas are still holding on in the rear, sabotaging the enemy where they can.”

He wasn't supposed to talk too much about what their people in the south were facing. Those here needed to wholeheartedly support an armistice. They needed the war to end, not to be unable to bear leaving the rest of their nation to suffer for even a moment longer, or making peace with those who were doing it.

But still he said, “They are waiting for us-“ ‘Me.’ “-to Liberate our country once and for all, so that all of Korea can share in the future we are creating.”

He could feel his Premier's eyes on him from the edge of the crowd. He didn’t look.

“They haven’t broken,” North said firmly. “Our guerrillas and peasants and workers and women and soldiers haven’t broken. Korea has not broken.”

He almost raised his chin, but stopped himself, remembering the burns.

“And we never will,” he fiercely decreed, nails scratching at the podium. “We will not break. America can burn every inch of our country, but no matter how much he destroys, he will never destroy us. Because the base of our people’s power isn’t our factories or our fields, it isn’t our assembly halls or rail lines- it is our people.”

North made himself let go of the podium, pain surging through his arms as he raised them to envelope the hundreds of people spread both before him, and the millions across all their country.

“You are Korea’s power,” he told them. “And no matter how hard he tries, no matter how hard any of our enemies try, they will never destroy the Korean people!”

A woman in the front surged up on her toes, a cry she couldn’t hold back leaving her throat, instinctively echoed by everyone around her, a roar that moved out form her epicentre like the wave of force from a bomb. His provinces cheered, too, all except North Hamgyong. He bared his teeth, bowing his head.

North lowered his arms, letting them cheer, reluctant for this next part.

When his people had quieted, he said, “And our power also comes from our ties with the other democratic nations of the world. From all their unerring assistance and solidarity.”

He tried to keep his voice firm, to not let it show how much he begrudged the words.

He hadn’t been planning on saying anything about this, beyond thanking China’s soldiers, and tossing out some brief praise for CCCP, once he had heard he was coming. He didn’t want to. His Premier had said more than enough earlier.

‘The sympathy, support, and concern of all progressive people are focused on the Korean people. Now, all honest people in the world assist the Korean people with all sincerity in the battle for the freedom, honour, and independence of their country.’

Sincerity didn’t help when their country was in ashes around them.

He knew that was unfair. The other Socialist nations had been helping, sending things far more useful than letters. CCCP had sent him fifty thousand tons of flour before sowing this spring, helping alleviate the starvation brought by winter until their harvests could begin. Mongolia had sent a hundred thousand horses, cows, pigs, and other livestock, along with thousands of tons of provisions. China had brought over even more, food and cleaning chemicals and daily necessities, and the other nations had sent the medicine and clothes his people needed by the wagon, all things his Premier had reminded him about in the meeting earlier. And even if North could say that China only helped because he was part of this war and CCCP only helped because he wanted to bribe him to join his Union, and they had all only helped because they wanted to tack even more zeroes onto the amount he owed them, to use them as links in the chain to leash Korea…

They had been donations. For all he would owe China and CCCP, he didn't owe any of them for that. And even if the other nations had only done it to make him feel like he owed them, the Chinese country and Soviet should both know by now that he wouldn't.

He wasn't ungrateful. He wasn't. He had approved of all the praise his Premier had put in his speeches, and he was telling his people that they should be grateful now, even if he could only half-listen to the words leaving his lips or else his voice might tighten.

But he just… He didn't know. He didn't want their pity, he shouldn't need their donations. He would have rejected them if it wasn't for his people's sake.

And the letters…

Something else his Premier had said flitted through his mind, as he lauded all their allies had done for them.

'The Korean people, arms in hand, are defending the freedom and independence of their country- they are not only Liberating their nation from the American barbarians, but also fighting for the peace of Asia and the rest of the world.'

Somehow those letters made all the aid seem less like a donation and more like… payment. North didn't know which was worse.

"We are not alone," he said, even though he felt small and isolated up between the broken pillars, with no sign of the countries whose peace he was fighting for to be seen. "We live in an unprecedented time. One where nations don't help each other solely for their own benefit or because they wish to profit off someone else's war."

Even if he didn't believe the words entirely, his people should.

"But because we share one goal- that of freedom, true freedom, for all the working people of the world. From the People's Republic of China to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to the German Democratic Republic, to all those in nations still ravaged by colonialism and unjust regimes- Palestine, the Philippines, Malaya, Iraq, Peru- Korea is a beacon of hope."

'Your country is an inspiration to all of us.'

Tension twisted in North's chest.

"We are proof that imperialism can't win, that even an outnumbered, overpowered force can grind a giant like the US Empire to a halt, send its Countryhuman fleeing back to his own country, and withstand the cannibals seeking to feed the entire world into the jaws of their bloodthirsty system."

Even if they shouldn't have to withstand. Even if he should have won. Would have if America hadn't decided Korea was a pawn in his self-decreed war against CCCP.

"That the people are powerful and that we can win." North slammed his fist on the podium, letting it hurt. "That no matter what is done to us, we will not break."

Kim Il-sung watched his country from the side of his bodyguard, dressed in all white so he wouldn't stand out, dark eyes brimming with emotion. A thousand ri away, the newly reinaugurated Syngman Rhee dined at a banquet table with the men of his cabinet that hadn't been imprisoned, on a meal he couldn't afford on his salary alone. On the eastern front, two Korean soldiers were locked in a desperate embrace, writhing in the summer heat as blood and gunpowder drenched the air, each one trying to be the one that lived for at least a few more minutes, each one trying to pretend he didn't recognize the terrified eyes peering back at him from the other blood-smeared face.

"We will not bow."

The northern provinces stood rail-straight at the foot of the stairs, muscles quivering and white eyes shining with a light their Countryhuman wouldn't see even if he could bring himself to look at them. The heaviness and awful throbbing pain wouldn't be felt until the moment he stopped speaking. The southern provinces sat around a table burgeoning with meat and desserts and too much liquor, not raising their heads as the foreign band played, and South Chungcheong snapped at a man that if he did not remove his hand, he would lose it, cursing herself and the country she followed for their foolishness over and over.

"We will not submit."

North's chest heaved with all the emotion he was trying to suppress, the pain and rage and grief, and the mixed resentment the letters the world had sent Korea had watered in him. South's shook with laughter as he joked with an army officer, letting him pour him another glass, trying to wash away that ache, and the knowledge that when the party was over, he would go home and cry on the floor.

"I know my people, and what you are capable of. You freed us from Japan, you founded our People's Korea. In five short years, you accomplished more than some countries achieve in decades." North's chest swelled with desperate love. "I know we can defeat America, too. Whether it is peace or war the enemy wants, we will give it to them, a thousand times over. We will force them to sign an armistice, just as we forced them back to Busan twice, just as we forced their Countryhuman to run away with his tail between his legs, the same way we drove Japan out of our country."

And even though North had tried to plan out his speech for once so he wouldn't say something like this, even though he knew in his heart that there would be no militarily Liberating their country, that when America's next offensive came they wouldn't be able to surge forward and drive them back to Busan, to Liberate South, only repulse them, dig their heels in to make sure the north stayed free, even though he knew that the nations arrayed against them had far more weapons, supplies, and people, stolen from across the world, and didn't care how many of their soldiers died in this war, only how much money it cost them, even if they did make America sign the armistice, it didn't mean the war would be over, even if that ultimate weapon was still hanging over their heads, the words still left his mouth.

"By this time next year, Korea will have peace."

He knew his provinces were glaring up at him, telling him he had said the same thing two years ago, and dozens of times since. He could feel South Chungcheong cursing him somewhere.

'We want everyone to be able to celebrate real Liberation Day as soon as possible,' Kangwon had said on that anniversary by the Raktong. And he had let them down, just like he had let their people down for nine years of his existence, like he was letting all the oppressed people's of the world down.

Just like he had let his brother down.

It couldn't stop him from adding, "I promise."

He didn't know if his people still believed him. He was afraid to look too closely at the sea of shining dark eyes and tremulous smiles, to find out if the tears were of hope or fear. Or pity.

North exhaled softly, then lifted his voice again.

"Long live the seventh anniversary of our victory over Japanese imperialism!"

Across the East Sea, a man watched with tired feline eyes from afar as his former subjects bowed before Yasukuni Shrine, honouring the fallen kami enshrined in it, and one who no longer was. Farther across it, America lounged in his king-sized bed, reading operations reports with one hand and winding the red hair of the woman sleeping next to him around the finger of the other, thinking she'd look a helluva lot better as a blonde.

"Long live our Korean People's Army! Long live our soldiers bravely resisting torture until the end!"

West of Panmunjom and south of Busan, soldiers raised their voices in song, defying the air strikes falling around them and the bayonets aimed at their prisons. In the crowd, Yun Jin-tae pulled Yun Jin-suk closer.

"Long live the brave soldiers of the Chinese People's Volunteers and the Red Army!"

Li Meihua made her way back from the fields, face flushed and sweat-soaked from rallying the peasants, a crimson pennant draped over her shoulder. Yao Song met her at the door, pressing kisses to her damp cheek as she laughed, trying to fend him off. Somewhere, a Chinese soldier lit the cigarette of a Korean peasant with his own, and the boy pulled from the frigid river visited the grave of the PVA man that had drowned to save him.

"Long live all the peace-loving nations and people of the world!"

A Japanese woman sheltered with a Russian war correspondent, watching the bombs that had driven them off the road fall over Korea, heart aching as she remembered watching them fall on her own country with her husband. Blood ran from a Puerto Rican man's nose as a fresh cocktail of narcotics was shot into his veins, head spinning as a man with a friendly face and no light in his eyes told him again what he was supposed to believe. Birds sang in the early hours as a black American woman prepared breakfast for her husband, and he prepared for his one-man war protest, conscious of the car that had been parked outside ever since he came home. At the same time and five thousand kilometres further south, a Peruvian woman jolted up as the door to her house was broken down, and uniformed men stormed into her bedroom.

In the shadows of a ruined house, China pulled his gaze away from Korea to look up at CCCP, observing his sober but proud expression, piercing deeper, before he was drawn back to the one across the audience, the unease he'd likely been one of the few capable of seeing now burned away by wildfire, replaced by a feral light.

His own eyes glowed.

"Long live the Worker's Party of Korea guiding us toward our shining future, and all those who have fought for it! Long live our People's Government!"

Kim Il-sung smiled to himself, thinking that as much as his country had changed, the look in his eye was the same he remembered from that fateful day in Pyongyang thirty-three years ago, the one that had stirred his heart more than any church hymn ever could. His country would have said the same of his.

The sun had slid down in the sky, rays curling around the edge of the ruined theatre, the golden light catching North's white uniform and turning him into a torch, brighter than the village homes burning north of Kosong that American reports would call a defense base.

North drew in a deep breath, and it felt good to scream, to finally howl loud enough to drown out the pressure and the voices whispering in his memory, at least for a moment, "LONG LIVE THE KOREAN PEOPLE!"

"LONG LIVE KOREA!" his people and provinces roared back at him, each and every one of them trying to drown out something of their own, and even if he didn't deserve it, North let their 'MANSE's roll over him, anchoring him.

He was Korea. None of North's aches and pains bothered him. They were small in comparison to those of the people here, and those all across his country that would hear his broadcast. Even if they didn't believe him, even if he had let them down too much for them to, he would keep fighting to win them their peace. Because that was what he was good at. It was what he was for. It was what he owed them.

He had been forced to break so many promises. He would keep this one.

He had to.

All across the Peninsula, Korea's people marked their Liberation with food and song and blood, torn between what they were fighting for, but each united by one desperate desire.

'One last year.'

I love my characters so much. I still remember writing down the province names and what I knew about them to create the Northern Provincehumans. I did it in a few hours before writing the first chapter where they showed up in Safeway Pyongyang. And now we are here. They are like my children to me and I have loved watching them grow.

Also have I ever said why the Provincehumans have mountain magnolias on their faces? Have I ever clarified that the provinces of the DPRK don't have flags and that I just made them up? Because I did. Just so you're all aware. I just chose the national flower for them. If I ever do a one-shot of the first Foundation Day when they grew up and received them, I'll explain what the in-universe reasoning is (also I might have said this before, but PLEASE look up the flag for Jongno District in Seoul. Why does it look like that??)

Family Ties

North returned to the bunker earlier than he would have liked, only so CCCP wouldn't be caught driving across his country the next morning. The last thing he needed was the Soviet getting hit by an enemy bomb in his borders.

Still, he'd let his people embrace him for even longer than usual, making up for the year before. He would need to visit the front as well, and tour the provinces. They all needed to see him, to know his words weren't empty. Korea wasn't broken. And he could still Liberate them. They still needed to believe that, at least.

Despite how his skin was still tingling from being touched, all the hands that had held his and caressed his face and stroked his arms, and the full-body hug Pak Jin-yong had given him, he didn't feel as light as he usually did. Maybe it was the embarrassment of knowing China and CCCP had seen him being so vulnerable with his people, or maybe it was the fact that under the tingling, his skin felt like it had been peeled off.

Or maybe it was those boxes of letters, squatting in the hallway like guests he hadn't invited.

North parked the GAZ in its usual spot, hating that it had a usual spot, that the tire tracks worn into the dusty soil were so deep, that they had a washbasin and laundry tub and cooking station and that they were still here, that their city was still being bombed, that-

"Korea?"

North snapped his head over, realizing that his provinces had all already gotten out of the back. SH stood next to his door, her brows furrowed.

"Are you alright?" she asked quietly.

'Weak,' her eyes said.

"I'm fine," North snapped, shoving open the door and making her step back.

"Thank you for giving a speech this year," she said as he slammed it. "It really means a lot to us."

North didn't need to be facing her to know her face said, 'It would mean more if you had won.'

He grit his teeth, turning without looking at her, then jerked around as he realized CCCP's BTR hadn't pulled in after them. He and China were nowhere to be seen.

They had been right behind him, on his heels. Had something happened? Were they-?

No, they'd been too close. North would have heard enemy sabotage, no matter what form it came in. You didn't take out an armoured car silently.

His heart stopped pounding and his hackles rose as he realized what that meant. They had stopped purposefully to talk where he wouldn't hear them.

North lurched towards the road, but SH caught his arm.

"Korea," she chided, knowing what he was thinking. "You don't need to go eavesdrop. I'm sure they'll be here soon."

"Yeah," Kangwon said from where he was helping North Pyongan prep the stove. "Comrade CCCP probably just stopped for a smoke."

"Eavesdrop, eavesdrop," South Pyongan chanted, Hwang nodding vigorously in agreement.

North quivered under SH's touch, staring at her. After a moment, she let him go.

"Fine," she sighed. "But if Comrade China catches you, you'll just be embarrassed."

"I don't get embarrassed," North muttered, already beelining for the dark road.

He walked carefully but quickly along it, not wanting to give the other nations the time to say too much without him hearing.

He knew they would be talking about him, about his speech, saying he was making promises he couldn't keep, mocking him for his failure to win by that first Liberation Day, for thinking he ever could have won, that he'd only been able to hold out for so long because of them, that Korea was weak and he was weak and that they were only helping because they had to for their own sake's and it was pathetic that he could ever think that they actually-

North darted off the road the second he rounded the bend enough to see the silhouette of the BTR, parked halfway down the path.

He knew he should just keep walking, insert himself into their conversation and stop them from gossiping about him. But he also knew that wasn't the reason he'd been trying to walk so quietly. He needed to hear their slander so they couldn't say he was overreacting when he severed personal ties with them.

He slunk through the shadowy undergrowth. The bushes that crowded the road weren't too thick, so he stayed low, and stopped the moment he could hear their words clearly.

"-do you think?" the rumble of CCCP's deep voice asked.

"About what?" China had that innocent lilt again.

"About Korea."

North stiffened. He had a partial view of the Soviet, standing next to the truck's front bumper, his pipe in hand. He really had stopped to smoke, even if that wasn't all he was doing. He knew the Korean couldn't stand the smell of tobacco smoke.

And he knew he would kill him for talking about him behind his back.

"Lovely little country," China idly replied.

He was almost hidden from North's sight thanks to the glossy green leaves of the arrowwood shrub he was sheltering behind. He could only see him because he was perched on the hood of the BTR, long legs hung over the grill. He was sitting in a beam of moonlight that pierced the canopy in a way that had to be deliberate.

"Though I suspect it would look more appealing if it wasn't being bombed," the Chinese man continued. "There wasn't much to see but brown on my way here."

North suppressed a bristle. China had praised his country on the way south. He was just saying that because he was pretending he'd never been here before.

Unless he'd only given that praise because he was talking to North, and he was being honest with CCCP.

"I meant 'What do you think of Comrade Korea?'" the Soviet clarified.

"Ahhh," China said with exaggerated understanding. "He's interesting, I suppose."

North made a face. That word again.

"Very passionate," the man added.

The Korean waited for him to follow it with an insult, for 'foolish' or 'reckless' or 'ungrateful.' Or trigger-happy.

China just leaned back on his palms, absent-mindedly kicking his heels off the Soviet's bumper.

"Да," CCCP agreed after taking a drag of his pipe. "He is. I am glad you have been getting along well, even now that you have met in person. I know he can be difficult."

North grit his teeth.

It wasn't like he didn't know he was. He'd been thinking last night that China had probably left because of how unpleasant he was to be around. He could be polite over letter with East Germany or Poland, or in the fake ones he sent to China, but when it came to the two friendly nations he'd met in person, he couldn't help but be combative, stubborn, rude. Even the times he didn't want to be.

He had wanted to thank CCCP for keeping his promises after he'd released him from the trusteeship. Well, he hadn't wanted to. But he had been going to. But as he faced him for the first time with his new flag and body, his people still celebrating in the background, he hadn't been able to stop himself from telling the bigger country that if he ever wanted Korea under his control again, he was going to have to try harder than the last time.

North knew he was difficult. It didn't bother him. It was better to be difficult than compliant.

It was the tone CCCP said it in that prickled. Not disgusted or derisive, but familiar, in the same way his eye scanning North when he arrived had been, and the same way North often told South Pyongan she irritated him was.

He hunched, freezing as the ferns around him rustled slightly. But neither of the other men looked over.

"I'm a Communist," China said flippantly. "I like difficult."

"Good." CCCP exhaled more smoke, the acrid smell strong enough to reach North.

He scrunched his face, but China didn't seem bothered, even though he had told him he'd never been a smoker. He leaned across the hood, closer to the large man, his legs stretched out to the side.

"So," he said in a conspiratorial tone, but not volume. "What do you think of our Comrade Korea?"

"He is a principled man," CCCP said. "And a good son."

'Mrgh.'

China arched a brow. "And would he use that word for himself, I wonder?"

“It does not matter,” the Soviet dismissed. “He is my son. As are you.”

“Mm.” China’s hum didn’t give North any idea of how he felt about that. “Anything else?”

“Yes.” CCCP tapped his pipe against the side of his vehicle, half-turning to face China. “He is very strong. You both are.”

North’s face warmed, and he quickly looked down, fingers digging into the loose soil.

CCCP had to know he was listening. He had seen him hide in the bushes, or heard those ferns. He was mocking him.

“Aiya, that’s a compliment coming from the bipedal tank.” China’s hand slid up the Soviet’s arm, squeezing his large bicep through his coat.

“You are aware of what I mean.”

“En. But I have to make jokes or I’ll blush.”

China bashfully covered his cheeks with his hands. North was certain they were red enough that even if his comrade did blush, it would never be seen.

Unlike him. He should have told his Premier to design their flag with more red.

CCCP shook his head. “You are very strange, son.”

The Chinese man smiled. “I’m aware, comrade.”

The Soviet faced him directly, more serious as his voice lowered. “I need to ask for the truth. Have you been in Korea before today?”

North’s eye darted towards China. His small smile remained unchanged.

“Aiya, believing enemy propaganda?” He *'tsk'*ed. “I’d thought better of you than that, comrade. Should I ask you where the factory you use to churn out all your evil Bolshevik infiltrators is? Or maybe where you keep the big spoon you used to personally devour all those poor, honest kulaks' grain?"

"I do not believe America's claims about anything," CCCP dismissed. "But what you asked me to do at your trial-"

"A precaution," China interrupted. "You and I both know the evidence against me didn't have to be true for it to be believed."

North narrowed his eye. What had the Soviet done for him?

China still appeared relaxed, brushing at one of his epaulets.

Maybe CCCP had had something to do with how India or some of the other nations' representatives had voted, or rather refused to. Or in their Countryhumans not showing up. It irked North that they hadn't told him about that, but it didn't really matter.

CCCP nodded at the other man's words. "This is true. But if you were fighting in Korea, I would not chide you. I would be grateful you were able to help your brother where I cannot."

A full-body shudder ran through North. He would need to make it clear to the larger country that even if he was going to insist on calling him 'son,' that did not mean he had any sort of connection to his other children, or 'children.'

China let out a small laugh. "I'm afraid I'm not that selfless. I care about the outcome of this war for the people of Korea's sake, but not enough to risk my own."

He sounded so genuine that, for a moment, North felt a growl rumble in his throat, before he remembered he was lying.

And the words shouldn't make him feel that way anyway. That was just how a Countryhuman should operate. China shouldn't care about North's country enough to risk his own.

'But he is.'

"You are already risking them," CCCP pointed out.

“There’s a difference between sending soldiers to war and having war brought to my civilians, and everything else I’ve worked for,” China said. “I’m sure you’ve ran your own simulations of how an American attack against me would go.”

“Poorly. For the both of you.”

“But mostly for me.” China shook his head. “I have my own nation to run. Comrade Korea is, regrettably, on his own.”

CCCP stared at him for a moment, then dipped his head. “Do not feel regret, son. Only anger that our hands have been tied this way. And Korea is not alone. All the people of the world are with him.”

North looked down, watching the grass roots tear in his grip.

“En. Though I think he might still be having a little trouble believing that.” China slid off the hood, landing lightly on the soil, stretching. “Anyway, I think it’s time we head in, before our Korean comrade gets paranoid and comes looking for us.”

All the blood in North’s body rushed to his face. As he’d said the words, China had looked directly at his hiding place, lifting his eyebrows.

CCCP didn’t seem to notice, opening the driver’s door. “Да. He can get nervous.”

North did not get nervous, he just didn’t appreciate foreigners conspiring against him in his own country. And he was right to be suspicious because he was almost certain he knew where the information about adapting to one eye that ‘Kang Kil-dong’ had written for him came from. And they had been talking about him now, even if they… hadn’t been saying what he’d thought.

China knew he was listening. He must have signalled CCCP in some way. They seemed close enough to have signals North wouldn’t catch. They’d known he was eavesdropping, so they… spoke well of him so that they could snicker together over him almost believing they actually thought that.

And China had let him know he knew he was there because… He was China. North couldn't begin to understand why the other country did anything he did.

"Mm, I got that impression," the enigma said, opening his door. "We should drive quickly then."

Ssi-bal.

China's eyes squinched mischievously at the bushes, then he hopped into the vehicle.

North waited until the BTR was past him. The moment it was, he took off running, sprinting off through the trees, dodging roots and grasping branches as he did a wide arc away from the road so the men in the truck couldn't spot him. The second he was far enough away, he plunged back towards the clearing, bursting out of the trees and startling Hwang as he flew past him.

He could hear the engine coming. Not wanting to just be standing there, he darted over to North Pyongan, screeching to a halt right behind him as he washed the rice rations.

His province looked over, raising his brows.

"Shut up." North kept his eye on the rice.

Off to the side, the BTR stopped at the end of the road, doors opening and closing.

"Ah, looks like our worries were for nothing," China noted, nodding at North. "He's here after all."

"Why wouldn't I be?" he asked stonily, looking the other man in the eye, ignoring the way North Pyongan shook his head.

He should have learned his lesson about eavesdropping at Chorweon.

"We thought you might have been worried for us and come looking," China said lightly, sauntering over to perch on the edge of one of the logs. "I know how diligent Comrade Korea is. I told Comrade CCCP on the way about how you always ask after my health in your letters."

That was only because North had no idea what else he was supposed to write. If it wasn't for forging a paper trail, he wouldn't send even a quarter as many correspondences as he sent 'China.' His formula was- ask after China and his leadership's health, inform him of non-classified information about the war effort, tell him he appreciated the PVA's actions, then sign off.

Of course, he couldn't say that with CCCP there.

He glared at China, before realizing that the Soviet was staring at him with a reprimand in his eye.

Ssi-bal. Since they were lying to him, it really just seemed like North had it out for someone he'd never met before, and also happened to be the country whose people were dying for him.

Not that that gave the foreigner the right to disapprove of him for it. Korea and China's relations were between Korea and China, no one else.

"He thought you were being a tad unfriendly," China said airily. "I made sure he knows you're just shy."

Hwang cleared his throat, and North shot him a deathglare.

He had been wrong. He did know why the Chinese man did some things- to annoy him.

"I am not shy," the Korean denied, then narrowed his eye. "I just didn't receive the correct impression of you from your letters. You're more…"

North gave him a dismissive once-over from the tips of his polished black boots to the shiny gold thread woven into his uniform and hat.

"Flamboyant than I imagined. I'm adjusting to it."

China gave him a vaguely affronted look. North tilted his head up, a fang poking into his inner lip.

His comrade wasn't the only one that could play that game.

CCCP couldn't tell that it was suspicious when SH only gave a sigh instead of stepping in to subtly remind North to be polite. He just said, "You are not meeting under the best circumstances, as well. None of us did."

It was strange to think that if it wasn't for America's meddling, North would have met CCCP over a table instead of in the center of Pyongyang, solely pleased to be forging alliances with another Socialist country instead of ready to go to war against him for cutting his country in half. Or that China would only be familiar to him from real letters sent on holidays, and as few meetings as North could arrange. They would be comrades, but strangers, even if the Soviet still called him 'son.'

Another thing to curse the Yankee for.

"War has a way of bringing people together," China said, smiling at North. "Blood binds."

'Comrade!'

"You should leave," North said, looking at CCCP but speaking to both of them. "The drive back to the northern border is long."

"Yes," the Soviet said. "But I would speak with you first. Privately," he added when China tried to follow them.

The other man pouted. "But it will be awhile before we're all able to get together like this again. Shouldn't we cherish the time we have?"

CCCP stared at him blankly, and he sighed. "Fine, fine. I know when I'm not wanted."

"Don't slink along after us," North ordered, immediately regretting his words.

"Aiya, such slander." China lay an offended hand on his chest. "I can't imagine how unscrupulous someone would have to be to eavesdrop on a private conversation."

North grimaced, giving Chagang and SH a nod, silently telling them to keep China in the clearing before following the Soviet.

CCCP took them twenty paces into the woods, and North led him another twenty deeper. Not just because he didn't want the Soviet dictating where they stopped, but so certain people wouldn't overhear them.

"What?" he demanded when they stopped, just out of range of the bathing tub.

"I wanted to ask if you are truly doing well," the Soviet said, brushing aside a low-hanging larch branch. "I did not think you would appreciate China overhearing."

China had seen North in far more vulnerable positions than CCCP had in the short time- 'Too long.' -that they'd known each other. But the man was still right. North didn't appreciate him asking in the first place.

"I meant every word of my speech," he told him, an edge to the words. "Korea will not break."

CCCP slow-blinked down at him. "I am aware your country will endure. I am asking about you."

North tensed his shoulders. "I am fine," he said, reinforcing his voice with as much steel as possible.

"You have adapted to the eye?"

He stifled the urge to touch the eyepatch. "Yes."

"I knew you would."

North almost said something, then thought better. He hadn't asked Hwang to do what he'd done. It irked him that he'd gone behind his back with the foreigner at all. He wouldn't thank either of them for it, even if it had been… useful.

"Is that all?" he said instead.

"No. I wanted to ask what you think of Comrade China."

North didn't want to gossip. And he couldn't tell the Soviet what he really thought of him.

"He's…"

'Annoying, aggravating, thoughtful, generous, good with kids, an idiot, punchable. Kind.' There were a lot of words North could use to describe his comrade, none of which he wanted to admit to CCCP.

That night on Bukhan Mountain flashed in his mind, China's eyes glowing like the stars above as he fantasized about the future.

'I want to rival America and outshine CCCP, and be a beacon for those fighting for their own countries everywhere. I want to be a red star in the East.'

"Ambitious," North decided on, then, before he could stop himself, added, "You should watch out for him."

CCCP made a rumble that was one of his half-laughs. "Are we not all ambitious? To be a Communist nation, we must have great ambition and greater love."

Unlike when China had called them greedy, North couldn't deny that. Though he could argue that you needed greater ambition than love. Not more, but greater. Anyone could love. Not everyone could act for it. And love without ambition could keep you from acting. If a revolutionary loved his people but lacked the ambition to risk them for freedom and the greater benefit of all, he would never take up arms.

Or if he loved his brother too much to let him get hurt.

And he didn't want to deny it. He was ambitious, and it was good that China was, too. If he wasn't, his soldiers likely wouldn't be here. He wouldn't have survived becoming the People's Republic of China, no matter which China he'd been before.

North didn't know why he'd said that. It sat uncomfortably in his chest, like he had just betrayed his comrade in some way. Even though he didn't owe him loyalty in the first place.

"China is a good boy," CCCP told him. "You will see."

He… didn't need to.

"He has been… a staunch comrade," North said awkwardly.

He couldn't elaborate and didn't want to.

"You should go now."

"Wait, son."

CCCP's voice called him back. Reluctantly, he turned. The Soviet's shadow stared back at him from under the trees.

"I am sorry for all this," he said heavily. "I did not think America would intervene in your war."

"We both knew he would," North bitterly replied.

"Not to this extent."

They had expected the arms sales, a naval blockade and trade embargo. And North had expected the planes and maybe even a few thousand mercenaries. All things he could have easily withstood. If it wasn't for the sheer amount of foreign soldiers and the Incheon landing, Korea would have been his two years ago.

They hadn't been prepared for seventeen armies and more bombs than had been brought to bear against even Japan or Germany. America hadn't just stuck his fingers in the borsch- he'd plunged his entire damn hand in up to the shoulder.

"You were wrong," North said coldly. "The United Nations is worse than useless. He is nothing but a pawn."

CCCP let out a sigh like bellows deflating. "You cannot blame me for hoping otherwise. But I am still sorry. If I had known that this is what agreeing to divide you would lead to, I would have fought it."

North bared his teeth, but his surge of anger quickly faded. “It… isn’t your fault.”

It was his. He should have fought it, should have told CCCP to screw off and waited for the American ships with his rifle ready, even if a war with him would have ravaged Korea even more than it already had been, even if he knew without their People’s Army and everything they had now, they would have just ended up with the entire Peninsula being colonized by America, sentencing them to another thirty years of guerrilla warfare, or more.

At least he would have his brother with him.

“It was America’s decision,” he told the Soviet. “He was the one that ruined the Reunification talks, and he was the one that forced through Rhee’s ‘republic.’ And he is the one violating international law to lay waste to my country. Korea doesn’t blame the Soviet Union for this war.”

For all his… gripes with CCCP, justified and not, this wasn’t one of them.

It hadn’t been on him to win, after all.

“I am grateful you see it that way,” the Soviet said. “And I will keep doing what I can for you with my pilots and in the United Nations. Even if it is fruitless.”

And it would be. Just like the germ warfare protests and trying to get North and China’s representatives in and stopping China from being labelled an aggressor and all the armistice attempts and protecting the Supung Dam and trying to stop the war in the first place. The United Nations was America’s playground. He would do what he wanted there, and all the other nations would follow his lead. Just like he would in Korea.

“But I will say- the greatest assurance I could give you is to take you into the Soviet Union.” The man said it with his usual blunt forwardness. “America’s politicians do not dare move against me directly, let alone the rest of the capitalist world. If Korea had been seen by them as my official child, this war would not be happening this way."

North's jaw creaked. He kept his voice stiff and formal. "Any intention of Korea joining the Soviet Union would have only ensured that America fought even harder against our Reunification. And half of a country cannot make decisions for the whole."

"I know you still do not intend to make the decision at all," CCCP said. "And we cannot change the past. It is just something to think about for the future."

He returned the Soviet's blunt tone. "The only thing in Korea's future is Reunification."

"I do not intend to pressure you," CCCP tried to soothe him. "It is still enough for me that you are my son. I only want to be able to use all my power to keep you and your people safe."

Korea's people didn't need anyone but Korea to keep them safe. It was his duty. And North didn't need anyone at all.

He turned away, heading wordlessly back to the clearing.

China was still on the log, wedged between SH and Chagang, looking put out. His head swivelled as the undergrowth crackled and the other two nations returned.

"Back from whispering about me, I assume?" he asked, sniffing indignantly.

"I don't talk about other counties behind their backs," North responded, unable to help the emphasis. And still feeling slightly guilty about his earlier comment.

"I will be leaving now," CCCP unceremoniously announced. "I am sorry I could not bring any warm meals with me this time. The sky is too dangerous for a plane, and fresh food would not have lasted the drive."

"That isn't a problem, comrade," SH said politely, freeing China from his press. "Thank you for what you did bring. Especially the letters. Tell Comrade Belarus I'll draw her something next time."

“I will. And I am glad they brought you some heart. But I will still bring a homecooked meal when this war is won.”

Hae inched up to North, whispering in his ‘ear.’

He glowered at her. ‘I’m not asking him for anything.’

She blinked her big eyes. ‘Pleaaasssssseeeeee?’

North sighed, grudgingly asking the Soviet, “Do you have peaches and cream in your country?”

“Yes,” CCCP said, bemused. “Would you like me to bring some?”

North shot a look over his shoulder, where Hae was vigorously nodding. She immediately stopped.

North didn’t answer, but the Soviet still said, “Then I will.”

“Ura!” Hae cheered, then squeaked, “SorryKorea.”

North just shook his head, directing his provinces to line up so they could bow (some (North Hamgyong) more grudgingly than others) to send CCCP off. As soon as they had, Hae took off for the woods, calling, “Latrinessorrygot’ago!”

North’s pang of irritation turned to worry. She had better not be having stomach issues again. He would ask Kangwon to give her a full check-up next time she gave blood.

His province was standing next to CCCP at his truck.

“Hey,” he said. “Thanks again for getting me out of Norway.”

“It is no problem, son,” CCCP said, though North knew it had caused him more then a few. “Helping my children is never an issue.”

North hated when he called his provinces ‘son’ or ‘daughter,’ even more than when he called him that. He hated when he called them by their names, too, without ‘comrade’ attached. It was annoying.

Kangwon fiddled with his fingers. “About that postcard…”

“I do not know if it reached its recipient,” CCCP told him. “But it was sent.”

“That’s good enough then. Thanks.” Kangwon’s lips lifted, but his eyes didn’t brighten. They looked almost sunken in, like a foreigner’s.

With the army economization, North had had his rations cut down to those of an army clerk at headquarters, still more than the other provinces, but less than before. He resolved to raise them back to the amount of an active-duty soldier, like his own. He needed them. And unlike his Countryhuman, he would eat all of them.

And he wouldn’t have to worry about there being enough for Gangwon, too.

“Do you need a ride anywhere, son?” CCCP asked China as he padded over.

“To the end of this road, if you’re willing,” the man said. “My Mobile Command is sending someone to pick me up. Would Comrade Korea like to come for the drive?”

Not wanting to give them another chance to gossip about him, or for CCCP to tell China what he’d said, North wordlessly climbed into the BTR.

He’d been trying to force China to sit in the gun nest in the back, or cling to the side. He was displeased when he slid in after him, sandwiching him between the two taller men.

North glared at him. His comrade smiled back.

Thankfully he stayed pressed to the door, giving North a little room in the cab that was only meant for two. At least enough that he could still breathe. He was on edge, hyper-aware of CCCP’s solid bulk pressing against his left, and that the only way out would be clawing his way through China, but he managed to tame his urge to do that without provocation.

They stopped at the mouth of the woods, before the field of stumps. CCCP should have remained behind the wheel, but he maneuvered his massive body out again. He probably wasn't looking forward to the very long drive back to his country.

North knew the Soviet's personal car was modified like the GAZ to hold (some of) his children. He had to wonder if a special frame had been manufactured to make it taller as well. Or was driving always uncomfortable for him?

"Thinking important thoughts?" China hummed in his 'ear.'

"Yes," North said flatly.

CCCP strode over, long coat flapping, and held out his arms. China met him in another hug, as easily as if he was shaking hands.

They really were more physically comfortable around each other, even having spent nowhere near as much time together as North had with the both of them. He could tell China would never feel the urge to fight to escape a warm embrace, and that CCCP wouldn't still need to lie awake until he was sure China was asleep before he could close his own eye, and have to sleep with his eyepatch on.

When they pulled back, the larger country kept his arm around the Chinese man's slender shoulders, China leaning casually into him. CCCP held out his free arm, and North braced himself.

But the hug didn't come. It looked like he reconsidered, placing his huge hand on his shoulder instead, gently squeezing.

He'd felt the bandages earlier. And the heat radiating through them as they were pressed together in the car. And he was treating him like he was fragile because of it.

North opened his mouth, then closed it. CCCP withdrew his hand, and he was left aching.

"You are resilient, son," the man said, with that aggravating tinge to his usually blunt voice. "You will end this war. And I will be with you the entire way, as will all those whose letters we brought."

“And China,” China added.

“I know I will,” North replied, spine straight, clamping down on anything else that might come out of his mouth.

He didn’t need them to remind him he was resilient, only his people. He wasn’t some child whimpering about facing the Imperialist hordes almost entirely on his own, who needed to be soothed. He didn’t need their moral support, only their materiel.

“You will,” CCCP repeated firmly.

Then his face shifted, his eye narrowing and his heavy brows drawing down, lips peeling back from his fangs as his voice grew as cold as the depths of Siberia, rumbling in his chest.

“And one day, America will pay for what he has done to my children.”

North didn’t let himself step back, but he felt the hair on the back of his neck rise, his body telling him danger was near.

Usually CCCP tried to portray himself as the image of a kind-hearted, if stern, father. But there were times like these, when he caught a glimpse of the part of him that had been capable of cutting down the Russian Empire, slaughtering thousands of White Army soldiers, and single-handedly storming Berlin to free his stolen children, that the Korean could understand why Nazi Germany had chosen suicide over letting the Soviet get his hands on him.

“No more peaceful coexistence?” China asked, looking small under CCCP’s heavy arm, his thick fingers digging into his shoulder.

“I have tried,” the man said coldly. “The Yankee made his choice when he walked away from the talks to Reunify Korea. You cannot coexist with someone who does not know the meaning of peace. If he truly wants to play this game, then I will make sure he regrets it.”

China hummed, and North relaxed as the Soviet did, his stoic expression falling back in to place.

“Do not fear the atom bomb, sons,” he said. “America knows that if he uses it, it will not end well for him.”

North exchanged a brief look with China. Despite dealing with him for longer than them, and opening his eye to the United Nations and the futility of trying to coexist with a warmonger…

Somehow, he didn’t think CCCP truly understood America.

“It is quite useful that you have your own,” China said idly. “Maybe you should share your research with us. The more the merrier, right?”

North gave the other country a sharp look.

CCCP just used the hand on his shoulder to ruffle his head. “You do not need the atom bomb. I have it. I will protect you.”

“En,” China said, smiling. “I suppose you’re right.”

North tipped his head, eye narrowing in thought.

CCCP looked at him for a long moment, like he might say something, then released China from his hold, heading for the driver’s side.

“Goodbye-“

“WAIT!”

North whirled at the familiar shout, seeing a small dark shape barreling down the road.

“Wait!” Hae called. “Ah- Ah have-!”

She skidded to a halt next to them, doubling over, clutching at something pressed to her chest as she gasped for breath.

Too hard. The short run shouldn’t have winded her that much.

“Ah- have- a cat!”

She straightened up, thrusting her arms out, a scrawny yellow feline dangling with her hands under its front legs.

North's eye slitted. "Is that the one from the last big air raid?"

Hae hunched guiltily, and he knew it was.

"Ah'msorryKoreabutahcouldn'tjus'leaveherthereinthecitywhatifshegotbomb

"South Hwanghae, silent order."

Hae's mouth snapped shut. She looked at him pleadingly as she held the creature out.

Not wanting to get into it in front of CCCP, North said frostily, "You can talk. Slowly."

"Ah was wonderin' if Comrade CCCP could take her," she said hopefully, holding the cat towards him. "Ah really want to keep her, but ah know it's too dangerous here. Ah don't have anythin' to feed her, and ah don't want her gettin' hurt."

CCCP took the cat with no hesitation, cradling it in his arms as he ran a hand over its head, dwarfing the skinny animal. It looked frozen in fear for a moment, before it settled in, eyes half-closing in pleasure.

The Soviet examined it for a second, then nodded. "I had a comrade who was fond of cats, and we have kept a few around before. I and my other children will take good care of her."

Hae sagged in relief, her eyes gleaming in the moonlight. "Thank ya so much! Her name is Ten Percent, and she's a girl."

CCCP nodded soberly, though the animal clearly wasn't female.

"Oh, but-" Hae ducked her head suddenly, looking stricken. "Um, don't call her Ten Percent. Call her… Corn."

"Corn?" North asked suspiciously.

His province nodded proudly. "'Cuz 'koyangi' an' 'kangnaengi' sound almost the same."

“Tch.”

“That is a fine name,” CCCP approved where North didn’t. “My children might find Russian words easier, but if they do, I will make sure the spirit of it is preserved, if 'Кукура’ is acceptable to you.”

“Ku-Kukur-" Hae gave up on the Russian name. “Ah like it!”

“Then she will be a welcome addition to the household.” CCCP scratched the cat behind one of its nicked ears, surprisingly gentle, though he could crush its skull with one hand.

“Thank you!”

Mission accomplished, Hae tried to slink away. North snapped his fingers, making her wince and shoot into military posture.

‘I’m dealing with you as soon as he’s gone,’ he promised her with lowered brows.

She pouted.

CCCP placed the cat in the vehicle (after Hae had ran over to pet it one last time). He was about to get in before he turned to North, beckoning him closer. Reluctantly, he went.

“Son,” he said lowly, though North knew China could still hear. “There is something you should hear. Family is not who claims you, but who you choose to claim.”

“What do you mean by that?” North could hear the edge in his voice.

CCCP gave him a look that said he knew what he meant. “Marx and Engels were wise men. As was my own Comrade Lenin and is my Comrade Stalin. But there is no man capable of writing theory to convince someone devoid of empathy to care for others. There is only one solution for someone like that.”

His eye moved to the star eyepatch, opposite his own.

North’s face was set in stone as he bit out, “And we will use that solution. On America and Syngman Rhee.”

He was tense, but CCCP only dipped his head.

“I am only sharing something it took me too long to learn. You will choose the path you think is best for your country. The future of the Korean people is in Korean hands, as always." He gave him a piercing look. "Just remember that sharing blood with someone does not always make them kin.”

CCCP patted him on the shoulder again, then drew his long limbs into the truck, starting the engine and pulling away.

“I will see you after your victory, son,” he called out the hatch window.

“Bye-bye!” Hae waved as he drove through the field of tree stumps. “And bye Corn! Ah hope you like Russia! Eat lots of mayonnaise an’ kompot, and other Soviet stuff!”

North watched the shadow of CCCP’s armoured vehicle pull onto the highway, heading towards Pyongyang. At the western checkpoint, some of his own vehicles would rendezvous with him to escort him to the border.

He'd stayed too long. The last couple hours of his journey would be in the daylight. And North wouldn’t know if he had gotten safely back to the Soviet Union for days.

Ssi-bal, he should have told him to telegraph.

“Wise words,” China noted, slinking over to his side, not leaning against him the way he’d been clinging to CCCP. Thankfully.

North didn’t respond. They were wise words. But not for him.

He and his brother shared far more important things than blood.

“Ah hope Corn’ll be alright,” Hae fretted, hands on her hips. “It must be scary to get taken someplace else all of a sudden. Ah wish ah could tell her why ah had to give her away.”

She suddenly stiffened, slowly turning to look at North.

He was already looking at her. Glaring.

“Koreaahreallydin’tmeantodisobeyyabutwhenahleftJonsungshewasstillarou

“Were you feeding it your rations?” North cut her off.

Hae shook her head vigorously. “You told me not to give ‘em away, and ah know ah shouldn’t. Ah only give ‘em away on the weekend to our people. She was catchin’ birds, and mice around the latrines.”

Some of the tension went out of his shoulders. Even though a part of his mind whispered that if Hae had disobeyed him about getting rid of the cat, she could also be lying to him now.

“Then it’s fine.”

Hae had squeezed her eyes shut. She cracked one open now to look cautiously up at him. “You’re not goin’ to hit me over the head with your boot?”

“Don’t say that like I do it often,” North grumbled, conscious of China’s presence. “And no.”

“But ah din’t do what you said.”

He sighed. “For the last time- I want you to think about my orders. And if you think I’m wrong, then I don’t want you to blindly act.”

He hadn't reached his limit with her like he had for North Pyongan, since she wasn’t a pushover and was capable of operating on her own. And North was the only person whose orders she followed so ardently. But it was still a problem. He needed her walking next to him, not behind him. If all her concentration was on making sure her feet landed in his footsteps, she wouldn’t notice if he was leading them off a cliff.

Hae blinked, a grin splitting her face. “Ura! Korea’s not mad at me!”

“But I was right this time.” North smacked her over the head, making sure her hat cushioned it. “And I want you to bring any issues you have to me, not hide them.”

Hae’s relief wasn’t dulled. “Thank ya, Korea!”

“Get back to camp and eat your rations.”

Hae saluted, then tore off down the road, vanishing back into the trees.

North watched her go, trying to ignore his uneasiness, the same one he’d felt reading some of the letters his people had given to him earlier.

There were more direct complaints this year, problems for him to resolve. And like Hae gaining more discernment when it came to his orders, it should please him. It was what he’d been trying to coax out of them for years.

But the timing made his skin prickle. Had his actions finally started to convince the masses that they could bring their issues to their Countryhuman in person, that he wouldn’t get offended, and that anything that bothered his people could never be too small for him to deal with? Had Hae’s sympathy for animals finally made her think through his demands for once, and decide she couldn’t follow them?

Or had they started losing faith in him?

“If I told you I was aware of the cat, would you be mad?” China asked from behind him.

“No,” North said, tearing himself from his uncomfortable thoughts. “That was between my province and I. Unless she-“

He stopped, stumbling over his words.

He’d been using the polite hasipsio-che he used with CCCP for China all day, not wanting to risk the informality of his usual speech being translated to the Soviet when he shouldn’t know the Chinese man. But as he had gone to switch from the form he’d been using with Hae, he realized there was no switch to make.

He'd been aware that he had finally given up resisting using the intimate hae-che his provinces used with each other when he was alone with them.

But when had he started using it with China?

“Something wrong?” the other man asked.

North found his voice, forcing it out. “No.”

He couldn’t go back now. China heard his Korean as Korean. Unlike CCCP, the meaning would be entirely bared to him. If North switched back to haera-che, or even hao-che, it would look like retreating.

His eye flicked towards China, who was still smiling, giving no sign of if he knew what had just closed the Korean’s throat.

It was… fine. He knew he’d begun using hao-che with him… some time ago. Maybe around when they had started sharing a room. And it was easier to just switch between hae-che for the other country and his own provinces and hasipsio-che for the Liaos, instead of adding a third form into it. That was probably why he’d subconsciously started doing it. And he already used it for his provinces. It wasn’t some sacred thing he could only use with one person, even if… It wasn’t. It was just a level of speech.

Still, he wondered if there was anyone South used hae-che for that wasn’t him. The idea made his chest clench.

What speech did he use with America?

“You know, now that our Soviet comrade is departed and our antagonist has gone home, I can finally say I’m the tallest Countryhuman in Korea,” China remarked, picking at the golden thread around his wrists. “Aiya, don’t look at me like that. It was a joke.”

That wasn’t why North was glowering at him.

“Why doesn’t CCCP know that you’ve been staying here?” he demanded in hae-che, even if it twisted his stomach into knots.

China tipped his head, squinting at his sleeve. “Would you tell me or our comrade if your General was ill?”

“No,” North said immediately.

“Exactly. A secret told to an honest man isn’t a secret for long.”

“You should have told me,” the Korean complained. “What if I mentioned you in one of my letters to him?”

“You didn’t, did you?” China smiled as he made a face. “The benefits of having friends that aren’t honest.”

“We aren’t friends,” North muttered.

And he didn’t like to hear China of all people say that he wasn’t honest.

Satisfied that whatever invisible imperfection that had been bothering him was gone, the other man undid his sleeve buttons, letting the long black fabric fall to hide his hands again.

“So, since we’ve been getting the full gamut of opinions today- what do you think of our Father?”

North stepped away as his shoulder brushed his. “Don’t call him that. He isn’t my father, and you aren’t my brother.”

China gave him one of his mock-pouting faces, pushing his lower lip out and widening his eyes pitifully. “You don’t want to be related to me?”

North was merciless. “No.”

“That works for me,” his comrade said, bouncing easily back. “I’d much rather be your comrade anyway. I’m an only child, more or less.”

Was ‘more’ Zhao Jingjing? Or someone else from China’s past?

North knew he probably wouldn't tell him if he asked.

"CCCP is a useful ally," North answered his question, hoping China wouldn't mention his eavesdropping.

"Mm," the other country hummed, eyes still on the long, dark road, empty now. "And that's all?"

"Yes," North said bluntly.

"Even if he keeps pestering you to join the Soviet Union?"

He knew (was fairly sure) China couldn't have heard them. The Soviet had likely just extended the same offer to him.

It was never official. Not something sanctioned by CCCP's government or presented to North's. This was the first time the Soviet had even mentioned it directly in years, since just before North had declared his People's Republic, asking him if he didn't want to become a Soviet Republic instead, and being met by the same answer the Korean country had given him tonight. The only time he'd even come close to mentioning it before then had been the night North agreed to accept the Joint Occupation.

It was just a wordless offer that hung over them. It was too politically untenable right now, but North knew if, at any time after the war was over, he turned to CCCP and said that he wanted to join the Soviet Union, the man would probably already have the documents ready, just waiting for his signature to slap a Soviet hammer and sickle on him and cart him back to Moscva to live with his other republics.

As much as North's revulsion at the idea hadn't faded at all, the reminder was almost comforting. China's motivations might be murky and unclear, but CCCP's were well known- he wanted Korea to join the Soviet Union. All the assistance he gave, the gifts he brought, the food he made, everything he did was to ensure that North's country wouldn't become an American puppet, but instead part of him.

Maybe he would still do it if he was human. But he wasn't. So

North could say that was it.

And it was better than the other unnerving thing he'd said that night, and that he did remind him of every time he saw him, one way or another.

'I want you to be my son.'

"So long as pestering is all it is, then as long as I can use him, I can tolerate him." North bit down as the words left his mouth.

China arched a brow. "Aiya, careful what you say. I might start to think you invited me here just to use me."

North gave him the most withering glare he could manage. "I didn't invite you here. That is my problem with you."

His comrade smirked. "Oh, I'm sure you have a few more problems with me than that."

"If you're looking for criticism, I'll make you a list." It would be long.

"I've actually been enjoying escaping my criticism sessions while here," China said airily. "Though if you're inviting me to one of you and your provinces' little get-togethers, I wouldn't say no."

"I would." There was no way North would ever let him sit in on a criticism session, especially one where-

"Afraid of criticizing yourself in front of me?" China guessed, his smile widening. "Or maybe of giving me a chance to criticize you?"

"I'm not afraid," North growled, though he'd guessed correctly. "If you have something to say, say it."

He glared at him, challenging him to.

"Mmmm," China deliberated. "No. I prefer to stay healthy. You never know when something you say could cause teeth marks to appear on your arm."

He rubbed his forearm pointedly.

“I don’t know what you’re talking about,” North deadpanned, and his comrade gave a light laugh.

North had to go back to the bunker to change before he left for the city. But he didn’t move right away. He would wait until his provinces were done cooking, and the food was gone. He could get SH to divvy up what CCCP had brought tomorrow.

He crossed his arms over his chest, feeling the burns throb under them as he stared off down the highway towards Pyongyang, listening to the drone of the bombers in the distance, hoping none of them would see the armoured vehicle heading north.

He shouldn't have said that about the Soviet.

It wasn’t like he wasn’t using CCCP. The electricity was back on now- if he had truly wanted to, he could have sent a telegram to the northern border and had the crossing guards turn him away. But North had noticed that during the trusteeship, on the visits where he took the man to survey poorer Pyongyang neighbourhoods or villages, the weeks after would see an increase in the amount of string-free aid he received- clothes, medicine, food. If a slightly run-down street could do that, then the long drive here through war-torn towns and smoldering heaps of ash where villages had once stood would definitely see returns.

He hated fishing for aid like that. He hated needing it from the Soviet at all. But his people had needed it then, and they needed it now.

So he was using CCCP. And he would continue to do so for as long as his people required.

But he didn’t want to be.

As much as North would prefer that Countryhumans only dealt with their own people and left foreign affairs to their leadership, and would stay in his country and never meet with another again if he had the choice, neither of those things were realistic. That wasn’t how the world worked, and he couldn't force the other nations to think it should be. And if he abstained from it on his own, it would weaken Korea's diplomatic position. So they were doomed to make alliances and send letters and… develop relationships.

And since they were, North didn't want those relationships to be ones of use. He wouldn't accept anyone using Korea, and Korea shouldn't need to use anyone. Imperialism grew when a capitalist country's greed overflowed its own borders and it turned to the rest of the world, only seeing the other nations, all their people and resources, in terms of use value.

Feline eyes that were as cold as ever, and that implacable voice, dispassionate even with the red spreading across his uniform.

'Korea needs to stand with Japan.'

As much as he didn't want to join CCCP's 'family,' he admired what the Soviet Union was doing. Uniting countries into one union, each republic contributing to the others without the axe of debt or exploitation hanging over their necks, knowing that they were contributing towards a shared future, not being used for someone else's. It was how the world should work, how North wanted it to, even if he thought that borders should remain stronger than the Soviet did. Maybe in a world like that, he could see CCCP's gifts as more than bribes, or those chests of letters as something other than payment. Or fully believe China when he said he was just here to pay a debt to his people.

And CCCP had brought those supplies. Even on his first few visits after the Joint Occupation began, when the Soviet Union had still been ravaged by war and his own people were still starving, the man had brought crates of army rations. Even after he had to have realized that supplying North's people with what they needed would have been a far more effective bribe than giving him things, he still showed up with fresh vegetables and meat to make the only good meals the chosonjip's kitchen ever saw, brought more of what he noticed they liked, like with Hae and her sweet blood bars, made alternatives for North when he made the others desserts, and stepped outside when he wanted to smoke, not needing to be told.

Even if it was all just because he expected North to join the Soviet Union, if he saw it as a bribe or just maintaining a future investment, North… couldn't really call it 'use.' Even if doing so would make him more comfortable. Or less comfortable. Or… He didn't know. Just like he didn't know why he had to reflexively say he was the one doing the using.

His head hurt, his temples pounding with fever and pain that pulsed in his entire body.

He didn't want the Soviet to think he saw the things he did for- his country in that cold utilitarian way. And he didn't want China to think that either. Not… anymore.

Except part of him did. Even though it contradicted his other desires.

Maybe that was another contradiction Socialism could solve. But more likely he would have to wait for Communism for that one. If ever.

"I have to get going," China said from beside him. "My 'visit' today isn't exactly public knowledge, but on the off-chance anyone saw me, I need to take my Little Sisters home, then sneak us back across."

North realized he'd been scratching under his eyepatch again, and lowered his hand. "You should take them home for good."

"Probably," his comrade agreed. "We'll be back tomorrow morning."

North watched the Jeep pull out of the trees farther along the mountain, rolling towards them with its headlights off, stopping on the side of the highway at the end of the path.

China took a step towards it, but no more. "Before I go, I actually do have a criticism for you."

North went to glare at him again, but found he wasn't smiling. He was looking at him seriously from under his commander's cap.

“Don’t avoid reading those letters just because you’re afraid of what they have to say.”

“I’m not afraid.” He despised when he said things like that.

“You are,” China decreed. “You don’t want to believe you’re not as alone as you feel.”

The Korean’s teeth grit. He thought he wanted to feel this way?

“I was hoping getting those to you might help you realize that more people care about Korea than you think.” China tilted his head at him. “It didn’t work, did it?”

North averted his gaze.

No. It hadn’t. He didn’t know why-

No, he did. But he knew it was unreasonable and wrong, so he couldn’t let the words leave his mouth.

“I do… appreciate it,” he told him, still not looking him in the eye. “I meant that.”

He bit his tongue, not letting those words leave either.

China’s smile ghosted over his face again. “By the way, I noticed that it really is just me you have a problem thanking.”

“Tch.”

His comrade’s eyes squinched. “That’s alright. You know I like a challenge.”

North didn’t know if he was talking about getting him to thank him or… the other thing.

“But do me a favour and read these, at least.”

China reached into the lapel of his jacket, pulling out a set of worn envelopes, slightly wrinkled from the long journey to Korea.

The first had two familiar names on it- Yao Song and Li Meihua.

North didn't recognize the others. But he had shouted several of the family names across the blood-soaked fields of Chorweon, and read them in Meng Yuyu's casualty records, along with the hometowns on the addresses.

'Shancheng Village, Liaotung Province,' read one.

"Whether it's tonight or five years after this war is won," China said quietly. "Please read these."

North hesitated, then took them, staring at the name Hong Mingzhu, written in a flowy, feminine hand, his chest constricting.

"I'll read them," he managed after a moment.

The 188th Division of the 63rd Army had fought and died for him. The least he could do was read what judgements their families had to pass on him for it.

Just not tonight.

"Thank you." China dipped his head.

The words came so easy to him. Even when North hadn't done anything except drag him and his people into his war.

North held the letters to his chest, mouth opening, then let them drop to his side.

"Don't get bombed on the way to the border," he said gruffly. "It would be a hassle."

China's lips curled higher. "Is that an order?"

"Yes."

"Then I suppose I'll do my best. You know how good of a driver I am."

North huffed as his comrade started gliding towards his Jeep.

"Oh, and comrade?" China turned, seamlessly walking backwards.

“Congratulations on seven years of freedom from the Japanese devils. Here’s to being free of the Yankee ones by the next.”

He held something from his sleeve up, the little jade stone Kim Hyo-ri had given him, using it to toast the sickle moon hanging over their heads. He tossed it into the sky, spinning on a heel and catching it with one hand as it descended.

“But I’ll still be with you even if we aren’t,” he called, teeth flashing in a half-crescent over his shoulder.

North didn’t respond, retreating under the trees, hoping China couldn’t see him watching him go from the shadows. But as his comrade got into the Jeep, taking the wheel from Liaotung, he lifted a hand directly towards him.

The Korean wrapped his arms around his chest, watching as he drove away, disappearing down the highway towards their border. The letters in his hand burnt against his skin worse than the bombs falling across his country, aching inside, too. Too many aches, all tangled together like a cicada knot.

They were too intertwined to begin unravelling, even if he wanted to. But he could always find that worst one, reaching into that deeper place for it, holding it in a mental grip, not for the first time that day.

He wished he could talk to his brother. His calls for a phone conversation were still being ignored, and he knew they would continue to be. Neither Rhee nor America would let him talk to their… to South.

All those years of yearning to hear his brother’s voice more than almost anything. It was so frustrating to know where he was now, down to the address, but be just as unable to as when he didn’t know if he was even alive or not.

The cord wasn't enough. It couldn’t communicate what he wanted to. Pulling it couldn’t ask his brother if what America had written was true or why he’d done it or if he was okay. It couldn’t tell him that no matter why he’d done it, it would be alright, they could move past it, but that he needed to finally stand up and demand a ceasefire, to save their people, to fight back for once in his fucking life.

North still pulled on it anyway, feeling that intangible cord stretching away to the south, telling him that if he just followed it, he would find his brother, hear his voice, wrap him in his arms, slot that missing piece into both of them like they were meant to, save him.

It didn't matter if East Germany had a similar tie. He knew it couldn't ache the same.

North stayed under the trees, looking out at the highway, empty in both directions, waiting for that pull back.

It didn't come.

—

China pressed on the gas, not immediately accelerating as fast as he could've.

He didn't look back, his eye only flicked, but Liaotung still said, "Are you sure we shouldn't have written him our own letters?"

"Good observation skills, meimei," he praised, though he hadn't been trying hard to hide the motion. "But you still want our comrade to be able to look you in the eyes, don't you?"

He wanted his friend to understand how they felt, but had the sense that if he understood too well, he would need to reject them in some way. Long-held beliefs didn't break without some drama. And while there were few things China loved more than drama, he didn't think his friend was in the position to handle it right now. Even if he itched to see how he would react.

"Debatable," Liaotung said, stretching her legs out from the back between he and Liaoxi's seats. "Korea-gege has a very intense stare."

Liaoxi gave a delicate shiver. "And you aren't even the one that most often has to bear… it."

"The long pause doesn't mean the rhyme isn't broken, Little Sister," China hummed as they approached the checkpoint beyond Jangsan.

"If you gave me a second, it wouldn't be, you tit." She side-eyed him smugly.

"Minus points for insulting gege."

"Bonus points for insulting gege," Liaotung corrected.

"Aiya," China sighed. "Is there any other Big Brother that has to put up with such cruel Little Sisters? Maybe I'll just leave you in your province tonight."

"Back across the river, we shall swim with barely a shiver," Liaoxi announced, and her sister nodded.

China smiled. "Did you have a productive day?"

"Paper and pencils we spread around," Liaoxi reported. "We made sure to cover much ground."

"Perfect." His friend couldn't refuse to let his own people's letters in, even if he tried. "And the other things?"

"We got the-" Liaotung made a face as he cut her off with a tongue click. "-supplies handed out. I gave Sun-ja hers, and got some to the mother of that girl you've been watching. 'Courtesy of the PVA.'"

China nodded in satisfaction, not just because Kum-mi would be eating well tonight, but from his province using Kim Sun-ja's given name. The little spa day North's artist had taken them on back in May had been helpful for all involved. He knew he'd been right sending his 'little sisters' along.

Even if he was still a touch sulky that he hadn't been invited.

"But are you sure you'll be okay?" Liaoxi fretted.

"I'll be fine. Our Soviet comrade gave me his own gift box." He was looking forward to trying his homemade jam. And the tinned fish, obviously. “Don’t worry for gege- he always make sure he eats enough to stay healthy.”

Unlike a certain someone that could no longer hide the tremors that shook him when he so rarely stood still.

His provinces didn’t look satisfied, but knew he wouldn’t be changing his mind. And that he was capable of surviving on far less than half-rations for a month.

His Chairman would know he wouldn't change his mind either. Which meant he'd be more receptive to sending him the supplies he might possibly need for his friend's upcoming birthday, if he settled on that certain idea of his. It was a little risky, and could be slightly embarrassing, even for him, considering he'd never done something like it for someone before, but he thought he would. He just needed to tweak it slightly to increase the chances of it being accepted.

Either way, he was sure he could get what he needed from his Xiao Mao. China may be the supreme enabler in their relationship, but the enabling was most definitely mutual.

He would confess, he was excited. He had always liked watching people face their fears. And he'd very much been enjoying getting his comrade to face this one, as he had after taking that bullet for him.

As they neared the checkpoint, he took his hands off the wheel without warning, leaving Liaoxi to sigh and grab it so they wouldn’t go off the road. He slid down in his seat, shucking off his officer’s coat and pants, replacing them with his infantry uniform and face mask, maneuvering around the arm his ‘little sister’ had so rudely invaded his space with.

Back to being Mao Zhilong, he popped up, taking the wheel from his province just in time to show the nice Security Forces men his ID card.

“Comrade Mao,” one of the usual officers greeted him, scanning the card and looking over the special papers his Countryhuman had written for the Chinese ‘soldier,’ giving permission for him not to reveal his face. “You at the speech earlier?”

“I was.” His pulse spiked, remembering the way his comrade had screamed out at his people, filled with desperate defiance. “Were you able to attend, Comrade Oh?”

The man shook his head sadly, passing the papers back. “Shift had already started. But we heard the broadcast. Comrade Korea and the General can certainly speak.”

‘Yes he can.’ Especially when his heart was in it. China had been occupied with his trial and post-trial domestic affairs last Liberation Day, but he’d listened to his friend’s broadcast once he returned. And while he hasn’t been able to walk the streets last year, he was certain the difference between then and now had to be that between a path and courtyard.

See? Always fun to watch someone face their fears.

“So what do you think?” China felt the eyes of his ‘little sisters’ on him. “Will we get an armistice this year?”

The man was Security, trained in one of his comrade’s special schools, the urge to be cautious and secretive drilled into him. China watched his face attentively, pretending it was idly.

“One year or a hundred,” Oh said, straightening up and putting a fist over his heart. “I’ll be staying vigilant for the enemy for Comrade Korea.”

Not a direct answer, but China could see the way his lips twitched, the corners of his glowing eyes firming. He wished his comrade could see, but he had a feeling he wouldn’t even if he was here.

“And the PVA will be doing the same,” he said, touching two fingers to his brow in an informal salute. “I hope you have a boring watch. But if you don’t, put a bullet in the reactionary bastards for me.”

The middle-aged man grinned, assuring him he would as the sandbag roadblock was removed, and China drove through, off into the dark hills between them and their border.

“Nosy,” Liaotung declared.

“Information-gathering,” he corrected, dropping the Korean he’d put on.

“Nosy,” Liaoxi agreed.

“By the way, how was he?” Liaotung asked, leaning back as they started to speed up.

‘He’ was of course a different ‘he’ than their Korean comrade. Both his ‘little sisters’ were aware of how he was. His mask was growing a bit rough around the edges.

“Aiya, now who’s nosy?”

“It’s not nosiness to ask about our country’s bus-i-ness,” Liaoxi defended.

“You know how it is,” he said vaguely. “Give an inch and some people will take ten more.”

“And you would know all about that, wouldn’t you?” Liaotung asked dryly.

“I’m an expert, really.” He reached over to spider his fingers up her ankle, taking another inch.

“And some people also gave Luda back,” Liaoxi reminded him. “We must remember that fact.”

“Dalian,” he corrected (even though that wasn't actually the official name), swatting at his other ‘little sister’s’ foot as she tried to nudge him with it.

“He’s being aloof,” Liaotung said, finally drawing her legs onto the back bench, safely out of his reach. “I think he likes it.”

China could still feel CCCP’s arms around him, radiating warmth like a mobile kang, and didn’t confirm or deny. He certainly didn’t dislike their Soviet comrade's overfamiliarity. It was more the sentiment behind it he wished he could change.

"China is very grateful for all that our Comrade CCCP has done for us," he said, speeding up. "After all, rumour says he might've spared us the trouble of getting rid of that pesky Manchukuo, doesn't it?"

His 'little sisters' knew the truth of what had happened to his one-time sibling and their one-time cellmate. They stayed quiet.

"I'm going to get some sleep." Liaotung leaned back on the bench, sliding down against the drab headrest, stretching her legs out again.

They drove in silence for a half hour, through the winding hills and flat plains between Pyongyang and Anju, a more straightforward route than that they'd taken when first travelling this way with their comrade's army. China kept his eyes out the open side of the Jeep, watching the Korean countryside streak by in shades of grey and black, alert for the slightest dark shadow against the smoky clouds drifting over the claw moon and vast canvas of stars.

"So, how are you and your butterfly?" he eventually asked, keeping his voice low to avoid waking his sleeping province.

Liaoxi's head was turned from him, but he knew she was awake.

"How are you and your fish?" she murmured sleepily back.

Guessing what idiom she meant, China smiled. "Turns out you can find them in trees after all, if you wish."

"I love him," she said, nuzzling into her headrest. "Thank you for indulging my whim."

She was too tired to realize what she'd just admitted. China smiled, reaching over to place a hand on her knee.

"Hands on the wheel, hands on the wheel." She sat up, regaining a little consciousness.

“I’m glad such a nice emotion you get the chance to feel,” her country said innocently, putting both hands back on the hard olive wheel, but refusing to slow down.

He was. She really did deserve to feel it, as her.

Liaoxi held on to the curved side of the open cab, smiling. Sorrow clung to the corners.

She still hadn’t asked after what he had planned for her, or told her sister he was planning something. It filled China with pride, even if her mask was a touch subpar.

She was ready to play her role. All his provinces were. The letters they’d sent for their comrade when he asked, and those they’d sent to him proved it. Even Qinghai and those he’d shattered Sichuan into. It was about time he reconstituted her. The soldier boy would send the coded order in his next letter to his father.

He wished he could be there. He wanted to welcome his ‘little sister’ back now that she’d been broken of the Nationalist in her, to finish taming Qinghai, and to see Xinjiang perform the arts she’d chosen, song and dance, of course, as that was what the western province was famous for. Her letter had mentioned sanam particularly, which was promising. It was typically danced in a male-female pair, but she wasn’t close with the male provinces around her. China didn’t think he was wrong in interpreting it as a silent pledge.

Alas, he wouldn’t forsake Korea. Especially not now. It would have to do that his ‘little siblings’ all knew he was here, minus Tibet, whom he hadn’t been able to visit, and his Comrade Chairman wasn't yet allowed to summon. And they couldn’t risk telling him in a letter. One never knew if a monk would intercept it.

It had been a risk telling the others at all. There were several sensitive cases he’d had to consider deeply before deciding to, such as his Xinjiang. But in the end, he couldn’t have them thinking he was being so scarce because he didn’t care. And it looked like his trust hadn’t been for nothing, as Yankee bombs still weren’t falling farther than the provinces on the Korean border.

When this war was finally over, and China could go home, he knew they would be ready to shake their country to its roots. No. To cut them out and lay new ones.

China's provinces were ready to change.

"I don't feel safe when you look at the road that way," Liaoxi remarked, seeing the glow in his gaze.

"Then why don't you put those pretty eyes away?"

"Rhyming 'away' with 'way.'" Liaoxi shook her head. "Not very clever, I say."

China's hands tightened on the wheel as he was seized by a sudden rush of affection, pressing the gas pedal flush to the floor.

"You don't have to kill us over it," his province said mildly.

"Get some sleep for a bit," he replied, smiling over at her. "Gege will watch the road."

"And I'm sure he won't drive us off," she muttered, closing her eyes anyway.

"If he does, I'm sure you'll wake up to scoff."

Liaoxi hummed, turning in her seat so she was facing him, resting her cheek against the headrest. In a few minutes, her breathing had deepened under the rush of wind.

China reached over, brushing his hand across Liaotung's leg, then tucking her sister's collar over the gap between it and her scarlet scarf, shielding her neck from the air that whistled around their windshield. Even if it wasn't cold, the muggy heat of it could cause moisture in her chest. She didn't need that when their anti-germ warfare efforts had just started to make her sympathetic fever fade. His foot lifted off the gas, just a little.

He gave himself an ironic smile. Even if he had his reservations about CCCP's desire to play house from a political standpoint, he supposed he had no right to judge personally.

‘Sharing blood with someone does not always make them kin.’

They really were wise words. Not that Countryhumans could share blood or DNA, or any of the things that bound humans together in kinship. Even Liaoxi and Liaotung were only sisters because they’d once been one person, and shared a people. And they wouldn’t be for much longer.

A Countryhuman couldn't truly have a family. For most, it was something decided by shared history and land, or colonial relations, like their antagonist and the wretched empire that had birthed him. A meaningless word that meant nothing in comparison to political machinations or realpolitik.

If it did have meaning, it was usually an unpleasant one. In the end, a country could only have one representation.

If you considered a family bond something that could outlast betrayal and match your love for your nation, then the only countries he could name that truly had one were CCCP and his brood, and his comrade and his brother. And…

Well, he had told his friend what he needed to know. They would see, or they would not.

China wasn’t wired to have a real family bond, as he’d mulled over with Jingjing. But he wasn’t adverse to them. It was the opposite, really. He liked the idea of the new-type relationship CCCP and the other Socialist nations were building. ‘Son’ just wasn’t the role he had an interest in playing in that relationship. No matter how even-handed a parent was, there would always be an imbalance between them and a child. And that imbalance was even more severe when you added something like an atom bomb to the parent’s side.

He'd seen the thoughtful look in his friend’s eye, the same as that day he’d hunted him down on Jangsan. Hopefully he would think as deeply on it as China would, even if it couldn’t get him off the stage. After all, all good relationships were built on equality.

Blood was important to China’s nation, even more so than some.

Being a filial son, a dutiful daughter, a son-bearing wife, an obedient little sister, a gracious child. Confucius and other men like him had woven it into their society, entangling the threads likely too tightly to ever truly be removed.

It wasn't like China wanted to. He agreed with that most simple of truths- the strength of a nation derived from the integrity of the home. He just had different ideas of what ‘integrity’ was. He didn’t want the homes of China to breed blind obedience or undeserved piety. ‘Home’ wasn’t the place you were born in, and ‘family’ wasn’t someone you were obligated to love. Obligation and love were antithetical, even to a Countryhuman. China didn’t love his people because he was obligated to- he loved them because they were worthy of it.

He'd always liked the little sibling in plays, what they represented. But he’d never liked when the narrative refused to flesh them out. When the plot sent the hero off, leaving a little brother or sister, or mother or wife back home, or chasing after a father or older brother, and expected you to value the protagonist’s drive to see them again solely because of what they were, not who they were. It became less about love and more about the cold contractual need to pay back the person they’d been forced to wed, or had birthed and raised them, or grown up alongside, whether or not that childhood had been warm. It cheapened a story, and a protagonist.

China could remember reading those enemy propaganda leaflets in the Beijing library, the sordid tale of the territories of the Russian Empire uniting against their father and taking his head. The words had been supposed to fill the average reader with horror at the idea of barbaric foreigners turning against their own kin, and paint the Communist ideas that had already been gaining popularity across the nation as completely opposed to the Chinese way of life.

But all they had done was make China’s heart pound, and long to meet the man those unfilial children had become. Even before he’d left his tower, he had already decided that the blood inside someone’s veins was truly one of the most boring things to use to justify a family.

It was the blood outside that mattered. That which someone was willing to shed for you, and you were willing to shed for them, to drench yourself with and let it seep inside you. Not an obligation, but a choice, the choice to die for your country or tap a vein for your comrades. None of the gold dust China had devoured compared to the blood staining the lips of those around him on that long march. Not even his second little sister's.

Family ties were forged with blood, not made of it. CCCP understood that. And he had committed to the forging back when China had directed him towards his Kuomintang. Even if it had showed a disappointing lack of faith in his Communists (one they had more than disproved, thank you), it also showed a willingness to work together in their shared struggle, as did his desire to help their Korean comrade now. Even if he couldn't step into the spotlight, he was taking risks to his own people by working backstage for Korea.

So long as the Soviet was willing to fulfill that 'paternal' role he wanted so badly, and didn't expect China to ever feel obligated to return it with filial piety, then China was willing to consider him family. He would even act the role of son, even if he was striving for something else.

'So long as he's useful, as some would say.' China smiled to himself, thinking of his friend's little wince as he'd said the words, picturing him doing the same as he said something similar about China to his General.

He looked over his shoulder, taking his eyes off the road and keeping his foot on the gas, picturing North waking alone down the dark highway behind him, back to overwork himself. He would have driven him to Pyongyang, if he didn't know he would reject the offer. He could have said it was good his comrade would get the chance to relax his mask, but he knew he didn't do that even when alone (or when he thought he was).

Unfortunately, he didn't think his friend had the same view on family as he and their Soviet 'father' did. His rejection of CCCP's sensible words had been predictable.

It wasn't as if China could blame him. It had taken decades for the Russian Empire's territories to turn against their patriarch, even with all his mistreatment. And hadn't he felt his own reluctance for just a second as his little sister had looked up at him as the army rushed to leave? And he hadn't known her for nearly as long. Though admittedly, it did have something to do with the nature of her request.

'I want you to eat me.'

And China would be far from the first person who had a right to protest his friend's rigid definition of family, at least eighteenth in line. Nineteenth, if you counted his General. And his comrade would probably put him much farther back on that list, though he was taking the liberty of placing himself ahead of CCCP.

Oh well. That wasn't what he was here for. He had no right to interfere in family affairs. He was simply trying to make sure his friend wasn't the one who would end up consumed, if in a different way than China's little siblings.

And to try and convince him that someone cared. That that new-type relationship was possible, between all the working people of the world. And between their countries.

He reached into his sleeve, steering with his knee as he felt the edges of that waxed paper tucked next to the jade stone, smiling as the Jeep weaved across the road in lazy arcs.

After all, Korea had already proven it to him.

If you asked North to untangle the ball of string that is his feelings about other friendly Countryhumans, he would just set the entire thing on fire.
To dive in to China's view on family, he sort of idolizes the idea of it, which is very tied to lots of things that he's gone through, and also his culture in general. He doesn't like the idea of blind love/piety, and seeks to change it, but he also can't help but admire the concept. He really does love Zhao Jingjing and sees her as his sister, just like he loved □□□□□□□, and loves his provinces. But since he idolizes family as this unbreakable bond that can't be affected by betrayal (even if it should be), he feels like he can't say he loves them like real siblings. If one of them betrayed him, he wouldn't love them any less, but he would be perfectly capable of killing/reconstituting them. For the sake of the nation, he's willing to reconstitute his provinces without them betraying him. He'll grieve and regret that it had to be done, but not that he did it. To him, North is the perfect example of a real sibling- South cut out his eye and is a genuine threat to the country, but he still loves him and has no intention of removing him, where China would without hesitation. So surely China can't truly be capable of real family love. There's a period of time where he sort of reconsiders this (spoiler warning for the Sino-Soviet split) because of CCCP. He doesn't have the option to kill or eliminate him, and he's not truly the one that betrayed/is working against him (a thousand-thousand curses upon Khrushchev and his ilk), and he finds that he can't really cut him off either , even though his government wants him to. He justifies it by saying its for their nation's sake by keeping the countries friendly even if their governments aren't, but he's also fully aware it looks bad for him to still be spending holidays in the Soviet Union when they're asking America if they'd interfere if they bombed him. He does eventually cut him off (and then, well, we know who else he cuts off), which solidifies his view that he just isn't capable of real family love. But he is capable of being loyal like a dog. He also learns that grief is much more difficult to accept when the person you're grieving isn't dead.

A reminder that in real life it was sixteen armies against the DPRK (plus Rhee's and medical troops), but in this Norway has joined with a small (mostly ceremonial) force, so that's why North says it's seventeen. Also koyangi and kangnaengi are Korean for cat and corn. 고양이/강냉이. North isn't sure if he hates Hae naming animals or the names she chooses for the animals more.

If you're interested in China's touchiness with CCCP, it's because he tailors his levels with people. CCCP wants that physical intimacy to reinforce that they're family, so China gives it to him. North gets uncomfortable when he's touched, so China maintains some distance. His ideal touchiness with people he likes is to be pressed up against them or draped across their shoulder like a cat though, so he does let some of that seep through with North (andalsomaybebecauseit'snotthatNorthdoesn'twanttobetouchedbuttha

Sarang, Sarang

The air under the trees was hot and sticky, clinging to North Pyongan's cobalt skin and making him wish for the cool breeze of the open sea as he hiked up Mount Taesong. The higher crags of the eastern foothills prevented even weak fingers of wind from parting the emerald branches overhead.

"Are you alright?" he asked over his shoulder.

"Take no fright," Liaoxi panted from a few paces back. "I'm better off than the ride here. Big Brother made us cool him off the entire time, I fear."

China clearly still hadn't adapted to the summer heat. And, if last year was an indicator, would not.

"Did he bring a fan?"

Liaoxi puffed out her cheeks as she nodded. "He's an awful man."

North Pyongan chuckled, shifting his bag of grain to one arm as he helped her up a small incline.

They padded through the woods, his guards occasionally visible as flashes of green-brown through the maze of undergrowth and slender tree trunks. He disliked having to haul them up into the hills in the heat, but knew they wouldn't obey if he told them to wait at the bottom. Even though it was unlikely one of the enemy air drop operations would be so close to Pyongyang, where the skies were constantly monitored, neither them nor Korea wanted to risk the provinces being alone. And if North Pyongan got captured again…

Well. He would just make sure he gave Kim Don-om and Ho Yong-ik a chance to rest before they left for Sinuiju tonight.

"I'm sorry I have to leave later," he said to Liaoxi as they hiked through the woods, following the footpath worn through the hills. “It’s Party work. Korea wants me focused.”

It was time for the minor Party cell elections to begin, and to carry out his post-Liberation Day rounds. Their people needed to see their provinces on the ground, still faithfully carrying their flag forward to victory and guiding them with sure feet.

Though the idea of leaving Korea alone right now…

“It’s more than fine,” Liaoxi dismissed. “I’m sure my sister and I can find something to do to pass the time.”

“Like hand out more supplies?”

“If someone told you we do that, they are spreading lies.” Liaoxi said it lightly, not seeming bothered that he knew it was her lying. Or performing, rather.

He smiled to himself, not pushing. He wasn’t sure if Korea knew the full extent of how much China had the Liaos doing, but he knew if he had been able to hear enough refugees telling him to thank the PVA for their donations, then his Countryhuman had, too.

He still wished Korea would thank Liaoxi and her sister directly, and China. But he knew not to push. It was miraculous enough that he had dedicated an entire section of his Liberation Day speech to praising their allies. That was what the Premier did, not Korea.

‘Even if he had that look in his eye he gets when he has to criticize himself at a session.’ It was progress, anyway.

They followed the path until the land started to slope into the dip where Oh Tae-min and Hyun Han-jin’s house was. As always when he saw the little hut his sister and Chagang had built, guilt seized his heart.

He had told them they could return to Ganghwa soon. That had been over a year ago now.

‘Mister Yun Chi-sam died without ever going home. I don’t want that to happen to us.’

North Pyongan took a deep breath, forcing away that feeling, like a broad-banded sea snake lurking just under the water.

It wouldn't happen to them. They would get a ceasefire like Korea said, and it wouldn't take a hundred years. Han-jin and Tae-min would live to see it, so long as he took care of them.

Lifting the sack in his arms, he descended into the dip.

Their boys were home today, and lounging around in the heat like cats in a courtyard. Han-jin was on his stomach in the dirt next to the cooking pit, face down and shirt off, while Tae-min was half-inside, leaning against the open doorframe and fanning himself limply with a hand. Neither of them had noticed he and Liaoxi yet.

"Your skin's going to get darker," Tae-min warned his friend as he stretched out in the sun.

"Don't care," Han-jin mumbled into the dirt. "'S too hot. And you like my tan."

"I never said that," Tae-min denied, flushed from the heat. "And you wouldn't be so hot if you got out of the sun."

"Lazy." Han-jin spread both his arms, melting into the ground in a puddle of bronzed flesh and curly hair.

"You're going to get all dirty," his friend grumbled, looking away. "I'm going to make you sleep on the floor."

"I'll sleep right here."

Tae-min shuffled sideways slightly, stretching out his good leg as he tried to reach his friend to nudge him with his foot, eyes narrowed and tongue poking from his mouth in concentration. As he did, he noticed the provinces reaching the bottom of the dip, jerking up.

"Hyung."

Han-jin raised his head, blinking muzzily. His eyes widened as he saw Liaoxi, and he shot up with sudden vigour, grabbing his shirt and tossing it on.

"Sorry, noona," he apologized as he swiftly buttoned up the peasant garment.

"It's no problem, I ken," Liaoxi assured him good-naturedly. "A woman in the army sees a lot of shirtless men."

But not in their army unit. Korea wouldn't let them remove their tunics even at the bunker now (though South Pyongan and North Hamgyong didn't always obey that when he wasn't around). He said it was to conceal their burns from their people and the Chinese, but they all knew he was thrilled to have an excuse to reinforce the rule he had tried to set during their guerrilla days. His sister's label of 'prude' for their Countryhuman had never been false.

Not that North Pyongan would wear his sleeveless summer undershirt even if he had permission. He preferred modesty, too, though the lack of it didn't make him as uncomfortable as Korea.

And he knew he was right when it came to being in public. North Hamgyong really shouldn't take his jacket off around their railway workers, no matter how hot he got working on the lines. Even with the bandages, their workers would spot the blood that soaked them as he hammered a tie into the ground. Every time they changed for the night, North Pyongan could see the muddy red stains he brought home on his undershirt.

They needed to hide them, at least from their people. If they were fearing for their provinces, their steps might falter.

And they needed to hide them from Korea, too. Even if he knew they were there.

Tae-min was eyeing he and Liaoxi, and the Korean province took what he tried to make a subtle step away, putting a bit of space between them. The two had guessed he had feelings for her, but like the rest of their people, they couldn't know he had acted on them.

"You don't have to get up," he told Tae-min, but as usual, he ignored him, maneuvering his lame leg around and using the doorframe to haul himself to his feet.

He had gotten handy with working around the disability, but he still staggered slightly. Han-jin reached for him, drew back, then reached for him again, though at that point his friend was standing firm with his cane. He ended up patting his shoulder somewhat awkwardly.

North Pyongan eyed Tae-min, but he looked more exasperated than irritated, scrunching his nose as his eyes flicked down to his friend's mismatched buttons, done up wrong in his haste.

South Pyongan had told him about her talk with Han-jin (though he was sure her claim that by simply telling him she thought he was awesome she had single-handedly lifted his mood, solved all his 'stupid emotional issues,' and set him on the path to being a Buddhist(?) was an exaggeration). And she had confessed how she had exposed his fear about being useless to Tae-min to the other boy.

As much as North Pyongan was sure neither had enjoyed that, he thought it had helped. The building tension he had sensed from Han-jin over the months leading up to it had dispersed over the past two. Perhaps all he needed was someone willing to confront him directly, and with less concern than he had been showing him. They were, in the end, men, and his sister was better at talking to them that way, he wasn't embarrassed to admit.

Though he wouldn't say it was all smooth seas between them now. Aside from Han-jin's awkward assistance, he couldn't help but notice that Tae-min seemed to be avoiding his eyes.

Han-jin seemed to notice it, too. He was burning holes into his friend's downturned face, before his own eyes widened as he suddenly whirled to the provinces.

"Did you hear us when you were walking up?"

North Pyongan nodded, and he rushed, "When Tae-min said that thing about the bed he just meant he was kicking me out of the house, we don’t-"

“Hyung,” Tae-min said sharply, rapping him on the ankle with his cane.

Han-jin’s jaw clacked shut as he ducked his head, wincing.

“We’re well aware what you meant.” Liaoxi sounded vaguely amused.

North Pyongan didn’t entirely see why the two were embarrassed about sharing a bed (which was obvious, considering he had been inside their house and seen that their thin futons were both behind the dividing curtain). But perhaps that was just the view of someone who had spent years curled up with his sister in back alleys, then with his cousins and soldiers in the wilds and foxholes. The winter’s cold and artillery firing on your position didn’t leave space for shame at falling asleep with your head on the shoulder of a man you had only just met, let alone a close comrade.

It was one of those things that made him realize how much of what was normal to him was shaped by their early days, and the decades of war. Even once they won, and he could set down his gun and never take another life, God willing and his duty permitting… those years would never truly fade. They would be with him for a very long time, likely forever. His 'normal' would always be coloured by war, even in peace.

'So long as it isn't drowned in it.'

Politely pretending Han-jin hadn’t spoken, and that he didn’t know their sleeping arrangement, North Pyongan hefted the sack of grain.

“I brought some extra rations.”

It was Saturday, which meant Korea wouldn’t decapitate him for giving away half of his.

“We don’t need them,” Tae-min said immediately, and for once instead of telling him not to be stubborn, Han-jin nodded.

“Auntie Oh Yang-hwa and the others sent us home with kimchi and stuff yesterday. We've got plenty."

He gestured at the side of the house, where a few boards had been placed over a hole dug between a cradle of tree roots.

"We finally made a real kimchi pit," Han-jin said proudly. "Together."

The corners of Tae-min's lips softened slightly as he leaned on his cane. "And we have plenty of people looking out for us. Lots of the refugees don't. I think you should give any 'extra rations' to them from now on." He puffed air up at his limp bangs. "It's too hot to cook today anyway."

"You might feel better if you just took off your shirt," Han-jin pointed out.

"Not happening."

"Tae-min's afraid of ruining his lily-white skin," his friend informed the provinces.

"I never said that."

It was clear even if he had, he hadn't meant it. The boy's skin was shades darker than when they had first met, darkened by spending his days doing laundry and sewing uniforms under the sun. The forearms exposed by his rolled-up white sleeves were especially tanned, marred with small scars where oil had splattered as he helped the older women cook meals for their soldiers.

North Pyongan's heart swelled as the two bickered, exchanging looks with Liaoxi. Her eyes squinched up in the shadows of her scarf, clearly smiling under her mask.

"Alright," he told them, interrupting Tae-min listing out how many freckles Han-jin had. "But if you ever need an extra meal, you only have to tell me."

Tae-min's dark eyes lingered on the sack of rice, then went to his. "How many meals have we taken from you already?"

They were clever, and around enough people at the rest house that would talk. They had likely realized awhile ago that there was no ‘Food Administration Bureau’ program.

“None I couldn’t afford to miss.” Not after Korea had reprimanded them anyway.

Tae-min looked away. “We appreciate it. But we don’t need it anymore.”

“I’m your Provincehuman,” North Pyongan reminded him. “I am meant to serve you. If you ever do, I’ll be here.”

“If we do, we’ll tell you,” Han-jin promised, hesitantly placing a hand on Tae-min’s shoulder. “We should… accept help when we need it, right Tae-min?”

His friend shifted slightly, but didn’t move away. “…Right.”

North Pyongan smiled. “And I hope you don’t mind if I still visit.”

Once it got a bit closer to winter, he wanted to bring his sister up here to replace the straw under their crude roof tiles, as they had at the end of the last one.

Hopefully they would have a ceasefire by then, but… It was best to be prepared.

But maybe he wouldn’t tell Korea about it.

Han-jin shook his head. “Obviously not. Hyung got us this house, he’s welcome here anytime.”

Tae-min nodded. “And if you ever need your rations cooked or your uniform sewed, you can come to the rest house.”

“And that goes for masked noona, too,” Han-jin told Liaoxi. “The aunties love you.”

The Chinese woman preened. “Then time there I will surely say I spent.”

The boy tipped his head. “Is it ever hard to pay attention to what other people are saying when you’re trying to remember what you said before so you can rhyme it?”

“A poet never reveals her method,” Liaoxi said mysteriously.

“What are you gonna rhyme with ‘method?’”

“Something I will say later, so you will never know where I was head-od.”

“Ohhh.” Han-jin elbowed Tae-min. “She’s good.”

Tae-min gave North Pyongan a long-suffering look, and he smiled.

“Thank you.” He shifted the rice sack onto his shoulder. “Then I’ll go find someone else to benefit from the program today.”

“Comrade Pak Do-se and his sister are staying in a cave a little higher up.” Tae-min gestured higher in the foothills. “They’re non-productive workers.”

“We’ll drop by then.” Well, he would. Liaoxi would wait out of sight. Even if she was going around with her sister helping civilians, it was best to avoid them seeing her when they could.

As they left, Tae-min said, “Wait.”

When they looked back, he asked, “Has anything happened with Doctor Gangwon?”

North Pyongan had told them about his cousin’s abduction when they had asked after him before.

He shook his head regretfully. “It looks like we will have to wait for the ceasefire to get him back.”

And longer. It wouldn’t be until a final end was put to the war, and Reunification came.

Tae-min looked down, knuckles clenching around the magpie-headed cane Gangwon had carved for him.

It wasn't hard to guess at what he was thinking. They wouldn't be able to go home until then, either.

And even when he wasn't here, America was still stalling the talks.

Han-jin's fingers twitched for his friend, but he didn't commit this time. "Tell Doctor Kangwon we're still thinking about him."

"I will."

South Pyongan had finally spoken to Kangwon about it, giving him something more meaningful than 'If the Yank touches him, I'll gut him.' And it was Kangwon himself that had told him that, so he knew the way she hadn't been able to look him in the eyes when she had done the same was from embarrassment, not because she was lying.

North Pyongan was proud of his sister. He knew it had been hard for her, even when she cared for Kangwon as much as he did. It had taken him long enough to gather the courage to reach out to him, after all. Too long. And after meeting Guk Gun's daughter, it should have taken even longer for her to… She wouldn't like him implying she hadn't had the courage to do it. But she didn't like having to face too many emotions at once.

Of course, he knew better than anyone that nothing they could say could fix the hole in Kangwon's heart. Only getting his brother back would do that.

He knew better than almost anyone.

They bid Tae-min and Han-jin farewell, following the directions the former had given them up into the hills, looking for Pak Do-se's cave.

As they left, he heard Tae-min mutter, "Come here. Your buttons are wrong."

Looking back showed that he had pulled Han-jin closer, nimble fingers putting the plastic discs where they belonged. The taller boy was staring at him intensely as he did, but Tae-min kept his gaze down, only looking away to glance after the provinces, ducking when he saw North Pyongan already looking.

“Our boys have come a long way, I say,” Liaoxi said proudly as they left the dip.

North Pyongan flushed, as he always did when she used those words. “They have.”

Though sorrow still lingered in the dark eyes that had watched them closely, even now that Tae-min had thrown off the shadow that had clung to him ever since losing Ganghwa. It was obvious that being driven from his home and losing the people he cared about would still haunt him, as it did Han-jin, and North Pyongan.

A wide, desperate white eye. 'I promise.'

And Korea.

But… he couldn’t help but feel like that wasn’t all it was. It was just intuition, but it was the same intuition that tingled when his sister was being too loud and boastful, telling him she was trying to drown something out. And he was… almost always right about her.

He would just have to keep doing what he could for them, even if it wasn’t with rations anymore.

“I’m glad we met them,” he said.

His comrade nodded, her eyes sorrowing. “To think what could’ve befallen them if we hadn’t brings me fright.”

It brought it to North Pyongan, too. If they hadn’t been there to save the two, Kim Kang-sim would have done worse than maim Tae-min. And even if he hadn’t, his father would have removed them after, the way the Reapers and Rhee’s army had removed their parents.

“We would have been four ships passing in the night,” he murmured. “With two destined to sink.”

Just like he and South Pyongan.

There were so many moments like that in his life. If they hadn't met, if they hadn't chosen that exact road in the mountains that would lead them to Pak Chae-eun, or if they had frozen before they reached the church, if Korea hadn't been found by some of the few people that could point him towards Kangwon, if those villagers so far from Pyongyang hadn't heard about North Pyongan and his sister being imprisoned there, and dozens more. Most recently, if Kangwon hadn't heard a Maine accent before and been able to match it to coast dialect from North Pyongan's province to expose the enemy agent.

Even now, North Pyongan could never understand how the concept of God's hand having no part in all of it as He reached out in the meager way He could, but rather only cold, uncaring coincidence, didn't terrify his cousins. 'Coincidence' was just another word for luck. If it was only coincidence, it could have never happened. And they might miss a hundred other coincidences, and end up worse off for it, ships sailing off into the opens seas.

He knew they had their people to thank for many of those things, and that they had to make what they wanted to happen happen. He couldn't depend on God and pray everything would he okay. He had to help make it okay, like at the Supung Dam. And… it might have been coincidence that they had chosen that road in the Kumgang Mountains. But he had been the one to get them to the church without freezing.

Maybe the fear he still felt at the idea was just some part of him deep down in the leagues of his soul that was still afraid to take responsibility, to step up and walk beside Korea. But there were so many times where no matter how hard they or their people had striven for something, it wouldn't have happened without what his family saw as luck. They hadn't known that Hae had existed, or even thought that she might. If it hadn't been for one Japanese soldier seeing the light and stumbling across the rumours of where their unit was at the time, or if Korea had chosen to shoot first instead of ask questions…

They would probably only have one Hwanghae. And if they hadn't taken the exact route at the exact time they had in Onsu-ri, they would have no Oh Tae-min and Hyun Han-jin.

"Do not overthink," Liaoxi chided, sensing his thoughts. "We were there, and you've been able to help the pair."

'Not enough.' He knew he couldn't change the course of the war. But that promise he had made still hung over him like the clouds that would roll in to break this heatwave.

He looked down, and Liaoxi reached out, wrapping her arm around his and pulling him to a halt before they could leave the treeline.

"Have you been feeling okay?" she asked quietly. "I've noticed you've been quiet since that day."

He knew what day she had to mean. North Pyongan hesitated, then made a hand gesture at the trees, sending his bodyguards off to scout where they couldn't hear them. Even though they were his comrades, they were still their people. Korea wouldn't want them overhearing anything emotional. Really, he wouldn't want Liaoxi hearing it either.

"I'm sorry."

"No sorry," Liaoxi replied. "I just feel a little worry."

"I'm alright," he told her.

And he was. She and Hae had reached out to him after the trial, and he had spoken with Kangwon about it when he gave blood. And his sister had given him one of her famous 'He sucked, be glad he's dead' speeches. And while North Pyongan couldn't be glad…

"I don't regret it," he mused. "I'm just… grieving."

He looked down a little shamefully at the admission. He hadn't told South Pyongan that, but she had known. She had told him it was stupid, then stayed with him on watch, even though she had one of the last shifts scheduled.

Perhaps it was stupid. But he couldn't just change the way he felt.

He couldn't make it stop hurting, only allow the ache to fade on its own.

Liaoxi stared at him for a long moment, the only sound the distant thrumming of cicadas that had been spared from eradication, and the rustling of the ferns as something moved through them. Looking into her eyes, North Pyongan suddenly felt the urge to ask if she was okay.

"Can I give you an inquiry?" she asked quietly, and when he nodded- "Would you still have chosen to meet Pak Chae-eun, even knowing your relationship had an expiry?"

Her eyes flicked down, looking almost frustrated, perhaps by the confines of her cí.

"Even knowing how it would end," she tried again. "Would you still have wanted to consider him a friend?"

"Yes," North Pyongan said without hesitation.

Pak Chae-eun had been important to him, even in the short time they had known each other, and not just because he had given him faith in God.

He had given him faith in people, too. The bud of it, at least, for Korea and their peasants to water. He had been the first person to extend a hand to them, to help them and show them kindness. In the years after, when he would watch grown men sneer with delight as they broke his sister's ribs in the ring, or when one would ask how much North Pyongan would take for her, or sore losers would hunt them down after, or a farmer tried to sell them out for money, he had kept the memory of the man in his mind like he kept his Bible in his hands.

North Pyongan had never felt like people were cruel or wicked, even if flawed. He had understood that most of them were just doing what they could to survive, too, in the world Japan had trapped them all in, and that those who truly were belonged in the minority.

But he felt like part of that had been thanks to not just his religious beliefs, but Pak Chae-eun. Even if he had been offered another way towards religion, whether it was overhearing a church sermon or having it forced upon him like it had been Sang, he wouldn't have taken it. There could be no better thing to turn him towards the Lord than the kindness of man.

He wouldn't give Pak Chae-eun credit for him choosing to follow Korea or believing in his dream. But he would give him it for the fact that when Korea had extended his offer to join him to fight for their people, not a single part of him had wanted to ask 'What have they ever done for us?'

"You're so sure?" Liaoxi murmured, tilting her head.

"I am," North Pyongan said again without hesitation. "I regret that he betrayed me, but I don't regret that it hurt enough to be a betrayal."

Even if he hadn't truly known him. He had thought he had. And the old priest was still the man that had helped him and South Pyongan, and still would have, right up until the end.

"I think…" He mulled over a way to put it. "It's hard to regret the people you care for. If I had… lost my sister when she was sent to the POW camp-" He couldn't help the small reflexive cross he made. "It would have destroyed me."

He knew he never would have been able to feel whole again. He would never be able to feel like a person again, only the part of South Pyongan she had left behind.

"But I would never have regretted knowing her. I would never have chosen not to."

The warmth of her grin as she slid over a fence with fresh clothes in her arms, or the weight of her legs splayed across his as she drooled in her sleep. Her wink from behind Korea's back as he lectured him, and the little snorting laugh she made when she was amused. It would hurt to lose those things, but it would be worse for them to never be familiar to him at all. Even if the weight of the memories made it hard to walk forward.

"And I feel that way about Pak Chae-eun, too, and everyone I've lost."

Chagang had put it well that night, when he spoke to North Hamgyong, poetic in the blunt way he sometimes was.

'I don't like grief. But it's part of love.'

His lips twitched as he thought of a Mandarin rhyme for Liaoxi.

"Even if love makes our hearts break, if it was that or nothing, wouldn't you take the ache?"

He smiled up at her. She stared back, pearlescent eyes filled with some inscrutable emotion, then lifted her hands, placing them firmly on his cheeks.

"I want to kiss you," she announced, and before he could do more than flush, brought his face to hers.

She was still wearing her mask. He could feel the warmth of her breath and the softness of her lips through the thin black fabric as it chafed against his, and it was making him forget how to kiss back, and also breathe.

Liaoxi made a discontented noise as she realized the mask was getting between them, pulling away slightly.

North Pyongan sucked in air like he had been drowning for a second time, face even hotter than before, feeling like he was about to melt into the leaf litter.

"That… didn't rhyme," he managed lamely, the last word swallowed by Liaoxi as she kissed him again, the mask gone now.

He managed to react this time, placing his hands on her hips, too overwhelmed to hesitate as she leaned into him, still gripping his face with her hands like she was trying to anchor him to her. It was nothing like the other gentle kisses they had shared. She was kissing him almost hungrily, lips melting against his until it was getting almost unbearable to breathe, before she would gasp against his mouth like she was coming up for air after being waterboarded. North Pyongan certainly felt like he was, head spinning too much to remember they were standing on a mountain with other people on it as he kissed her back, losing track of time and forgetting the agony that wrapped his body, only conscious of the heat melding them together and her lips on his.

She finally pulled back without immediately plunging in again, panting against his lips as he tried to catch his own breath.

"Is it alright if I love you?" she rasped, voice thick, and somehow more heat plumed in North Pyongan, a wave of emotion swelling and crashing over his heart as he moved his hands to cup her face the way she was cupping his.

"I hope it is," he murmured, choking on his heart. "Because I love you, too."

Liaoxi's citrine face lit up, her eyes glistening, and he was about to kiss her again when there was a muffled sound from the trees behind them.

Somehow North Pyongan had felt less fear in open combat before. His insides immediately filled with ice water, sweeping away the warmth as he spun around, placing himself in front of Liaoxi, pistol in hand, hoping it was an enemy he could take out and knowing it almost definitely wasn't.

"Wait, don't shoot!"

The person stumbled out from a cluster of ferns, and North Pyongan realized how they had been allowed past his guards.

"Tae-min?"

The boy's face was as scarlet as his had to be indigo, almost tripping as his cane got caught on a root.

"I wasn't being a pervert, I swear," he rushed, trying to hide his face with one hand. "I stopped looking when you started- I- I didn't mean- I only followed to-"

His slender shoulders hunched as he managed to look up, cheeks still stained red as his eyes flicked between North Pyongan and Liaoxi.

"You're really…"

Liaoxi. He had seen her without her mask.

"It isn't like that," North Pyongan said, trying to block her with his body. "Comrade Liao Sh- Liao- Comrade Liaoxi… just got here," he finished, sounding even less convincing than his sister did when she lied.

Tae-min obviously wasn't convinced. "We've known who masked noona is for awhile, hyung."

North Pyongan winced, looking over his shoulder, finding that Liaoxi hadn't bothered to put her mask back on, but was holding it over her face instead, bright orange spilling around the edges.

It looked like he had been the only one that thought Tae-min and Han-jin didn't know who she was.

Yet Tae-min's face was still filled disbelief as he looked between them, and his voice was drenched with it, too. "I mean… You're actually together."

"Um." North Pyongan looked back at Liaoxi, but she was still hiding, looking like a turtle without a shell. "Yes. It looks like it's not impossible for us to be together after all."

He was desperately hoping Tae-min would leave and free them from this awkward conversation. But the boy just shook his head.

"It is," he said shakily. "You're not just a Korean province and a Chinese soldier- you're a Korean province and a Chinese province. It's…" His knuckles tightened around his cane, throttling the wooden magpie. "It's wrong."

North Pyongan winced. This was part of why Korea hadn't wanted their people to find out he was even with someone they only thought was a foreign soldier.

Before he could tell Tae-min his relationship with Liaoxi didn't interfere with his duty to their nation, Liaoxi said, "No true love can ever be wrong."

They looked over at her, peeking from over the mask still pressed to her face. She wasn't as shy as she sometimes pretended, but it was clear that getting caught in a… moment of vulnerability was making her want to drown herself in the Taedong as much as North Pyongan.

Tae-min stubbornly shook his head. "No, it is. It's not- It's not right. You can't be together."

Liaoxi lifted her face, her orange flush fading as she watched him wrap an arm around himself, the other still holding tight to his cane.

"And why do you sing such a song?" she asked softly.

Remembering what Han-jin had said about their bet before he had confessed to Liaoxi, North Pyongan asked, "Because you think we're doomed?"

"You are doomed." Tae-min scraped his fingers through his hair, sounding almost frantic. "You're not- You can't be together, you can't have a future together."

"Maybe that's so," Liaoxi said, her voice quiet as she took North Pyongan's hand. "But if we don't try, we'll never know."

"But-" Tae-min's face was filled with a distress that went beyond thinking one of his Provincehumans might be compromised.

North Pyongan didn't entirely understand it, but he knew he couldn't leave comforting one of his people to Liaoxi.

"Things might get difficult for us after the war," he voiced the thought he had had the night he confessed to her. "But even if they do, and we can't be together anymore, we'll always have the memories we made now. 'Isn't never worse than was?'"

He couldn't help but smile at Liaoxi as he echoed her words, and her eyes curved like crescents. She squeezed his hand before letting go, walking to Tae-min, taking his trembling hands in hers as she held them over his cane.

"Tae-min," she said gently. "You heard what Comrade North Pyongan said about aches and breaks. If Han-jin died tomorrow, would you erase him to erase the sorrow?"

"Yes." Tae-min dipped his head, eyes squeezed shut, then said in a small voice, "…No."

"Mm. When it comes to 'doomed,' life can leave us unfaired." Liaoxi smiled at him, mask off. "But the only love to regret is the love not shared."

Tae-min stared down at their interlaced fingers. North Pyongan was shocked to see glittering diamonds fall from his eyes to stain their knuckles as his face screwed up, tears starting to pour down his cheeks.

A sob tore its way from his chest as his legs buckled, dropping his cane to wrap his arms around himself. Liaoxi caught him, slowing his descent, and he buried his tears in her neck as they kneeled on the ground.

North Pyongan hovered over them, unsure of what to do. He didn't really understand why Tae-min was crying, but he still placed a hand on his shoulder, rubbing it as he cried into Liaoxi.

He gave his comrade a concerned look, but she just smiled, patting Tae-min's heaving back until the boy pulled back.

"Ssi-bal," he croaked, voice choked as he swiped his forearm across his face. "I'm still such a crybaby."

"There isn't any shame in crying," North Pyongan told him. "Even if it can't change anything."

Tae-min sniffled. "I'm… sorry for spying on you two."

"It's alright," his province assured him. "Just please don't tell anyone."

“If I tell Han-jin, I’ll lose the bet,” he muttered, wiping at his eyes.

He was going to have to tell Korea the boys knew Liaoxi was here. Or maybe he shouldn’t. Liaoxi seemed fine with them knowing, which meant China must be, too. And he trusted them not to tell the enemy. He didn’t want Korea feeling like he had to isolate them to… keep China safe, as strange as that thought was.

“You should get back to your domicile,” Liaoxi said, picking up Tae-min’s cane and placing it in his hands. She smiled, tipping her head. “I think for you Han-jin has been waiting awhile.”

He opened his mouth, a mix of fear and shame flashing across his face, before he nodded, jaw firming.

“He has.”

Liaoxi stood, and North Pyongan helped Tae-min up, watching as he hobbled away.

Though he stopped before he could go, pressing his chin to his chest. “Um, thanks, noona. And Comrade North Pyongan.” He sounded almost childishly shy. “Thank you.”

“Anything for a comrade,” the Chinese woman said.

“I live to guide our people,” North Pyongan told him, though he still had no idea what guidance he had just helped provide.

Tae-min limped away, leaving him baffled and unsure of what to say.

He awkwardly straightened his hat, embarrassment creeping back in as his mind replayed what Tae-min would have heard and seen as he hid. Even if he had closed his eyes when they began kissing, they had been being… noisy.

“I feel like… I’m missing something.” That was an acceptable place to start. “What happened there?”

Liaoxi hesitated, then slid her mask back on. “I don’t think that’s mine to share. But I think our boys will be just fine.”

She gave him a reassuring smile, taking his arm.

“Then I suppose for more of an answer, I won’t pine,” North Pyongan said, accepting that so long as Tae-min and Han-jin would be okay, he didn’t need to know the specifics.

They stood there for a moment, shuffling their feet.

North Pyongan rubbed the bandages on the back of his head. “About-"

“No!” Liaoxi squeaked, slapping her palms over the sides of her head. “Let’s not talk about that so! Ever.”

The Korean man immediately nodded, relieved. “Alright, let’s not. We should go.”

He snatched up the rice sack, calling out for his guards as he fast-walked away, Liaoxi silently walking just as speedily next to him.

“Please don’t tell your sister about this,” she begged after a few minutes.

“Please don’t tell Comrade China about it,” he replied, just as desperate.

But they both knew the two were equally as capable of scenting embarrassment like a shark scented blood. If they were riding alone together to their provinces, South Pyongan would get it out of him. And if they weren't, then she would be waiting for him when they both returned, ready to pounce. The same went with China, even if Korea took him with him on his Liberation Day tour.

“If I died tomorrow, it would be bliss,” Liaoxi sighed, pulling her crimson scarf over her eyes.

“Please don’t,” North Pyongan said mildly, though he knew he was going to feel the same. “I would miss you. Even if we’re doomed, let it not be so soon.”

He couldn't see Liaoxi's face past her scarf.

"I'm sure it won't be," she assured him after a moment. "I know tomorrow you'll still have me."

As embarrassed as North Pyongan was, he couldn't help but feel warm, drowning out even the pain of his burns and aching in his stomach. He felt full for the first time in months.

'I love you.'

His heart thrilled, and he wanted to take Liaoxi by the hand again. Only the knowledge that his guards were watching now stopped him.

Even if the talk of being doomed made him uneasy, it was washed away by that pure feeling, the same one that had filled him yesterday as he looked up at Korea on the theatre steps. He no longer thought of Jesus Christ when he was lit by the flame of the setting sun- only his Countryhuman, though not in the way Korea was afraid of.

Love.

North Pyongan didn't deny evolution, but he couldn't believe Hwang when he said that love was a trait developed for survival. Even if humans needed it for breeding and social bonding, what did Countryhumans need it for? They couldn't reproduce, and they didn't need love to survive. And they didn't evolve. Or at least, there wasn't any proof they had.

Hwang said theory posited that it was an incentive to treat their people well. But they didn't need an incentive- in the far distant days, when historians mostly agreed that each tribe of people would have had one Tribehuman to represent them, if they didn't protect those people, they could simply leave. There were no true borders or state organs to stop them. If their representation didn't provide, the tribe members could just walk away and join another, or make a new one. And their old Tribehuman would dissolve. That was their survival incentive.

And when you were a revolutionary, you knew that more often than not, love did not lead to survival. When Kim Pan-suk ran to distract the reactionaries on Ganghwa, when Han-jin went back to try and rescue Chun-hui and her family, when North Pyongan followed Kim Jin, even knowing it was a trap, when Korea threw himself into Seodaemun or Seoul, when his sister jammed the muzzle of her pistol into her chest to avoid being used to hurt the people she loved, and every time their soldiers took to the field to battle for their families and those they would never meet, they were always risking death, and sometimes met it. And they wouldn't have if they didn’t love the people they were fighting for.

North Pyongan believed love was a gift, granted to them by something. He saw it as God, even if others didn’t agree. Surely it had to be something.

Korea hadn’t liked the idea, and shut down he and Hwang’s conversation about it. North Pyongan knew that just like his dislike that there could be an invisible hand guiding his actions, the idea that he only loved their people because he had been designed to was violating to him. But his Countryhuman had misunderstood- he didn’t believe God chose who they loved, he just believed He had given them the ability to. Though Korea hadn’t seemed to like the idea of that, either.

And in the end, it didn’t really matter what or who had given them the ability to love. They could and did. And even if it hurt sometimes, even if for someone that could live forever, it would hurt more often than not, North Pyongan was glad for it.

Liaoxi, Kim Il-sung, Pak Chae-eun, Tae-min and Han-jin and all their people, his sister and cousins, Korea. He didn’t regret loving any of them. He always would.

Even if they were doomed.

맴맴맴맴미

Liaoxi doesn't think North Pyongan is homophobic, but she doesn't want to even risk it, or risk him telling Korea with good intentions only for him to be homophobic. She knows he's an honest man, and she's shares the same view of honest men as her Countryhuman.

Soooo funny and coincidental that the moment countries start going 'actually, fuck sanctions,' and start majorly trading with the DPRK, the DPRK's economy shoots up and living standards do too. Almost like it wasn't Kim Jong-un single-handedly deciding to eat all the rice and rather that sanctions regimes are designed to isolate and cripple a country economically so that Socialism looks like it starves people when really it's because they aren't allowed to participate in the same trade that every other country requires to develop. What a coincidence. Remember- the US doesn't enacts actions because it thinks Socialism doesn't work. They know it does, and that scares them. So they have to do everything they can to make it look as unappealing as possible. And yet the DPRK and Cuba have persisted, and done great things even while being strangled. If they were allowed to exist normally, we would have two more China success stories in the world. Also so funny and coincidental there's a warmongering Call of Duty about killing North Koreans coming out at the same time even the West is having to admit that the DPRK is prospering.
Also you'll notice something- when America does something bad that it's been doing forever, they compare themselves to the DPRK. 'Trump built a statue of himself, what is this, North Korea?' (I shouldn't have to tell you why building a statue of a war hero during a period of economic growth when there were already statues of other war heroes, then building a statue of a man who had already passed in another period of economic growth is not the same as building a gold statue of a man who is a known pedophile that supports genocide and has literally done nothing except dismantle the few even slightly good things America had during an economic downturn when the majority of Americans are homeless, deep in debt, living paycheque to paycheque, etcetera, as well as destabilizing the world). But then when the DPRK does something good, it gets compared to the West. They're calling some of the new Pyongyang neighbourhoods 'Pyonghattan.' No man, it's Pyongyang. Those houses they're building aren't owned by landlords that will charge the people living in them more than they can afford while they sit on their bourgeois asses and do nothing. Thousands of them aren't sitting empty while people sleep on the streets because they can't afford them at all. It isn't filled with drug addicts and women forced to sell themselves to get by and masses of the unemployed being driven out by cheap foreign workers (not the foreign workers' faults, to be clear) and AI. As they say, when America does something uniquely awful and uniquely American, it's 'What are we, a bunch of Asians?' And when a country they have done everything they can to crush succeeds despite that in a way only they could have thanks to Socialism, it's somehow 'They're copying us.' No. They are better than you, and even in the depths of famine you helped exacerbate they have always been better than you because somehow with all your wealth, people still starve to death in your country. And the prosperity they have now doesn't come at the expense of other nations'.

Learning Experience

Hwang had a plethora of things to accomplish now that Liberation Day had passed. Travel to he and Hae's province to assist with the Party cell elections after visiting Kaesong with Korea, attend to the factories to make sure work was continuing smoothly even with the electricity shortage, continue work on the short course drafts to prove he and his sister deserved to be two separate provinces, survey the damage done by the latest bombings, resolve any issues communicated to them by their people. He'd known about all of these at least days in advance, and planned accordingly.

But now, unexpectedly, he first had to tell an old comrade that her husband, and his former student, had given his life for their cause.

"Suzuki Yoshi." Korea dipped his head to her as she rose from her seat in the underground dug-out, a rough half-tunnel carved into the earth on the outskirts of Pyongyang.

"Korea-sama." The Japanese woman inclined herself just slightly.

Hwang witnessed a flash of her, over three decades younger, on her knees as she pressed her forehead to the ground, taking responsibility for her country as Choi Jung-nam stood anxiously behind her, and felt his chest seize.

Her hair was still silky and straight, pulled into a loose bun at her nape without a streak of white to be seen glimmering amongst the chestnut strands, and she didn't stand much taller at forty-eight than she had at seventeen. Her black eyes were still clear and bright, but rested amidst more wrinkles than the last time he'd seen her, that day in 1938.

And they were filled with far more grief, a shadow under the dim light that reflected from the ends of the tunnel.

"Though it's Choi Yoshi now," she said, the edges of her lips curving, and the shadow deepening.

Right. She and Choi Jung-nam had been married in Korea, allowing her to keep her family name at first. But after soshi-kamei policy came into affect in 1940, married couples had to share the same one, at least in the family registry. And it was still mandatory in Japan.

And she had chosen his. Even knowing it would mark her as the wife of a Korean, sharing in the discrimination her husband would have faced for the crime of being one.

Korea's mouth opened, then he nodded stiffly. "I can't stay. North Hwanghae will inform you of what you need to know. But..."

Hwang's Countryhuman's jaw feathered, and he drew himself up slightly.

"Choi Jung-nam died for his country," he told her. "He played an important part in the war to Liberate it. Korea will never forget him."

The shadow in Suzu- Choi-san's eyes swelled, tears glimmering in them as she was met with the truth she had surely known.

Her bottom lip disappeared into her mouth, working as she tried to speak. She only dipped her head.

"It was what he wanted," she managed after a moment, barely above a whisper.

Hwang saw the look that flashed across Korea's eye, and averted his own.

Again his Countryhuman's mouth half-opened before he said, "I need to leave."

Choi Yoshi nodded wordlessly, her lips thin and pale as they suppressed her grief.

But as he reached the mouth of the tunnel, Korea looked back over his shoulder.

"There will be a place in Korea for you and your family once the war is over, Comrade Choi Yoshi."

He slipped out before either of them could say anything, as the woman started to tremble.

Hwang fumbled in his pocket, retrieving his handkerchief and offering it to her.

Choi Yoshi gave a wavering smile. "You still carry these?"

"...Yes," Hwang confirmed, then stood awkwardly, unsure of what to do as she dried her eyes.

It was fruitless. New tears only welled again.

"I... wasn't aware you were coming," he ventured, then winced.

He should've extended his condolences first. But now if he did, they would seem like an afterthought.

They weren't, he just... had no idea how to begin something like this.

'Tell my family I love them.'

Choi Jung-nam should have been here to do it himself. Hwang had never been skilled at extending sympathies, and his old student had known that. He'd stuttered enough when Choi Yoshi had told them about her father.

'So how could you leave something like this to me?'

Choi-san took a shaky inhale before she spoke. "I was taken on as a special correspondent for the Vladivostok Pravda branch. That's... That's where we're staying."

"Is your family well?" Should he have asked that there? Did it seem like he was asking a personal question just to make up for not inquiring before?

Choi-san nodded. "Our..."

She stopped, the sorrow in her eyes enveloping them once more, liquid limning her dark lashes.

'Our.' A simple word. But like 'was,' the weight it bore in this moment was crushing.

"Hae-jung didn't like leaving," she said after a moment, throat flexing. "He had to say goodbye to the girl he liked."

'I think our youngest might marry Japanese.'

"And I didn't like leaving our neighbours." Regret tinged Choi-san's voice, still smooth and light, despite her sorrow, never having fallen prey to her husband's vice of smoking. "But we did. If any of us stayed..."

Even if they had been willing to risk it for themselves, they could've been used to hunt down the rest of their family.

"We were smuggled out in a fishing boat," the woman told him. "Everyone made it safely."

'Everyone.' Another word that was weightier than it should be.

Hwang cleared his throat. "That's good. I'm glad."

"We've been under supervision. Some of your Soviet-Korean countrymen are keeping us safe." Choi-san twisted the handkerchief absentmindedly between her hands. "But Pravda reached out all of a sudden. They said they were given a chance for an exclusive interview about the war, but it was only open for a journalist that could speak Korean."

Sending a Japanese was uncharacteristically ethnically oblivious of the Soviets. There were also plenty of Koreans in Vladivostok, and Hwang knew that- at least as of a decade ago- several had been journalists, or worked in a similar field. He had a suspicion he knew why she had been the one to receive the offer.

"I was supposed to get here yesterday," Choi-san said, tucking an escaped strand of hair behind her ear in a familiar gesture. "But we were delayed by an air raid."

Hwang's brows furrowed in alarm as he sharply surveyed her. "You're unscathed?"

"We got off the road in time."

"Good. That's good."

"And... what about you?" Her clear eyes looked to his hands, shrouded in bandages.

Hwang curled his fingers, hiding the blood that spotted his palms, caused by gripping a pencil. "I'm... coping."

He should've chosen a more confident word. But the pain in his body, both physical and emotional, was making it hard to access his files.

"That's good," she murmured.

They lapsed into a heavy silence, Choi Yoshi twisting the handkerchief around in her hands as if trying to wring the tears from it.

More than ever, Hwang cursed the way words failed him in situations like these, as they had with Cho Sok-young. He knew Hae would know what to say to her, what actions to take. She already would have hugged her, and managed to bring at least a temporary solace. But even if Hwang could muster the courage to do that, he knew it wouldn't have the same effect as if his sister did it.

"I came because I want to know what happened," Choi Yoshi said eventually, lifting her eyes to his.

Of course. Hwang usually loved informing people of things, but casualty notifications had never been a strong suit of his. And Korea never left them to him unless it was absolutely necessary.

But he knew this time it was.

"What do you know?"

"Only that he came here to help." Her lip dimpled as she bit the inside of it. "And that he's dead. I understand if you can't tell me-"

"I can," Hwang assured her, pushing his glasses up.

Korea wouldn't have utilized the invisible hand of CCCP unless he saw it as something he needed to do. And if he hadn't wanted Hwang to inform their comrade of what her husband had died for, then it wouldn't have been.

So he did. He told Choi Yoshi of how Choi Jung-nam had infiltrated the north to offer his services as an agent, and how he'd kept an eye on America. How he had chosen Grace Hartman as his access point, and later risked the mission and his life to attempt to free her from her country's clutches. And how, ultimately, he had lost one of those, going out screaming 'Manse!' in the streets as Hwang listened, helpless, over the phone. How the woman he'd tried to save had finished his mission for him, getting them the intelligence they needed, exposing the leak and allowing them to feed false information to the enemy, using it to capture an important height at the front and inflict damage on the American soldiers before they cut her off.

He tried to prove to her that her husband hadn't died for nothing.

He didn't voice it aloud, not wanting to burden her grief with his guilt, but the root cause of the loss had to be clear. If Hwang had just rejected his offer, if he had prioritized his former student's life over a useful asset, the man she had married would still be alive.

But still, as he finished recounting what he knew of Choi Jung-name's activities during the months he'd been in Korea, after a long moment of digestion, Choi Yoshi, instead of accusing him for her husband's death or bursting into tears, asked, "Is that American girl okay?"

Hwang had to swallow before he could answer. "I hope so."

Choi-san's head bobbed slightly, still twisting the handkerchief in her hands. "But he really did help?"

They were squatting next to the wall, backs against it. Hwang had his head turned from her to polish his glasses, but now he put them back on to face her.

"Yes," he said, trying to project confidence past his own sorrow so she could see he meant it. "The leak was in a position to observe our movements and learn about critical operations, and endangered the lives of several of our Provincehumans, soldiers, and civilians. And by exposing her, she was given a chance to escape the death penalty for espionage. He saved her life, too."

Hwang drew in a breath that he couldn't prevent from trembling, though his voice remained steady as he placed a hand on his former student's shoulder.

"Choi Jung-nam died a martyr."

Choi Yoshi's eyes squeezed shut, her slender throat working. "Good," she whispered, and the handkerchief went limp in her grasp. "He wanted... You know he always wanted to help Korea."

'Korea is going to be free, and I want to have a hand it that.'

"He did," Hwang said quietly, and somehow the woman let out an amused huff.

"Your glasses are misting over."

She removed them from his face, polishing them with a dry part of the handkerchief and shaking hands, leaving his eyesight blurred for two different reasons. It returned to one as she passed them back.

"I'm sorry," Hwang said. Even if Choi Jung-nam hadn't wanted him to say it to his wife on his behalf, he needed to say it on his own. "I shouldn't have accepted his proposal. It was-"

'Callous, severe, thoughtless. Clinical.'

"I shouldn't have," he finished, glasses sliding forward as he looked down at his boots.

"You say that, but he had to beg you, didn't he?" Choi-san asked.

'No matter the cost.'

Hwang's silence answered her, and she gave a sad smile.

"Of course. That was my Jung-nam." She shook her head. "Even if you had turned him down, he would've got himself into trouble anyway. He couldn't just sit back and watch." Her eyes flickered. "Even when I told him he never had."

He was aware of that. He was. Just as he was aware that capturing the leak had been imperative, and that if Choi Jung-nam hadn't been the one to be assigned, with his need to help a foreign woman that somehow reminded him of his own daughter, she might not have been. More lives could have been lost, or members of their family taken.

It hadn't been enough to save Gangwon. But the one silver lining to that, as ashamed as Hwang felt to call it that, was that America couldn't use him as another item to drag out the ceasefire negotiations. And if one of the northern provinces had been lost due to Pak Um-ja's espionage, then that was exactly what would've happened.

And yet Hwang couldn't bring himself to let that comfort him. He didn't want to.

"Sensei, do you feel guilty?"

Hwang hunched, pushing his glasses up again as he admitted, "I feel a certain culpability."

He may have recovered from his initial anguish quickly, but the guilt had lingered. It didn't matter that Korea had been the one to give his consent for their comrade to become an operative. Hwang had known he would, because he needed to. Bringing the matter to him had been the real decision.

Choi-san shook her head sadly. "Sensei, we were risking our lives every day back when we were in school. Even if Jung-nam's father bailed him out if we were caught with you, there still would've been consequences for him. And there wouldn't have been anyone to save me."

Hwang looked away. In those early days when he had extended his 'extracurricular' offer to Choi Jung-nam, and later Suzuki Yoshi, he'd been preoccupied with worrying about getting himself imprisoned. Had he even spared a thought for what would happen to them?

"But we were happy to do it," Choi Yoshi said, her eyes solemn. "We were willing to take the risks, because we wanted to learn. Just like my husband wanted to free our country."

Hwang knew Choi Jung-nam had been more than willing. He had returned to Korea for it, after all, risking himself even before making contact with him.

And he knew in his brain and heart that even knowing how events had played out, he would have made the same decision he had made. The leak had needed to be eliminated. Choi Jung-nam had been willing to do it. And Hwang was more than his former teacher- he was a Korean Provincehuman. He could never set his personal feelings above the mission, even if part of him wished he was the sort that could.

"It's not your fault, sensei," Choi-san said gently. "And if it is, then it's mine, too. I had more of a chance of stopping him than you. I knew he wasn't just coming here to work."

She truly didn't place any fault with him.

Hwang knew logically that she shouldn't. It had been Choi Jung-nam's decision, and Korea had made the final one. It was Rhee's traitors that had carried out his execution, and America that had blackmailed Pak Um-ja into betraying her country, and that had brought war to Korea in the first place. Not him, and not her. As Kangwon had said- they couldn't blame themselves for things that were beyond their power.

Perhaps he was just reacting like he had after Sincheon, when he'd been so desperate for Hae to be hurt by him not sending reinforcements, wanting her to blame him to justify how he blamed himself.

But she hadn't. And neither did Choi Yoshi. And he knew Choi Jung-nam hadn't either.

'I chose this, Prof.'

He knew what he'd been saying when he told him that, voice crackling across the phone line. The very thing his wife had just told him.

'It's not your fault.'

It wasn't his fault. And he would do it again. Yet...

"If I could go back," he said quietly. "I would hesitate for a little longer."

Choi Yoshi smiled sadly at him. "And we wouldn't."

Hwang closed his eyes, looking away as he polished his glasses again.

"I'm sorry," he said after a moment, realizing he'd done exactly what he wanted to avoid. "I didn't mean to infringe on your grief."

"You aren't infringing." Choi Yoshi turned slightly to him, resting her hand on the thin knee drawn up to his chest. "You were never just our teacher, Hwang. You were our friend, too. You still are."

Hwang's throat swelled, making his words come out choked. "And you're both mine."

His first and only, for that near-decade he had worked for the enemy. The only people he'd genuinely looked forward to seeing, the only ones that listened to him and told him about their days and spoke to him as a person. The only ones that made teaching worth it.

He inhaled deeply, wanting his words to be clear as he told her the one item he'd left out of his account.

"He wanted me to tell you he loved you." He fought to keep his voice steady. "He loved you ever since you smacked him in the face with the copy of Uchida Roan's 'Yaregaki' I had him track down. And that he'll love you-"

'Until I-'

"Forever."

Choi Yoshi's mouth opened, then closed. "Hai," she managed after a moment. "That's my- That's-"

Her face screwed up, hand flying to cover her mouth. It did nothing to stop the strangled whimper from escaping.

"Yoshi-san," Hwang began hesitantly. "Are you okay?"

She shook her head, nails digging into her cheek. "No," she whispered through her fingers. "I'm not."

There wasn't anything he could say to that. But he had to try. Not because Hae would, but because Choi Yoshi was his friend, and Choi Jung-nam had been, too. And because he wanted to.

Remembering the long night spent talking with Choi Ki-tak through the farmhouse door about his family, he placed a gentle hand on her shoulder.

"I didn't have much of a chance to catch up with him. If you don't mind, would you like to tell me what I missed?"

Choi-san nodded mutely. "B-But I need to do that interview."

"It's alright," Hwang assured. "I have an inkling that I'm the one you're supposed to interview. And Korea will give us the time we need."

"Then..." She drew in a shaky breath. "I would."

So Hwang took off his tunic, spreading it on the dirt floor of the tunnel so they could sit, and Choi Yoshi settled down cross-legged to share with him the parts of their lives he hadn't been present for, and that they'd never had time for before. Of teaching their children to read and write Korean and Japanese, utilizing the methods taught to her by him, of Choi Jung-nam sitting Hye-ja on his lap to look over schematics and doing what he could to make sure their daughter's spark for the same work her father loved didn't die, even when she couldn't receive the schooling for it, of their grades and hobbies and what raising them in Seoul had been like, sending them to the same school Choi Jung-nam had attended, using the Choi family's money to get them the education they needed for their futures while educating them properly on the topics that mattered in private- the history of Korea, Socialist theory, critiques of the Japanese colonial government, the same banned books they had once pored over in their illicit meetings, now with hundreds more added to the list, and that how they were treated for being half was wrong. That the Korean names they bore were just as important as the Japanese ones, even once they were no longer allowed to use them in public. How once they were old enough to understand the severity of what they were learning, they had told them how the Occupation harmed both their countries, how it was killing Korea and crippling Japan and how it needed to end, the righteous anger of children now sharpened into that of adults who had the words to explain why they were angry, and the knowledge of what needed to be done to fix it. And eventually, who the person they owed their own education to really was.

She told him about watching them grow into teenagers just as righteously angry as their parents, and into an upstanding woman and young men. Of Jung-ui's architectural program and he and Hye-ja's partners and their weddings, of paying bribes to stop their sons from being drafted to fight Japan's war, of the hardship in the final years of it and the heartache of leaving Korea when it was so close to being Liberated. Of organizing their countrymen in Japan and fighting back in the little ways they could. Of the meals she made for their Korean neighbours and the clashes she had with the owner of the building.

And she told him about she and Choi Jung-nam. About their proposal, how the first thing he'd done after returning from university was embrace her, even though they'd never shared anything more than books and the brush of hands before, and how when he had asked her to marry him, she hadn't hesitated for a second. The blissful early days of marriage and the comfortable routine they'd fallen into in the later ones, her working as a copy editor and he working his way up as a civil engineer, leaving in the morning and coming home to each other at night, refusing to quit the job she'd worked so hard for after becoming a mother, but still making her husband and kids lunch before she left for the day, and how he repaid her diligence with refusing to go out drinking with his colleagues, no matter how much it slowed his rise in the ranks, coming home instead to help with dinner. The life that was their norm for the majority of their years, only interrupted when they discovered some piece of information they thought Korea should know, and contacted Korea's Army to meet secretly with them.

She didn't just share the idyllic moments, but those of turmoil, too. Her struggles with media censorship and the papers she worked at being closed down. The arguments about cutting off his father and the guilt she felt telling him he couldn't, knowing that they needed his money and influence to keep their children safe under Japan, and those about his job, how he despised building shrines and offices for the Japanese, feeling that it made him a nation traitor, though they both knew it was one of the few professions that could keep him from being drafted in the war years. Her struggles with media censorship and the papers she worked at being closed down, and how she had fought ardently against moving back to Japan, but Choi Jung-nam made her anyway, too fearful of what could happen to a Japanese woman in the chaos that would come after her country's defeat. Witnessing the fire bombing of Nagoya from safely in the countryside and hearing of her family's demise under the atom bombs. The joy they shared as Korea was finally Liberated, and the heartbreak as it was only Divided and occupied once more, along with Japan. The poverty they'd faced in the post-war world, cut off from the Choi family fortune with Choi Jung-nam making a meager wage as a Korean, and her unable to find work at all as the American SCAP government silenced leftist ideas and cracked down on female Japanese reporters and broadcasters for their role in wartime propaganda, and the job she'd clawed for all her life to give women a voice suddenly became a symbol of the wicked, scheming Oriental to the foreign men that now ruled her birth country.

Choi Yoshi laughed and cried as she spoke, the emotions eclectic, not always aligning with the contents. She smiled as she recounted the night Choi Jung-nam had burnt the rice for dinner, and she'd been so overwhelmed with their children she locked him out of the house, and tears streamed down her face as she told him how his eyes shone as he held their firstborn for the first time, and Hwang listened intently to all of it, all of the parts that he'd missed due to war and Division, serene and ugly, of his two favourite students, and his first friends.

Against all odds, he even found himself chuckling at some points, even though he should have been hearing all of this as they sat around a table at the house he shared with Hae, drinking makgeolli and trading stories, all four of them. Even if it should have been a tale instead of an obituary.

Their final conversation had taken place as she chopped scallions for dinner. As Choi Jung-nam kissed her on the cheek and told her he was leaving for Korea, and she wiped her hands on the checkered kitchen cloth and calmly told him to come back soon.

Choi Yoshi lapsed into silence after, everything she'd needed to say said. Hwang knew she hadn't run out of words. The rest was private, or there was simply too much remaining. He knew he could never recount every moment with his own family. Decades of knowing someone was a lot of time to make memories, and for things to fall through the cracks. He couldn't remember every little joke GG had told him or every time North Hamgyong had lit his cigarettes. He only knew that they'd happened, and that they meant the world to him, remembered or not.

Choi-san was crying, tears silently streaming down her face. Yet as she stared at the earthen wall, eyes distant as she perhaps read through some of those more private files, a small smile graced her lips.

Normally Hwang would never say you could truly know the answer to something without asking. But right now the question that had lingered in his mind since that phone call was answered decisively by the gentle reverie of her expression.

For Choi Yoshi, the price for all those years of love had indeed been worth it.

There weren't any words to share. No nuggets of wisdom to be found in his mental filing cabinets for how to comfort her. Hwang simply leaned over and wrapped his arms around his old friend.

Choi Yoshi clutched at his back, fingers digging into his bandages, though he made no complaint as she started to tremor, shaking like the earth of her country had once shook under her husband's boots as the world upheaved and society crumbled around him, and she and Hwang waited anxiously to hear if he would ever come home.

"It wasn't enough!" she sobbed, the thin veneer of composure she'd been clinging to since he arrived crumbled away under the force of her grief. "Forever isn't enough if he's not here! Even if he was, it wouldn't be enough!"

'Forever' was an inconceivable amount of time, even to Hwang. It went beyond what the human mind could comprehend, even for someone with conditional mortality.

But he just choked out, "I know," holding her tighter as her tears soaked his neck, saltwater stinging his burns.

And if he was crying, too, that was fine. It was only his initial grief that he'd recovered from. He knew this one would linger. He wanted it to.

'Promise me you'll look out for my family.'

He would. He would make sure Yoshi was finally able to be a journalist the way she was meant to, even if it would be a struggle convincing even a minor paper to let a Japanese back into the media that shaped their country. He would make sure Hye-ja was able to take the engineering classes she wanted, and that Jung-ui and his wife's future children wouldn't be discriminated against for their mixed blood, and he would ask SH to introduce Hae-jung to a woman from here.

Yoshi-san was pressing into him like she was trying to escape the cold, and even though the air in the tunnel was sweltering, Hwang pulled her closer, trying to warm her, his glasses digging into the side of his face as he silently vowed that once this war was over, he would make sure the rest of her life was the one she and Jung-nam had deserved to live from the beginning, because even if she wasn't Korean, she would always be his student.

Just like Korea would try to keep that reckless promise he had made to their people, North Hwanghae would keep his promise to Choi Jung-nam.

I was with father in the car as I was thinking about this chapter. Tears started streaming down my cheeks and he just leaned over to pat me on the shoulder without saying anything. Couldn't tell him what I was thinking about so he probably thinks I'm not well.

I made some art yesterday that I think looks very good. I am excited to post it. ^^

An Interlude: Two Halves, One Whole

1910

The city was empty when he formed, and his head was too full. Sights and sounds and memories he'd never seen or experienced swelled his skull like it was fit to burst, blurring his vision and locking him in place, unable to discern which of the sensations he was being bombarded with were real and which were fake.

Blinding sunlight, raised voices, the sense of something stretching and snapping into two and tearing open the floorboards, rummaging in the compartment those cretins had never found, scroll upon tome upon ledger pulled out, flying like paper entrails, too many to be saved, 'Curse you, of course you would not give me enough time.' But he had possessed it, he just had not wanted to let the knowledge go, had not wanted to admit what was coming, all of them so blind and stupid, even he who had considered himself beyond his fellows' arrogance had not been able to escape the centuries of idleness. Pressing copied papers and thick waxed scrolls into dirty hands, skin too rough to be trustworthy brushing his, making him flinch, but still better than the soft limbs of those he had once supped and recited with that he knew could no longer be counted on. The first and the last, those were what mattered, what was lost to the mist of time and revision and that which showed their downfall that would surely be painted over by the country that already had to be here. His suite doors were locked from the outside, a final measure from that fool against interruption, but he refused to go for the tunnels through which the couriers escaped. There was no changing the mind of a god, or emperor, he knew that too well. The table, so close, a brush in hand, ink smearing across the paper, all his contingencies vanished like smoke because he had been foolish enough to think they would be told of when it was coming, the brush lifting, coming down like the hand of 'god' was coming down on their nation, 'Damn you, Joseon-'

And then nothing. He tried to cling to the memory, filled with a sense that if he relinquished it, he wouldn't be getting it back.

But the delineation between what was history and what was now was growing more distinct, and as a shout rent the air, undeniably in the present, it hardened, an impenetrable wall. His memories were now someone else's, and he was left with only the dregs.

He seized on one of those dregs as boots pounded towards him.

'Hwanghae,' he thought, reeling around, arms pinwheeling as he tried to balance himself on spindly legs that had never been used before. 'I'm Hwanghae.'

"He formed in the city center after all," a rough voice said, not in Korean.

'Japanese.'

The rush of common sense flooded him. The years of war and enmity that had led to this- being forced open, the Imo Mutiny, the attempted coup, the Donghak Rebellion, the protectorate, Gojong, the 'treaty,' the government's weakness and Joseon- the Korean Empire's- betrayal. And the annexation.

It was August 22nd, 1910. And Korea, his country, had just been Occupied by Japan.

"Thank His Divine Majesty," another grumbled. "I didn't want to chase him all over Kaishu."

'Wrong name.' Haeju, they were standing in Haeju. His capital.

Hwanghae's head was no longer muddled with history, but his vision remained blurry. It was bright out, but the world around him was displayed in smears of azure, brown, and slate. And dark blue, slashed with red like open wounds.

The men around him were wearing dress uniforms. But he knew that the long objects he could see in their hands were anything but ceremonial. They sent a chill along his spine, even when indistinct.

Tachi. These were no bamboo swords. They were ready to cut him down if he showed any resistance.

He was surrounded, he could hear them all around him in the dusty town square, fully armed. And he was defenseless, skinny and barely breaching their chests, it appeared. And naked.

Panic sparked inside him, his mind racing, presenting a hundred morbid possibilities for what they could do to him.

Would they imprison him, torture him, even execute him? But Japan had likely decreed that the old Provincehumans be dissolved to remove those who had too much pride to accept colonization after long years of being considered divine, or nearly. Surely that meant he was going to keep the new ones?

'New ones.' There had to be others like Hwanghae right now, thrust into this exact scenario.

No, he couldn't think of that. He had to get out of this.

Perhaps Japan had simply wanted easier provinces to kill. Hwanghae's body felt stunted, childlike. His eyesight was too blurry to even see his feet as more than white smears, but he was certain he was one.

But that would be unseemly, wouldn't it? Executing the Korean Provincehumans would only reinforce the image of an invader coming in and crushing their way of life. Even if that was what Japan was doing, surely he would want to conceal that where he could. Imprisonment was more likely, or attempting to groom him into a mouthpiece for the Empire. That idea was so instinctively abhorrent, he would actually prefer to be imprisoned. But neither was ideal.

These thoughts all flashed through his mind in a second as one of the blurs ordered in a cold, smooth voice, "Restrain him."

'Think, think.'

He actually seemed to be good at that, as the idea came almost immediately.

"Wait!" he blurted, holding out his hands. "I have a proposition!"

"Translate," the smooth voice ordered, and another man began to before Hwanghae said in Japanese, "No need."

It came as easily as the Korean, and while it was thrilling to so easily be able to speak a foreign language, he knew in the back of his mind that it was wrong. Korean was the only language of Korea, unless one counted the Jeju dialect separately. He shouldn't be able to speak Japanese. But the treaty the Korean Empire had signed had... programmed, that was the word- him to. He was forced to know the language of the men around him, while only one of them could speak his.

'That bodes poorly.' This all did. The birth of a Provincehuman was supposed to be a grand affair, with crowds and public feasts. It was what had taken place after the Gabo Reform, when the eight provinces had been shattered into twenty-three, and a year later, when they'd been reconstituted into thirteen.

Yet here Hwanghae was, alone, surrounded by armed men, and- Good gracious, he was very much still entirely naked.

Connecting that to the snickers he could hear from off to the side, he quickly covered what needed to be covered with his hands, though it was far too late.

He'd been hoping that by speaking the same language as the presumed officers he would come off as more composed and respectable in order to have his proposal taken seriously. Between his nudity and the fact that his seemingly white skin was now definitely a deep red from shame, that was now probably somewhat ruined.

But he still used Japanese as he repeated, "I have a proposition."

The blurry man the smooth voice had emitted from raised his hand, holding off those closing in on him. "Speak."

"May I first ask what you plan to do to me?" He tried to sound solely curious, with no traces of dread. He did not succeed.

The cool answer was, "That is for His Divine Majesty to decide."

His lungs constricted, obturating his oxygen intake.

Japan.

Heart in his throat, he asked, "Would I possibly be able to speak with him?"

The man's voice hardened like ice, the tachi he was holding shifting in his grip. "Why?"

"Only to talk," Hwanghae quickly elucidated. "I mean him no harm. I'd simply like to share some ideas I have involving my role in this... arrangement."

He had almost said 'Occupation.' He had to watch his tongue. Words had power, and if he didn't use the right ones that made him seem enthusiastic, or at the very least apathetic towards the annexation, he was sure he would pay the price for it.

"Japan-sama has no time for provinces," someone to his left scorned, and the smooth-voiced man snapped, "Do not pretend you know what His Divine Majesty has time for."

A zealot. Hwanghae latched on to that.

"I would simply like to provide my skills to help usher in this era of peace and prosperity for our nations." Even if he didn't know what skills he had yet. "It is an honour that Korea has this opportunity to cooperate with Japan-sama like this, and I would see that we don't disappoint."

He wouldn't call the foreign country 'His Divine Majesty.' He already felt a sense of shame at saying the rest. Compounding with his nakedness, it was starting to overwhelm him. He wanted to melt into a puddle in the summer heat.

"Explain," the man in charge ordered, and Hwanghae outlined his idea.

The man was silent after, considering, while Hwanghae struggled to contain his mounting fear.

If he refused, should he run? He was small, perhaps if he was quick he could dodge through the officers and disappear into the streets.

'The streets I can't even see.'

The streets he couldn't even see. He knew any thoughts of escape were just a fancy. If the man denied his request, he would be subject to whatever fate Japan decided on. A fate that would seemingly be ordained without ever even setting eyes on him, if he truly 'had no time for provinces.'

He waited, heart pounding so hard it shook his thin frame, unable to even wring his hands, needing them to keep himself modest.

Finally, the man decided.

"It will be proposed to His Divine Majesty for his consideration. For now, you come with us."

Hwanghae sagged with relief, even if it was only going to be temporary. At least it hadn't been outright rejection.

"Of course," he confirmed as agreeably as possible. "But if I could ask for one more favour?"

Someone grumbled, but the lead man said, "Speak."

"Could I please have some pants?"

Some time later he was sitting in an office somewhere in Haeju, dressed in plain brown trousers and a simple grey shirt, sitting on an uncomfortable wooden chair and surrounded by cream walls that were just as blurry as everything else. Even though he'd had the presence of mind to try and map out where the Japanese were taking him, it hadn't done any good.

He was bereft of methods to calculate how many hours had passed. There wasn't anything to do in here but sit and sift through his common sense, and it was easy to lose track of how long he had been doing that. Asking questions of the men he could hear talking outside proved fruitless. His desire to know who would be put in charge of his province, what Japan planned to do with their country, or simply what time it was had gone ignored. Even using Japanese, he might as well be talking to himself.

Perhaps this hadn't been a good idea. The proposal, yes, but perhaps he should've just asked for it to be passed on. If the Countryhuman was anything like his officers, he-

The door opened, and as Hwanghae saw the white smudge with that red sun that burned through his poor vision, his bowels went watery.

He immediately shot up, bending at the waist in the deepest bow he could manage without dropping to his knees, something he hoped wouldn't be demanded.

The man in the doorway made no sound, and the province stayed frozen, head pointing almost directly down at the floor, trying to remain composed.

'So soon!' He'd thought he would have more time. Japan had been in Korea then, that was for certain. And if he had no time for provinces...

"The province is more respectful than its country."

The voice was flat and impenetrable, but Hwanghae couldn't call it cold in the same way the officer's had been. It wasn't simply icy. 'Ice' implied there was something to freeze, and that it could thaw. But this cadence was entirely devoid of any warmth. It had never known it, and never would.

Japan moved into the room with an almost feline grace Hwanghae could discern even with his poor vision. The object at his waist making that slight rattling sound couldn't be anything but another sword.

The door closed behind him.

"Kneel."

Hwanghae had known from the first few words that this was a country that would brook no questions. But he couldn't help the one that tried to leave his lips.

"When you say 'its country-?'"

"Kneel," Japan ordered again, no more heated, but somehow even flatter, and Hwanghae hurriedly kneeled.

He almost sat cross-legged, but at the last moment folded his legs under himself so he was sitting on his calves. It was respectful, but his newly-made muscles were already feeling the strain. And he didn't enjoy the feeling of Japan looming over him.

'At least I didn't have to perform full prostration.' As of yet.

He couldn't see, but he lowered his eyes anyway, respectfully avoiding even looking at the Countryhuman's boots as he observed him with a gaze the province could almost feel piercing into his skin.

He'd hoped he would find something useful to negotiate with in his common sense, but he only had political knowledge of the country. This Japan had been formed in 1868 when a Tokugawa Shogunate weakened after being forced open by the United States of America had been overthrown and dissolved, and had done nothing but rise since then- modernizing, defeating Qing in Korea and installing a veritable puppet government once his influence was removed, annexing the Ryukyu Kingdom and seizing Taiwan, and invading mainland China with the other foreign nations, coming out victorious there before doing the same against the Russian Empire, but this time standing on his own, the first time an Eastern power had claimed victory against a Western one.

There was nothing he could use to negotiate with in there. If anything, he only gained the knowledge that the country standing before him was not one you negotiated with. You would give him what he wanted, or he was fully capable of taking it by force.

Hwanghae swallowed, the gulp audible in the quiet room.

"Japan was told the province had a proposal."

The province took a deep breath, making sure he kept his gaze on the floorboards before him. "Yes."

"It may give it."

'Here goes everything.'

Hwanghae breathed in, trying to feel the flash of common sense that had given him inspiration once more, the smell of old paper and ink, the rustling of pages.

"I would like to be a teacher."

Japan observed him in silence. He clasped his hands tightly on his lap.

"It will explain its desire."

Mouth dry, Hwanghae gave the same answer he'd given to the officer, using the most respectful speech possible. "Because Kokai-do is honoured that Japan-sama has chosen Korea to be part of his empire. And he would like to play a role in the cooperation between our nations."

He despised the words, despised using his Japanese name. But he didn't retract it, keeping his eyes on the ground.

'Grovel now, not be executed later.'

Japan's gaze bored into him from across the table, until-

"It lies," he flatly announced, and Hwanghae's heart dropped into his stomach. "It is not wise to lie to Japan."

"I-I am deeply sorry," he said, hands fisting on his thighs, and if the Countryhuman was going to see through him so easily then he may as well tell the truth. "I just don't want to be imprisoned."

"The province thinks it has a right to raise Japan's future?"

'And what is Japan's future doing in Korea?'

Hwanghae didn't let the words escape. "No," he said swiftly. "Of course I don't. I only thought since the Hwanghae before me was a scholar, and I already have common sense of arithmetic and literature, I could be of use in a school. You wouldn't need to waste funds training me, or even pay me the same salary as other professors, and it doesn't even have to be as a teacher! I could be a useful teaching aid or secretary."

He was aware he was babbling, his voice growing higher and thinner with every word, but he couldn't stop himself.

"Perhaps I'm not as enthusiastic about this cooperation as I initially claimed, but I'm truly not against it. Korea has been fighting modernization for too long, and I'm truly thankful you opened us up, it was bound to happen eventually, and it was better Japan than America or France. This isn't entirely my ideal, but I wouldn't even exist if it wasn't for you, so I couldn't possibly begrudge you. I'm actually excited to see what we can accomplish together." Hwanghae was lying again, but hopefully he was talking too much to discern it. "I'm certain that played a part in why you chose to dissolve our predecessors. Elders are too set in their ways, it's the youth you have to mold. And if you keep me in a school environment, then our youth will see that Japan has at least one of their Provincehumans' support, and be more open to supporting the- cooperation."

And he would be able to mold them.

"Forgive my audacity, but I think it's something that could benefit the both of us, when you also consider-"

"Silence."

Hwanghae's jaw clacked shut, holding back the flood of words that still wanted to burst forth.

Had he said too much, been too honest? Was even that little admittance that he wasn't one hundred percent loyal to Japan enough to see him punished?

He held very still, head down, trying not to shake, and utterly failing.

"It is afraid," Japan noted, and Hwanghae squeezed his ineffective eyes shut.

"Yes," he admitted, and his voice cracked.

It was deeper than the fact that Japan was taller and almost definitely more muscular than him, an adult compared to his fifteen years or so body, if his voice was anything go by, and that he couldn't even see him properly. And it was deeper than the tachi tied to his waist or that with a single word from him, Hwanghae could either be executed only mere hours after being formed or thrown into a prison for what could be hundreds of years, or experimented on. It was more primal than all of that.

He was a province alone with a conquering country. And every bit of common sense he had was screaming at his body that that had never ended well.

"It is wise to be afraid of a god," Japan said eventually, still with zero inflection. "And it speaks true- it is better to be opened up by Japan than America."

'Why are you doing this to my country when yours has already experienced it?' Another question Hwanghae swallowed.

"It is decided." The words almost made him look up. "Japan will allow the province to decorate a school."

A decoration. Not entirely the position he had wanted, but he would take it.

Relief blossoming in his chest, Hwanghae bowed his head until his brows almost touched the ground. But not quite. "Makoto ni arigato gozaimasu, Japan-sama."

"If it is unworthy, the privilege will be revoked."

"I understand."

He didn't want to push the limits of reasonability on someone who had just referred to themselves as a god, but he needed to. Otherwise he knew the 'privilege' would be revoked.

"Kokai-do doesn't wish to take advantage of Japan-sama's generosity," he began meekly. "But he seems to have been formed with a disadvantage. I'm afraid I seem to have limited eyesight. If it isn't too much to ask, could I receive some eyeglasses?"

He couldn't see Japan's reaction to that. He could only hear, "It is unsurprising that the Koreans would be formed with flaws. Japan will eliminate them."

Hwanghae shrank down slightly, his mouth dry. "And when you say eliminate...?"

"It will work to pay the blessing off."

Technically if he was paying for it, it wasn't really a blessing. Hwanghae was wise enough to not tell him that.

"Sincerely, thank you very much," he said again, relieved for a multitude of reasons.

Paying glasses off didn't worry him. He wasn't doing this for money. And he needed to see for what he was aiming to do.

"It will be moved to the capital for observation."

"Of course," Hwanghae agreed. "If you kept me here, you would be risking locals feeling loyalty towards their province instead of you and-"

"Silence," Japan ordered again, and he obeyed.

The man bored into him with his gaze, almost through him. "Loyalty is owed only to gods. And Japan is Korea's sole god."

"Yes, Japan-sama." Hwanghae bobbed his head vigorously, boring his own hole into the floor, making sure to hide exactly what he thought about that.

"Continue to be reasonable," Japan ordered in that same clinical tone. "Prove to Japan that Korea is worthy of a title other than 'barbarian.'"

The cords of Hwanghae's throat flexed.

The Countryhuman didn't say anything else, not even farewell. He simply turned on a heel, his indistinct form heading for the door, boots clipping on the wood.

This time, Hwanghae couldn't stop the words from leaving his mouth in time. He needed to know.

"If Kokai-do could please beg an answer, what is happening to the Korean Countryhuman?"

The red disc on Japan's flag was turned to him again, like a blood spatter on snow. His voice was frigidly empty.

"If the province wishes to retain its blessings, it will ask less questions."

Hwanghae dipped his head expediently. "Yes, Japan-sama."

The other Countryhuman left the room, and he collapsed forward, legs quivering as they released the painful pose, holding his face in his hands.

So many questions he had wanted to ask, answers he'd wanted to learn. Now he knew he never would. Japan would never answer them. And Hwanghae... He honestly never wanted to be within ten paces of the man again. Perhaps that made him a coward, but he had a feeling it gave him a better chance of being an alive coward. He was sure by now he was the type of person to put his foot in his mouth.

He hoped Korea was okay. And the other twelve provinces. Perhaps he could try and contact them once he had a chance.

He had achieved what he'd aspired to, at least. He would be able to work in a school, even if it wasn't as a teacher. Seoul was unexpected, but it was more opportune anyway. There were more places of learning there, which meant more students, especially already educated ones.

And this was a gamble. What he'd said about youth being more willing to accept the Occupation 'knowing' that one of their Provincehumans did was true. At least in Gyeonggi they would hopefully be more likely to view him as a fringe traitor, one whose level their own representation would never stoop to, whereas a Hwanghae student might simply think their province truly was loyal to Japan, and that that imported they should be as well.

He didn't want to sway students into supporting the Occupation. He wanted to teach them to resist it. And to educate them.

He knew this desire didn't come from the old Hwanghae. The man had been a scholar, not a teacher. Educating the masses was below him.

But this Hwanghae knew if they ever wanted to be free of this Occupation, if he ever wanted to be a real teacher, and for their country to be independent again, then they would need the youth. And he was certain he could teach them why what was being done to them was so wrong, and to speak out against it.

In fact, now that his pulse was slowing as the terror drained from his system, Hwanghae found himself looking forward to it. He had so much to learn that wasn't in his common sense, and so much to teach that was. And perhaps if enough students protested, if enough voices rose against the annexation before Japan had the chance to entrench himself, it could be over in a few months.

Hwanghae's fist clenched, pulse picking up again, this time in anticipation.

This would be worth it. He knew it.

—

She skipped happily down the street, enjoying the nice weather. Winter had lasted a long time this year, even snowing in April, which hadn't been good for the crops. But now it made for a nice, cool summer. Or at least cooler than summer usually was.

She shouldn't actually know how summer usually was, since this was her first day alive. She shouldn't know that other stuff either. But there was something sayin' that in her head. She guessed it was just common sense.

She thought there might be more things in her common sense, but her head felt like it was all stuffed with cotton, making it hard to hear. Her name must be packed in there, too.

Anyway! It was nice out, and it would be a lot nicer if everyone stopped looking at her that way.

There were a bunch of people on the road she was skipping down. Some of them were sitting on thin blankets with fruits and vegetables on them, and more were standing around, talking to each other and looking all tense. They'd either been examining the food or the people around them, but the moment they saw her, she was all they could look at.

Their mouths were open and their eyes were almost as big around as the peaches in one woman's basket. They actually looked a little funny, but it was hard to giggle when it was her they were staring at like that.

She knew she was naked, and she knew that was supposed to be embarrassing, unless it was a mama who'd had a son, then it was fine for her chest to be out, which was confusing. But she wasn't a mama, so it should be embarrassing for her. It was why she was trying to skip, so she wouldn't just curl up into a little ball on the ground.

She couldn't really help it, she'd just popped into existence between two houses near the fields, and the only thing there was a pile of rotten scraps and a dog that took off the moment she tried to pet it. So since she couldn't help it, it was really unfair everyone was making that face at her. They were lucky to have clothes, even if some of them looked a bit rough, all the threads coming out.

One man was really staring at her, and since he was sitting on a blanket, she skipped over.

"Howdy!" she said, trying to smile at him.

He just looked up at her with those big ol' eyes, shaking like a leaf. No one else said anything.

'Rude.'

It felt like something about the way they were acting wasn't right. She was a... Provincehuman! That's what she was. And her name was... K...Kaishu? Nope, that didn't sound right.

Anyway, she felt like people should be happier to see a Provincehuman. Or... not happier. When she thought about how they should be acting to see her, it made her even more uncomfortable, so she guessed this was okay.

She smiled at the man, even though he really was being a little rude by not saying 'howdy' back. She pointed at the smaller blanket underneath him, the one that didn't have all the food on it.

"Can ah have that?" she asked as nicely as she could. It took a moment to figure out how to make the words come out.

He blinked at her, looking confused, even though she thought it was real obvious why she'd want it.

'Oh!' She knew what she'd done wrong.

"Can ah please have that?" she tried again.

The man's furry eyebrows furrowed. "I'm sorry, Your... I'm sorry, I can't speak Japanese."

Japanese? She was just speakin' normal, wasn't she?

"Pak, get your ass up an' give her that sheet!" an older woman hissed, and the man jumped up, quickly holding the blanket out to her, bowing deep as he did.

"Of course, my apologies, Daedo."

Daedo? Was that her name? She didn't think so. It sounded wrong, but in a different way than Kaishu did. She didn't like either of 'em.

"It's okay," she chirped, wrapping the blanket around her shoulders and holding it closed at the front. It wasn't the best, but since she was so tiny, it managed to cover her completely.

'Much better.' Now everyone could stop staring at her.

Except they weren't.

"What's she doin' here?" a guy muttered from behind her. "Ain't the entire reason market's set up here today 'cuz they shut the city down to catch her?"

"That's just a rumour," someone dismissed.

"Well it clearly ain't anymore when she's walking around the edge of town givin' us a show."

There was a slapping sound, like someone had just got hit.

It was still rude to talk like she wasn't there, but she wasn't paying attention. She was fixated on a ripe yellow pear all nestled in with the other fruits the merchant was selling. This was the perfect time to pick them, and this one looked really juicy. Maybe if she asked real nice, he'd give it to her.

But before she could, a door slammed and someone ran out of one of the beat-up lookin' huts along the road.

"What are y'all standin' around for?" a man demanded, skidding up with wide eyes. "The Japs are goin' to be lookin' fer her!"

Everyone's faces fell. Some of 'em looked mad, and some looked scared. A few even took off running.

She looked around nervously. For some reason the word 'Jap' made her belly clench. For a second she thought she smelled smoke, and spun around as something like a voice whispered in her 'ear.'

But there was no one there, just an auntie that was backing away from her. And no one was screaming 'Fire!'

"We've got to get you out'a here," the man said, and before she could say anything, he grabbed her hand and started to run.

"Where are we goin'?" she asked, but he didn't answer, leading her off into the rundown houses.

Her legs got achy real quick as they charged through alleyways and side streets, holding on to his hand with one of hers while the other held on tight to the blanket as it flapped around her legs. He was pretty much dragging her.

"Can... we... stop runnin'?" she gasped, and he looked back, his eyes all bright, but not like he was happy.

"If you're askin' if you can rest, we can't," he said, pulling her down another alley. "They'll start searchin' when you don't show up in the square, and the roads out are all bein' watched. Ah need to get you somewhere safe before-"

They rounded the corner and he screeched to a halt so fast she slammed into him, his hand suddenly crushing hers so hard it hurt. She leaned around him, panting, to see what had happened.

Standing in the road were a whole lot of men with swords. And they didn't look happy.

Awhile later, she was lying on the floor, kicking her heels back and forth as she waited for the person the man in the weird uniform had said was going to come see her. She didn't know who it was, but it had to be someone really important, because he had a real long name. 'His Divine Somethin'-or-Other.'

She wished he'd hurry up. She was starting to get bored. And the little grey room she was in was dark, and the floor was cold. She'd liked it better outside, where the sun was shining and she could smell the freshness of rice paddies in the air. And there were people to talk to, even if some of them were sort of rude and didn't seem to understand her.

And she wanted that pear. Her belly felt empty, which she guessed made sense when she hadn't eaten for her entire life, but still didn't feel good.

Maybe she should've just stayed outside. But those guys had been pretty insistent she went with them. And she didn't really know what else she'd do anyhow.

She sat up, thinking she heard that voice that wasn't a voice again. But there was just a stone wall.

Her head felt funny. It felt like... there was something she'd forgotten, even though she didn't have any memories to forget. She kept trying to sit still and remember what it was, and almost felt like she could. But she got bored quick, and whenever she opened her eyes or changed positions or called out to see if the guys that brought her here would talk to her, it all went away again.

Huffing, she crossed her arms, leaning back and drumming her bare feet on the floor.

'Hurry uuuuup.'

A door slammed somewhere in the brick building she'd been hauled into, and she perked up. It wasn't the first time it'd happened, but she must have some kind of summoning power, because this time the footsteps outside were definitely coming her way.

She jumped up, excited, brushing off the clothes the men had put her in.

Okay, it wasn't clothes. It was a big rice sack one had cut holes in for her arms and head, then shoved over her. And she really wish they'd left her the blanket the merchant had given her, because the floor was dirty and now there were smudges all over her white skin, and it had also been the first thing she'd ever been given. But the sack was still something to wear, so she'd made sure to thank them.

The heavy door with the bars on it swung open, and a guy walked in.

He was way taller than her, and looked like he had muscles under his uniform, making her feel even shorter and pudgier. He looked different than the other folks, with a round head and no ears or nose. She didn't have those either, so she wondered if her eyes were pure white like his. That would be neat, even though she'd liked the nice brown ones the guy that took off with her had, too. She could tell by her body that their skin was definitely the same shade of white, far paler than any of the people outside, more like the colour of the clothes they'd been wearing, or the clouds in the sky. But his face had a big red circle smack in the middle of it.

Well, she guessed she didn't know if she didn't have one, too. She couldn't see her own face.

"Leave us," the man ordered, and she remembered he was there and uncrossed her eyes, giving up on trying to check herself for red.

"Howdy!" she said, excited to meet someone new, even if he had a big... sword! in his hand.

He stared at her, but in a different way than all the people outside had. It was a kind of creepy.

And he wasn't answering her. Jeez, what was with everyone?

"Chosen is prone to abnormalities," he finally said, which was clearly still not a greeting.

She puffed out her cheeks, disappointed that he was rude, too. "Ah'm not an 'abnormality.'"

The man tipped his head at her. "It speaks in Kansai dialect."

"And ah'm not an 'it.'" And she didn't even know what a 'Kansai' was.

"It is an abnormality," the man said, stalking towards her, his long sword held out to the side. "But it will be remedied."

That not-voice was trying to talk again, screaming something at her, raising all the hair on her body, even though she didn't know why. As he came closer, she tried to listen, tried to figure out what it was saying. She almost saw someone, a man with icy blue skin and a gold shape on his face, the strings of his fancy horsehair hat swaying as he bent over a paper, inkbrush flying.

"Oh!" she said, happy to make out at least a bit of what her common sense was trying to tell her. "Ah know you! You're Japan!"

She froze, eyes flicking to the side. She'd barely even blinked, but suddenly that sword blade was at her neck. That very shiny, very sharp sword blade. It pressed a thin, cold line into her skin.

"Um." She looked at the man on the other end of the weapon. He stared back at her. His pure white eyes were... a little scary.

"The abnormality dares speak Japan's name directly?" he asked, and she thought maybe winter had actually lasted even past April.

She looked side to side. Especially the side with the sword on it. "...Ah guess? Ain't that your name?"

He stared at her again, all creepy-like. She held eye contact, slowly raising her hand and pushing the sword away.

His head snapped towards the motion, and she froze, pursing her lips innocently, even though the back of her hand was still touching the blade.

His eyes flicked backed to her, his head tipping to the side like... Like somethin'.

"It is not afraid."

He was making her a bit nervous, and her belly felt tight. But that could be because she was still hungry. And even though he was a little creepy, it wouldn't be nice to tell someone that. And unlike everyone else, she wasn't rude.

"Nope," she confirmed. "But ah don't think you should go around pointin' swords at people you just met."

'Or at all, probably.' If he hadn't stopped when she said his name, she could have got hurt.

Japan stared at her again for a long time. A real long time. Long enough that she looked down to make sure she wasn't suddenly naked again.

Then he lowered the sword.

"It is an abnormality in more ways than one," he announced, makin' her pout. "It will be permitted to exist, for study."

That... made her a bit uneasy. But he probably didn't realize how that sounded. She thought maybe he wasn't good at socializing.

"So your name is Japan?" she asked, because he hadn't answered her.

He stared into her eyes. She stared back, blinking.

"Yes," he finally said.

She grinned. 'That wasn't so hard, was it?'

She wondered where 'His Divine Somethin'-or-Other' was. But maybe with a name like that, he was too important to visit after all, so he sent this guy instead. His Divine Somethin' must not be coming.

"Ah like your outfit," she said as he tied the sword back to his waist (where it belonged).

He was wearing a red an' gold sash like the other guys had been, but his uniform was all white, and all the buttons were shaped like flowers. It was much prettier than her beigey rice sack, and looked softer, too. Maybe he could get her clothes like that.

"It is divine raiment."

"Oh!" she said. "What does that mean?"

His eyes cut to her. "No amount of questions the Koreans can ask will banish their ignorance. If they were wise, they would stop."

"But ah don't know anythin'," she protested. "How do ah learn stuff if ah can't ask questions?"

"It does not need to learn."

"Ah do," she insisted. "Ah don't even know my name."

Wait! If she knew his name, maybe he knew hers.

"Do you know it?" she asked hopefully.

Japan tipped his head at her again. "It does not know its name."

She was pretty sure just because he was leaving the last sound off his sentences didn't make them not questions.

She shook her head. "Nope."

"What does it know of Japan?"

And that was a real question. She didn't want to answer him if he wasn't going to answer her, but she also didn't want to be impolite.

"You like pointin' swords at folks?"

He stared at her. He didn't look like he thought that was funny.

"Ah don't know much," she admitted. "Ah just met you."

"Japan exists in Chosen's common sense as Chosen exists in Japan's. Search."

She puffed out her cheeks, trying to think real hard. She guessed her common sense was a real thing, and it actually told her that as she tried to search it. And that the room she was in looked like it was a hundred and twenty centimetres by a hundred and twenty. And that enough time had passed since she got here that it must be dark outside now. But for Japan...

"Ah think we beat ya in a fight a long time ago," she said, pulling herself out when she wasn't finding anything else. "In a bunch'a ships."

His face didn't change, but the room got darker all of a sudden.

"Oh, but ah don't think that was actually you," she said quickly, trying to make him feel better. "Ah think it was another Japan."

"It was," he said coldly. "One that carried a false mark of divinity. The Japan of now will never suffer defeat. Gods do not know loss."

Was he saying he was a god? She had a few scraps of god stories in her head, and she felt like they were supposed to look... more godly. He sort of just looked like a guy. A guy in nice clothes, but still a guy. Well, a country-guy.

"Oh," she said. "That's good, ah think."

He looked at her again. He must like looking at her, even if he didn't look like he did at all.

"It has nothing else about Japan?"

There was something, she thought. Something scary that made her insides churn and her feet want to take a step back. But it was like there was a wall between her and whatever it was, stopping her from grabbing it.

And he didn't seem scary. Just creepy and weird. A tiny bit.

"Nope." She shook her head. "Can ah know my name now?"

Japan's gaze burned into her. She adjusted her rice sack.

Eventually he said, "The province is Kokai."

She frowned. She'd thought hearing her name would feel like catching something from her common sense. But 'Kokai' just smacked off her like a pebble.

"Ah don't think that's it."

Japan's white eyes narrowed. "Then tell Japan what it thinks its name is."

"It's..." It was so close, somewhere in her head and sitting on the back of her tongue.

She screwed her eyes up and thought as hard as she could, tryin' to reach for it. But every time she almost caught it, it slipped out of her hands like a... slippery thing.

And then it slipped right out of her.

"Ah don't know." She hung her head. "Ah guess it's Kokai."

"Japan's word is law."

That seemed like a fancy way to say 'I'm right.' And she guessed he had to be. She couldn't see why he'd lie to her after all.

"What's goin' on, by the way?" Kokai asked curiously. "What am ah doin' in here? And why are you here?"

She didn't know much about Japan, but she knew they weren't in his country, and he wasn't... hers? She didn't know what that meant, but she didn't think he was supposed to be here.

"Because Chosen has entrusted itself into Japan's care," Japan replied. "And Japan is going to lead it to greatness."

'Chosen.' Kokai paid attention to the word for the first time. Something about it felt off, but she didn't know what. All the not knowin' was starting to frustrate her.

"What does-?"

"Stay." Cutting her off, he thumped on the door with his fist, and a second later it opened so he could step out.

The door slammed behind him.

She trotted over, trying it, but it didn't seem to open from this side. Maybe it was broken.

She could hear a muffled voice through it, one of the guys that'd been watching her before.

"Japan-sama, what do you want done with her?"

"Japan will be keeping the province."

The man sounded surprised as he said, "But we already have-"

"Is the subject questioning his country?"

Kokai shivered as the room got colder, hugging her rice sack to her.

"No, Your Divine Majesty," the other guy said right away. "Your will is supreme. What would you have us do?"

Their footsteps moved away, and she couldn't hear the rest.

'Your Divine Majesty?' So Japan was the Somethin'-or-Other guy? But he'd said his name was Japan. Weird.

Kokai pushed her lip out, pushing on the door a bit harder, hoping it would fix it. Nope.

Again she was left to boredom, and trying to make her common sense work right. But she could only find more old stories, and a lot of food stuff. Sowing and harvesting times, what sorts of fruit grew nearby, where pears grew nearby, how many kinds of pears there were, things you could make from pears-

She might still be thinkin' about that pear.

Eventually Japan came back. But he only said, "It will follow," before he turned on the heel of his shiny boot and took off again.

Kokai skipped after him, deciding she'd been right about him not knowing how to socialize, but relieved to be out.

She peered at the doors they passed, more steel ones with bars. None of the rooms looked very comfortable. They were empty.

"What happened to the guy ah was with?" she asked Japan, stretching her stubby little legs to keep up with his long ones.

She'd been dragged off by the uniform men, and lost sight of him.

"He has received what he deserved."

"Like a reward?"

His boots clacked on the stone floor.

"You should give him one," she advised. "He was real nice."

'He actually answered me.'

"So was the guy that gave me the blanket."

Japan's head turned slightly. "Another assisted the province?"

She nodded happily. "He was a merchant. He din't know what ah was sayin', but he gave me his sheet anyway so ah wouldn't be naked. But ah never got a chance to say thanks."

She could blame the pear again.

"Do ya think you could thank him for me?"

Japan looked forward again. "It will be dealt with."

Kokai hopped, pleased she could help. Maybe he'd give him a reward, too. She knew peasants didn't make a lot of money, so even a little could help out a lot.

She followed Japan outside and towards some kind of thing with four wheels that wasn't a cart. It was a... thingy. Again, she felt like it was right there, but just a bit too far away to catch.

Suddenly, even though it was nighttime already, things got even darker.

Kokai put her hands up, trying to pull the smaller rice sack off her head, but someone shoved it farther down.

"Keep it on, girl," someone ordered.

'Girl' was better than 'it,' she guessed. But she didn't like the way he growled it at her.

A lot nicer, he said, "Everything is ready, Japan-sama."

"What's goin' on?" Kokai asked.

The... crickets out in the fields sounded nice. But an answer would've been nicer.

Instead she was picked up by the waist and shoved into the thingy with a squeak.

"What's happenin'?" she asked as someone climbed in. "Where are we goin'?"

"It will not ask questions," Japan said, and then the thing started roaring and sputtering so she couldn't ask them, and they started rolling forward.

Kokai rocked with the motion, too excited now to be upset. They were going so fast! The town must be flyin' by. She twisted her neck this way and that, even though she couldn't see through the sack as they rattled around.

But the excitement wore off quick. The ride was taking forever, and Japan still wouldn't let her see. She was one of the few people here (she thought) that got to use a thingy like this, and she couldn't even look around!

Carts were better anyway. Even if they were slower. At least they were quiet, and she could pet some kind of animal.

It was getting cold, too. Fall was coming, and she was sure this winter was going to be as cold as the last. She didn't know why. She just felt it in her bones.

But Japan wouldn't even let her snuggle up to him. She'd been inching closer, even though he was a little weird, but then all of a sudden, he said, "The province will not touch Japan," which she thought probably meant 'Back up.' So she'd scooched back to her side of the bench, shivering.

After at least eight ri, they stopped, and Kokai was being lifted out of the thingy by a man from the one that followed them, even though it wasn't that big and she was sure she could've climbed out herself. Grass swished under her feet as she was led somewhere, then finally she could see again.

Even though the ride had felt like days because she'd been so bored, it was still dark out. Kokai craned her head back, mouth open as she looked up at the lights glimmerin' in the sky.

"Look at all the stars!" she said excitedly, tugging on one of the guy's sleeves.

But he just knocked her hand away, and none of them looked up.

Kokai pouted. They were probably used to seeing the sky, but this was her first time. She kept her face craned upwards as she followed Japan and the men, not really paying attention to what they were saying.

"The peasant said it should be around here."

"They have been dealt with."

"Yes. Small family. But what about the land?"

"Korea belongs to Japan now. This land is part of it."

"Of course, Japan-sama."

"All subjects aware of the abnormality know that to spread knowledge of its existence would be to spread dissent against their god."

"Yes, Your Divine Majesty."

"The province will come here."

Realizing that Japan was talking to her again, and that she'd fallen behind, Kokai skipped over, though she didn't stop looking around.

She couldn't help it. There was so much to see! The fields around them seemed to stretch out forever, just like the black sky. They were wheat, and she really wanted to run over and see what it smelled like up close, and felt like. She wanted to roll in the grass and climb the trees in the little copse in front of her and run until she reached the dark shadows on the horizon that had to be mountains. She wanted to see it all in the sunlight, even more than she wanted that pear, or any food. She bet if she was skipping through the fields instead of in a dank dark building, her common sense would work just fine.

She only managed to take her eyes off the world when she reached Japan, and that was because she saw something new.

"What's that?" she asked, pointing at the wooden square in the ground.

"A root cellar."

"Ohhhh. They're for keepin' kimchi an' potatoes an' stuff in." Kokai beamed, proud to know something.

They weren't usually underground, she didn't think, but the soil around here was soft enough to dig one easy, but firm enough it wouldn't collapse.

One of the men grabbed an iron ring on the hatch, pulling, and it opened with a squeal, exposing a dark square.

"Go in."

Kokai looked over her shoulder, thinking she'd heard wrong. And then that the words hadn't been meant for her.

But Japan was looking right at her.

"Go in," he repeated flatly.

Kokai looked at the dark hole, like a little patch of sky with all the stars ripped out.

"You want me to go in there?" she asked uneasily.

"Yes."

"But it's dark. And it's a hole."

Japan's eyes bored into her, and his hand rested on the hilt of his sword again.

"The province will do as it is told."

Kokai glanced around at the men, hoping one of 'em might say something. But they just stood there, faces blank.

Well... She supposed there wasn't any harm. It was just a hole, and it wasn't like she wasn't scared of the dark or anythin'. And if there was something scary in there, it probably would've come out already.

And maybe there was food. Kokai brightened at the idea, thinking of kimchi and salted fish and cured meat, things she'd never had but her common sense told her were tasty.

Lured by the idea, she trotted over to the hole, looking down into it.

It really was dark. She couldn't see the bottom.

She really wasn't afraid of the darkness, but staring down into the black, her insides felt sick, swirling and roiling like she was about to throw up. She thought she could hear that screaming again.

Nervously, she looked back at Japan. He watched her, expressionless.

In the dark of the hole, her common sense would trickle back to her, broken and disjointed, never whole, but enough so she knew what had really happened. That Japan wasn't only not supposed to be here, but that he'd invaded her country, conquered it with tricks and soldiers, and that the only reason she even existed was because he had dissolved the person before her, murdered him. She would understand that she hadn't been entrusted to Japan- he had enslaved her. It wasn't much, but it was enough that if she had known it, she never would have climbed into the hole.

But she didn't. And she really didn't see why her new friend would do anything bad to her.

So ignoring the not-voice's screaming, she sat down, the grass dewy and wet against her thighs, and slid her legs into the root cellar, turning and grabbing on to the rickety wooden ladder.

And, hand by hand, she descended into the hole.

It was even darker inside, and she wanted to close her eyes against it. Instead she tilted her head back, keeping them on the stars.

The ladder felt longer than it was, long enough that she started worrying she was climbing into a well, and would find slimy things at the bottom. But then her feet thumped onto the floor with a suddenness that startled her, cold, damp earth against her bare soles.

With an effort, she made herself let go of the ladder, though she quickly put one hand back on it, anchoring herself in the darkness. The shadows behind her felt thick, too thick to search for kimchi.

"Is this good?" she called, trying not to sound nervous. "Can ah come out now?"

Japan's face appeared in the square of light, blocking out the stars. "Japan will return."

Kokai's grip on the ladder tightened. "What do ya mean?"

"Japan is leaving. The province will stay here."

Kokai's stomach felt like it fell out. "B-But ah don't want to stay here!"

"Chosen signed itself over to Japan," Japan said, cold as the dirt she was standing on. "Japan decides what Chosen wants."

And then the hatch slammed, and Kokai was alone in the dark.

Her heart thudded in her throat, her legs trembling.

He wasn't actually leaving, right? He wouldn't actually leave her here? She hadn't done anything!

But the engines on the thingies roared, muffled through the layers of earth, and she heard them drive away.

Kokai broke from her freeze, scuttling back up the ladder, almost falling as a rung snapped, slamming against the hatch.

'Open open open open o-'

It rattled, but didn't budge.

"Settle down in there," a bored voice called, the man that'd been talking to Japan. "Even if you get out, I'll just toss you right back in."

"Please let me out!" Kokai called. "It's dark in here!"

"It's a hole," another man said. "It's gonna be dark."

"Please! Ah don't-" Her eyes had started to sting. "What did ah do? Why do ah have to stay in here? Please answer me!"

But they didn't, no matter how much she begged and pleaded and promised she'd never ask questions again or even talk so long as Japan came back and let her out. And when something made a sound deeper in the hole, making panic burst inside her as she slammed on the hatch again, another rung under her feet broke, and she fell, slamming into the ground and driving the breath out of her.

Kokai lay there, gasping for air, eyes squeezed shut, waiting for whatever it was to git her.

But nothing did.

Obviously. It wasn't like anything big could survive in a root cellar. It was probably just a bug, or a rat, and those weren't scary.

She took a deep breath, wrinkling her face at the musty air, but calming down a little.

Japan had said he'd come back, so she probably wasn't going to be here for long. He probably just... had things to do. He was His Divine Majesty after all, and someone called 'His Divine Majesty' had to be important, and have lots of important work, like she'd thought earlier. And she hadn't done anything bad, so there was no way she'd be getting locked up for good. If she was, why wouldn't he just keep her in that room with the broken door?

He'd come back soon to let her out, and she'd tell him she really didn't like being down here, and then he'd let her stay somewhere else, or maybe even go exploring.

Kokai sat up, scooching back to lean against the wall, and then not because it was damp and cold. She sat up straight, crossing her legs and staring into the dark.

There was another skittering sound. She closed her eyes.

That's right, Japan would come back any second, she told herself, pulling her knees up to her chest, wrapping her arms around them. Then she could get something to eat to stop the aching in her belly. It didn't even have to be a pear. Whatever it was would taste even better than that if she was eating it under the sun.

Kokai would be out of this hole any minute any hour

any day now.

She knew it.

Japan and his impenetrable reasons for locking a little girl in a hole in the ground for eleven years. Even if you realize the reason, the method is still impossible to understand. I think when I edit Safeway Pyongyang and Warring Pyongyang after Chasing Liberty is done, I'm going to make Nipponia just a little weirder about Hae.

When the peasant guy calls Hae 'Daedo,' he's calling her Great Province. It would be the most common way for peasants and commoners to address their Provincehumans under Joseon/the Korean Empire. They all also had specific ranks and titles, but if you didn't know them, using that was the easiest way to not get executed or flogged for disrespect.

The Japan before Imperial Japan wouldn't have been called Tokugawa Shogunate or Edo usually, her official name was just Nihon/Nippon. The other two would be more like titles. Tokugawa nobles would mostly call her Tokugawa, for obvious reasons.

Also yes, Japan was literally just going to go in there and chop Hae's head off immediately. And would have if she didn't say his name the exact way she said it.

Pear Blossom

1952

She wrapped her arms tighter around the warm thing she was holding, tryin' to burrow into it as her eyes squeezed shut tighter. If she opened them and all she saw was dark-

"Hae, you're breaking my ribs."

Hae's eyes flew open to see grey light leaking in the door of the root cellar, and beamed as she shot up.

"Hwang!"

Her and her brother had gone to sleep on opposite ends of the oval-shaped room, but she'd ended up wrapped around him. Somehow. Completely by accident.

"Good morning to you, too." He winced a li'l as he sat up, holding a hand to his ribs as he reached for his glasses.

Hae was used to her family pretendin' she'd broken their bones with her hugs (which she'd never actually done), but this time she was worried.

"Oh no! Did ah break your scabs?"

She glanced around the cellar, alarmed, but settled down as she realized it was just them and the sacks of grain and crocks of kimchi an' stuff in it. It was okay to talk about the burns then.

Hwang looked around too, glasses on, before he said, "It wasn't you. You know they always bleed in the morning."

Hae did. She could feel some of her own bandages were wet, especially the ones around her underarms. Cha almost never woke up with his burns bleeding, unless his province got bombed overnight, 'cuz he slept like he was lined up for inspection. But she was a wriggler, as Chungbuk called her. She always woke up with fresh spots.

Korea did, too, even though he never moved in his sleep. She guessed it was 'cuz one of them was always being bombed, or Pyongyang, so so was he.

Or it was just because he had so many.

"Sorry," she said to her brother anyhow, knowing she at least hadn't helped. "Ah really din't mean to cling."

"It's alright," he said, stretchin' a li'l, wincing again. "Were you having a nightmare? You were whimpering in your sleep."

"Ah don't know," Hae said blithely, then jumped up, ignoring the way her skin crackled. "C'mon, Korea's waitin' for us!"

"He never came in last night, I see," Hwang noted.

Hae hadn't really been expecting him to, even though she wanted him to. They were at Kaesong, and their negotiators' camp was here. Every day Nam Il and the others woke up to drive to Panmunjom, hopin' they wouldn't get bombed again, just to be told the stupid Yankees still didn't want to hand over their comrades or sign. And even though the talks were recessed again right now, they still had to do important stuff like try to restart them and look at their POW lists. They'd spent half the night talkin' to them, so Korea had probably spent the whole night.

"Looks like Comrade Mao Zhilong din't either," Hae muttered, squinting around.

"Instead of being jealous of our ally, have you considered that the only reason Korea lets him sleep near him instead of you is because he doesn't try to suffocate him in his sleep?"

"Ah'd never suffocate Korea," Hae announced. "Or break his ribs."

Hwang sighed, turning to face the wall so she could get ready.

Hae took a second to check her bandages, making sure they wouldn't leak. Kang had changed them last night before she left, but they'd be cheerin' up kids today, so she had to make sure she wouldn't bleed through. They'd had to see enough blood.

Her elbow was all better now. She'd taken all her medicine like Kang and Korea told her to, even though it made her feel guilty. On top of hiding Ten Per- Corn from him, she'd had a bellyache for the past month. But now it was all gone, along with her infection. Only her sympathetic fever was left, so she got to keep workin' with no problem.

The clips holding the wrap around her belly had gotten tight while she slept, so she loosened them a li'l. She didn't really mind when the bandages were tight, it was sort of like getting a firm hug all the time. But she didn't like it so much when she was inside like this.

She knew Korea did mind the bandages. He'd made her and Hwang ride in the backseat last night (lettin' Mao Zhilong ride in the front, hmph), so he hadn't noticed she was still awake when the others weren't. He'd been tugging at the ones around his neck, taking one hand off the wheel to do it, even though he never did that while driving unless it was to swat Pyo. And even then he usually got someone else to.

Hwang was probably right that he didn't want her sleeping with him 'cuz of her clingin'. She'd tried to hug him on Liberation Day before he left that night, happy he hadn't gotten mad at her for holding on to Corn, but he'd pushed her away, even though they were alone. She thought the lovin' he got from the crowd after his speech might have done a number on his burns, so he didn't want her breaking them open again.

She could still feel the blood soaking his side as bombs fell on Pyongyang.

Hae shook her head, shakin' the bad thoughts right out as she finished buttoning her tunic up.

"Ah'll wait outside while ya change," she chirped, skippin' out before Hwang could answer.

She felt a li'l better outside, taking a big whiff of fresh morning air.

The root cellar wasn't really underground, the rock walls and domed roof covered in mud and straw just made it feel like it. It was nice an' clean since the People's Committee was using it, and she was used to sleeping in them from the Occupation days, and a bunch'a small, dark spaces, like the bunker. And she wasn't afraid of the dark anymore because soldiers weren't afraid of the dark. She just... She'd rather have slept in there with Hwang and Korea.

And Mao Zhilong, she guessed.

"Howdy comrades!" she greeted her an' Hwang's guards, pushing those other thoughts away.

"Good mornin', Comrade Hae," Pong-ju said, and Man-won said, "Morning."

Kong-sun nodded from where he was doing his stretches. He wasn't very talkative. Whenever Hae tried to chat with him when they were all together inspectin' factories and stuff, he just gave her short answers. He was nice, though.

"Good morning, comrade," her brother's other guard, Hak-sol, said. "Is Comrade Hwang awake?"

"Ayuh!" she replied. "He'll be right out. Was everythin' quiet last night?"

They told her it was, just a few deathbirds flying by in the distance, and she nodded in satisfaction, happily scanning Kaesong with her hands on her hips.

The town was a neutral zone, and the Yanks would get in trouble for bombing it. Even though that didn't mean it was safe since they already had, twice, even killing that poor boy, it meant it felt a li'l more normal than most places. Most of the big buildings had been knocked down before it became neutral, but plenty of low ones had been rebuilt to hold the kids, old people, and crippled soldiers that were sent here. She could see peasants heading out to the fields in the pale dawn light, and women going to the river with bundles of laundry on their heads. It was Sunday, so gaggles of children were already takin' to the streets to enjoy their last day without school, laughing an' getting under folks' feet as they ran down the road. Plus the teahouse pavilions over by Janam Hill where the talks had been being held before were swarmin' with foreign correspondents and army vehicles, which would never be clustered together in the open like that in another city.

But they were still near the front. The distant thunder Hae could hear wasn't a storm rollin' in. She could tell today would be hot and dry like the past couple weeks. It was artillery, firing on their land and murdering their soldiers. This was GG's land, so she couldn't feel it, but she could smell the sting of smoke under the fresh air, and see the long black streaks as it drifted towards them like a lazy snake windin' above the Imjin River.

And it didn't feel normal. It was like those first few months after Liberation, when Hae still had to fight the urge to duck into an alleyway when someone greeted her, her body thinkin' it was too dangerous to be out in the open where the Japanese could git her, and folks had still cringed when someone in uniform walked by. Safety hadn't been what any of them were used to.

The way people were getting up and going around their days wasn't normal anymore, not to her and not to them. Even when it was clear, they still looked up at the sky.

The door to the root cellar opened, and Hwang came out, eyebrows crinkled.

"Have you seen my-?"

Hae handed him the short course papers she'd snatched on her way out.

"Ah took 'em so you'd wear your uniform properly," she said proudly.

It'd worked. His buttons were all done up in the right holes, and his epaulets were on the right sides. Hae didn't even know how he managed to get 'em mixed up sometimes.

"Ahem." Her brother coughed, glancing at his guards. "Of course, thank you."

In the light, she could see his eyes were squintier than usual, and he had deep dark shadows under them. He'd said he was talking to an old friend last night, but couldn't tell her who until the war was over, since it was confidential. He said it was a good talk, but... Hae felt like that wasn't all it was. He'd been too quiet on the drive here, starin' out into the dark as they crossed their province.

They both needed to cheer up, so she said, "Let's go, ah want to see Korea," and took off, Hwang hurryin' after her as they headed for the teahouse near the eastern hill.

Tons of people greeted them as they passed, calling them Comrade Hwanghaes, Comrade Hae an' Hwang, or Comrade South and North Hwanghae, depending on how well they knew them and what they felt like.

Hae greeted them all back, giving an extra li'l skip whenever they used that last one.

After Liberation, when they were finally goin' to become politicians, she'd wondered if Korea would still let people call them 'South and North,' since it might be a li'l confusing for them since they weren't actually two separate provinces.

And... because of how the Southern One stayed behind in Seoul. She'd known where their names had come from by then.

Hwang had asked, and Korea said they would keep the directions, since both of them being Hwanghae would be even more confusin', and he didn't want folks calling them by their nicknames (even though lots of them did that anyway). So when they were first presented to their people, Hae got to introduce herself as South Hwanghae 'but you can call me Hae!' (which she hadn't meant to do, and maybe might have somethin' to do with why people used their nicknames so much). It was on her official portrait, too, and her Party membership card. '황해남도.' And it was how people called her at important meetings an' criticism sessions, just like how they called Hwang North Hwanghae. It was what Korea always called them. He'd never used their nicknames, not even once.

Everyone was already used to callin' them that, and thinking of them that way. So wouldn't it be confusing now for them to be just Hwanghae? Like... they weren't Hae or Hwang, but someone new.

Her chest tightened with a surge.

That wasn't how merging worked, she reminded herself. Kang and Gang were both still Kangwon, Hwanghae would still be Hae and Hwang, and-

Korea had said she wouldn't disappear, so they- she wouldn't. Neither would Hwang. They'd just be...

'You would be becoming who you were supposed to be.'

Mm. That.

"Hae? Are you alright?" Hwang looked up from his drafts, and Hae realized she'd fallen back next to him, her arms wrapped around herself.

"Ah'm okay," she chirped, skippin' harder than before.

She knew mergin' wouldn't make them different people. But their people might not understand that, right? They might think Hwanghae was different than the Hae and Hwang that fought to Liberate their country for all those years, and led the Agrarian Reform and literacy campaign, and were fightin' this war for them now. And that could make them feel more distant from them, right?

Hae made sure her arms kept swinging as she skipped faster, needing to see Korea.

Anyway, Korea wanted them to be super close with their people, and they'd spent decades puttin' down roots with 'em, making sure they were all tangled up so they could help them grow. Wouldn't changing them now tear all those roots up, or at least weaken them?

Hae had said that to Hwang, and he'd really liked the metaphor, enough to put it in his 'Why Hae and Hwang Should Be Two Separate People Forever Please' essay. And she was sure she was right. And since Korea always made right decisions, he'd see that when they eventually told him what they wanted.

Even if he didn't, he had to.

Her heart leapt as she spotted him coming down the road from the teahouse, and she dropped out of her skip to tear towards him.

"KOREA!"

He barely looked up from the telegraph he was reading, stepping to the side so Hae went shooting past him. Her boots skidded so hard she sent plumes of dust spraying up as she spun around, launching herself at him again. He dodged again, but on her third attempt he held his hand out so she'd smack into it, bouncin' back.

Hae rubbed her forehead, pouting, though her hat had stopped her burns from bursting.

"Did that hurt?" Korea asked, all flat. "Good. Next time don't act like a bull in public."

Hae remembered there were other people around. "Oops, sorry Korea."

'In public,' he'd said. Maybe she could try and hug him again before he went back to Pyongyang later.

Even though she was achin' for one now.

"We keep a low profile while we're here." He was looking around with his eye narrowed, observing Kaesong as it woke up. "We're too close to the front."

Like he'd known it was comin', the 'thunder' to the east rumbled louder.

Right. And even though they had lots of security around who could get in and out of the neutral zone to make sure that the reaction'ries couldn't invade again, and that their soldiers didn't mess up and accidentally march through like that one time, which meant it was real hard for spies to get in, they might risk it if they thought they could steal Hae and Hwang like they'd stolen Gang.

'Ah'd like to see 'em try.'

Even if 'Merica succeeded, Hae didn't have the Southern One's evil Commands anymore. And she'd never spill Korea's secrets just cuz of a li'l torture. They couldn't make her tell them Mao Zhilong was here or that his name wasn't Mao Zhilong, and they couldn't make her shoot Korea. She'd kill the Yankee, 'cuz Korea said it was okay if it was him or her, and she'd mmmmm- beat the tteok out of the Southern One. Korea wouldn't be happy, but he'd told her to do what she thought was right, even if he didn't. And she knew beating the tteok out'a the Southern One would be right.

But... like with Corn, maybe she wouldn't tell him she thought he was wrong. She would every other time, though. Even though she knew Korea really, really didn't like being wrong.

"Rest assured, Korea, we'll keep an eye out for interlopers," Hwang said, reaching them with their guards.

"Ayuh!" Hae agreed. "And Man-won an' Pong-ju will keep me safe!"

She linked arms with them, then dropped them when Korea gave her a Look.

"Come on," he said, striding off. "Rations, then we tour the town and visit the children."

Hae was excited to finally see the kids hurt by 'Merica's bombing so she could let them know her an' Hwang an' Korea an' everyone else cared about them. But now that she was here, she was a li'l nervous, too. She also hoped Hwang wouldn't say the wrong thing.

Not that she thought he would on purpose! Even if he was worried about it, Hae knew for sure that her brother was a warm person. She'd known ever since the night Korea learned most of them couldn't read, and even though Hwang had been a li'l rude about having to teach her, after, he'd sat with her in the snow and answered all the questions she had, not even stoppin' when he started to shiver, only when Korea told them to go to sleep.

But he did sometimes put his foot in his mouth, like he said, even though Hae had never seen him do that (she didn't care if it was a metaphor, it was a weird one- feet din't belong in mouths). And you had to be careful with kids, especially the kids they were going to see.

She'd just keep an eye on him for Korea.

They had a real quick breakfast with the rations they'd brought from Pyongyang, her and Hwang sittin' with the other soldiers while Korea walked away to see how they were doing for food stores.

They left without him eating. And without his rations.

Hae would always defend Korea against her cousins when they were being mean about him, but she was starting to think SH and Kang were right- their Countryhuman was a tiny bit of a hy-po-crite. She just wouldn't say that out loud.

"Korea," Hwang asked as they headed farther east to the edge of town where all the farmland was so they could speak to the peasants before they all left for the fields. "Did you find out what the Americans hit last night?"

His eyes flicked to their Countryhuman's neck and the clean white bandages poking out of his collar. Hae was pleased to see he'd actually changed them. He must want to not scare the kids either.

A li'l while after they left Pyongyang, more blood spots had showed up on Korea's throat, letting them know the Yankees were bombing them for the gajillionth time. And that wasn't Hae usin' the tool of the reaction'ries by exaggerating.

Korea kept walking. "Salvage supply dumps and our hidden vehicle concentrations in Pyongyang."

Hwang frowned. "I thought you predicted America wouldn't bomb the capital for some time?"

Hae bobbed her head in agreement. That was the whole reason they'd been able to have the Liberation Day speech outside, which she'd been really happy about. She liked seeing Korea and their people under the sun more than in a dark theatre. She got to see the light in their eyes as they looked up at him better. Even if it was easier to see how sunken his cheeks were, you couldn't even notice them once he got going.

"'Predicted!'" Korea snapped, aggressively enough that Hae blinked and Hwang flinched a li'l. "How am I supposed to have any idea how that Imperialist operates?"

Hwang shoved his glasses up. "Of course, apologies, Korea."

Korea's jaw twitched, and he looked away. "His steel production must be recovering fast," he said, flatter.

Hae's heart sank.

Hwang opened his mouth, then closed it like he thought better about what he'd been goin' to say. She silently cheered him on for keeping his foot out'a his mouth.

"Or it's a show of force to make us think his production is recovering swiftly," he said instead. "Either way, it's either another trespass in an attempt to make us break off from the talks, or a threat as an incentive to sign away our POWs."

Korea's voice was chilly. "We will not."

"Nope!" Hae agreed, tryin' to grab him again (and being pushed away). "We're goin' to get all our comrades back, whether 'Merica likes it or not."

"I hope they received our statement," Hwang fretted, looking south.

They'd made one for the guerrillas still fightin' behind enemy lines, and one to be sent to the POW camps down there, Korea congratulating their captured comrades on Liberation Day, cheering 'em on and telling them he was proud of them and their resistance efforts. They'd published it in the news, too, 'cuz the Yankees were supposed to let the prisoners read it.

But Hae knew they wouldn't. 'Merica didn't want them knowing Korea loved them and was fightin' to get them back. He wanted them to think he'd forgot about them and wouldn't be coming to save them, like Japan had done to her in the hole.

She still couldn't remember all he'd said to her. And she wasn't goin' to. Even if she had to remember everythin' else, the beetle and the dark lonely bored and the needles, she was going to keep his words forgotten. Korea said she didn't have to remember, so she wouldn't.

And he deserved to be forgotten.

But she knew he'd told her she didn't have a Countryhuman. That she was alone.

It made her blood boil to think of the Yankee doin' the same thing to their soldiers, tricking them into thinking Korea didn't care so they'd sign themselves away to him.

Korea didn't answer Hwang, walking faster.

Kaesong was an old, old city. It'd used to be their capital way back when Koryo was alive, so there were lots of old stone buildings and fancy tile roofs, with dozens of narrow alleys winding every which way through 'em. There were Western-style and more Japanesey houses, too, 'cuz of Yankee missionaries and the Occupation, but Japan hadn't messed with it as much as he'd messed with Pyongyang and Seoul, which were bigger now. And since the city had been below the Parallel before the war, and Rhee didn't care about the countryside, plus their army hadn't held it for long before it was made a neutral zone, there hadn't been many factories or anythin' for the Yankees to destroy. Though Hae still saw some of the taller buildings were missing walls and roofs, and some gaps in the rows of houses were filled with stacks of pale stone that'd been collected and were waiting to be used, most of the damage was farther out, in barns or places the Yanks thought could be storin' food, trying to starve their army out on its retreat.

And most importantly about Kaesong, they harvested lots of ginseng here. Korea liked ginseng.

Their tour didn't take too long, 'cuz everyone in the city was mostly dependents, veterans, or orphans, people who the State made sure got enough food, and havin' a lot of officers here for the negotiations meant they didn't need to worry about anyone having to write to them if some of the new recruits were abusing their positions or trying to press-gang people.

People like that pissed Hae off most of all. They were the Korean People's Army. She didn't think bein' new and not done your political training yet meant you should be stupid enough to think you could pick on the people and get away with it.

But she never got to give 'em a piece of her mind. Korea liked to deal with that kind of stuff himself, or send their military police and political workers to deal with it. Her and the rest of their unit just got told which areas the complaints came from so they could pay special attention to them. Their job was to make sure the idiots had learned their lesson, not teach it.

Sadly.

Anyway, none of them were here. Just a lot of peasants Hae got to talk about crops with, Party members Hwang chatted with about the Party elections and got feedback for the short courses from, and their peacekeepin' force and the Chinese's.

"I notice Ch- Comrade Mao is conspicuously absent," Hwang noted as Hae waved to some of the PVA soldiers eating their lunch rations by a townhouse, beamin' as they waved back. "Where is he?"

"I don't know and I don't care," Korea clipped.

Hae frowned, lowering her hand. "Korea, SH says it's been almost two years since he showed up, so you should be nicer to him by now."

Even if she didn't like Mao Zhilong, that was just 'cuz she still couldn't let his bribery work. She was allowed to take stuff from him (she didn't even have to ask first now, so long as it was just candy or fruit!), but she'd accepted that first milk candy before Korea had said so. But even though she wasn't allowed to like him, she still treated him nice.

Hae knew Korea wasn't actually being mean. If he really didn't like Mao Zhilong, he'd just beat him, for real, not like the pl- sparrin' match they'd had before. And he wouldn't talk to him the way he did. But what if Mao Zhilong didn't know that?

Korea's jaw flexed. "South Hamgyong doesn't have to deal with him all day every day."

"You might have to deal with him less if ya din't let him sleep in your room," Hae grumbled.

He glared at her. "What was that?"

"Nothin' Korea!"

"I'm just worried," Hwang cut in to save her. "As you said, we're fairly close to the front. And Comrade Mao Zhilong is a key political officer."

Their guards weren't supposed to know who he was either. Hae had been doin' a good job not telling Pong-ju and Man-won. She hoped it was working. If they got caught and they knew...

Well, it wasn't like they didn't already have to do that if they were captured. Korea would've told them to. Hae didn't like it, but she got why it was necessary- their guards went everywhere with them. They'd seen the insides of a lot of their factories an' air raid shelters, and people slipped up sometimes and told the provinces about supply dumps, though they usually had to move them right after. And they knew where the bunker was for sure, and Hwang and SH's knew Korea had been sick, and Hae's knew she had died.

She would have to take herself out if she was taken, too. Even without the Commands. Even if she killed the Yankee and beat the Southern One, she'd still have to worry about Rhee and his traitors going after Haeju.

And she couldn't do what she'd need to to get rid of the Commands completely.

She knew Korea would never let Haeju be taken again. Ever. But she also knew he'd still want her to remove herself from service, just in case. Just like Pong-ju and Man-won. The difference was she might be able to come back.

She didn't like it. But she knew why they had to. And she knew they would. So she din't want to give them Mao Zhilong as another reason to.

"He's slippery," Korea said about him. "He'll be fine."

But Hae noticed he lifted his head, looking east, where they could hear deathbirds droning now.

Then he shook himself.

"Stop worrying about him," he ordered as they headed for the side street that would take them back out'a the city center. "He's not as stupid as he acts."

Hae knew. He was 'sly,' as SH said (before covering her mouth with her hand).

Korea looked back at them, eye narrowed, like he did when he didn't want to say something. After a second, he asked, "Do you know when...?"

"When what?" Hwang prompted when he didn't finish.

Korea shook himself, looking away. "Never mind. It's-"

They rounded the corner and he stopped in his tracks, Hae almost bumpin' into him. A guy had just come around the other corner, stopping like they had, eyes flying wide open. She recognized him from last night, the officer that led them to the root cellar, but in plainclothes now.

He blinked, lookin' surprised. "Comrade Korea?"

Korea's hand had twitched for his gun, but he didn't grab it. His eye widened, too. "You-"

"Ah, there you are."

The officer jumped, face paling, and Hae looked over to see Mao Zhilong had appeared in the street behind him.

Korea stiffened, shoving her away (she'd grabbed on to his arm, whoops).

"I was walking around sight-seeing, and I noticed someone tailing me," Mao Zhilong said lightly, slinking up behind the officer. "'Surely I'm much too trusted of an ally to be being officially observed,' I thought, which made me worry he might be a saboteur. So I decided to do some tailing of my own. But it seems you two might know each other?"

He tipped his head, smiling at Korea. Hae couldn't see his mouth, but she knew he was.

Korea stiffly stared at the officer. The officer stared back, eyes wide. They flicked towards Mao Zhilong, loomin' over his shoulder, then he slowly raised his hand to his brow in a salute, his back rigid.

"I'm sorry, Comrade Korea," he said, all mechanical. "I didn't recognize our comrade, so I made the decision to follow him to see what he was up to."

"'Didn't recognize?'" Mao Zhilong asked, sounding hurt. "Aiya, we met last night. Am I really so forgettable?"

"It's the mask, Comrade Korea." The officer's voice was as stiff as their Countryhuman's expression. "I'm so sorry, Comrade Korea."

Korea jerked his head in a nod. "Don't let it happen again. Get out of here."

Hae had been keeping her hand on her pistol, worried the guy might be a spy trying to kidnap Mao Zhilong, waiting for Korea to tell her to git him. But as she looked up at him, he didn't look suspicious or mad. Their officer probably couldn't read his face as good as she could, but their Countryhuman was actually apologizin' back with his eye.

'Ohhhh.'

The officer Korea had just thrown under the trolley dipped his chin, turned on a heel, and quickly marched off.

Mao Zhilong watched him go, smilin'. "Letting him go so easily? And here I thought you were getting more paranoid."

Hae puffed out her cheeks. He was teasin' Korea. She hated when people teased Korea, unless it was Pyo or Chungbuk. And that was only 'cuz he didn't actually mind when they did it. Most of the time.

Korea didn't answer, shoving past him.

"Though I suppose you must be, considering I haven't been graced by an escort in awhile."

Korea hunched. "I don't know what you're talking about."

"Mmmm," Mao Zhilong hummed. He caught Hae squintin' and winked at her.

Korea was paranoid, but Hae never got why people said it like it was a bad thing (even if he had been... a li'l more prickly than usual, SH'swordsnothers). Paranoia was good when anyone around them could be a reaction'ry just waiting to cut their neighbours open and drive nails into their heads. If he'd been having someone watch Mao Zhilong before, it was 'cuz he didn't know if he could be trusted around their people. But they knew the Chinese guy was okay now, so that wouldn't be it anymore.

She wanted to tell Mao Zhilong the real reason Korea had someone stalkin' him (because she really would like him if she was allowed), but she knew her country would be mad. So she just *'hmph'*ed at him, hoping his feelings weren't too hurt (and snatching the milk candy he held out to her).

She snagged something else as they skirted the edges of the city, headin' south.

People were set up for market on one of the roads out, lots of peasants comin' in with midday pickin's and townsfolk coming to buy, all bundled up in loose white clothes and straw hats with big brims. They talked and laughed with the sellers, some of 'em trying to haggle, and Hae skipped happily, thrilled to feel like she was actually at market again, instead of hidden under the trees while everyone kept sneaking glances at the sky, barely even focused on what they were buying, just wantin' to get out of the gathering area before some Yankee plane realized they were down there and dropped a bomb on them.

Even though she could still see eyes flicking up.

Some of the sellers had carrots and turnips spread out on blankets, still with dirt from the fields on them, and beans, lots of beans, red, green, and black. There were also clay jars of shoyu, doenjang, and gochugaru, made with the salt the State was makin' sure people received. One old guy even had an old wooden ammo crate he'd packed with bottles of alcohol (that Hae squinted at, making sure they were old and that he wasn't violatin' the 'no wasting grain on alcohol' rule; he didn't look nervous when Korea did the same thing, so she decided they were).

There was no seafood, even though they were close to the sea. And definitely no clams.

But out of all the stuff there was, it was the fruits she fixated on- juicy peaches and little gold chamoe, with a few vivid green melons that were almost the size of her head tossed in, all arranged on brightly-coloured pojagi or nestled in crates and baskets like gems looted from the old tombs in the hills. Hae's mouth filled with saliva so quickly she got scared she was goin' to throw up again, her belly already forgetting that she'd had breakfast just a few hours ago.

One of the peasants caught her oglin' (she loved that word) his wares, and beckoned her over. She glanced at Korea, but he'd stopped to help a woman with a water jug balanced on her head, so nothing stopped her from skippin' up, then remembering she wasn't supposed to skip.

"Howdy!" she greeted.

"Howdy, Comrade Hwanghae," he said back, even though he didn't have a Hwanghae accent. "Or Comrade South Hwanghae, my bad."

Hae beamed. "It's okay!"

Since they'd been stuck below the Parallel, the people from Kaesong hadn't got used to calling her that. The Southern One hadn't known there were still two Hwanghaes at first, so they might not have either. But this guy had still corrected himself real easy.

She looked over to see if Korea heard, but he was still busy helping the lady set the jug down while Mao Zhilong flirted with her.

"I saw you were interested in my harvest," the peasant said. "Would you like a fruit? They're from my own trees."

Hae's mouth watered again as he picked up one of the gems, holding a round, pale yellow pear out to her. She almost reached for it before she trapped her hands behind her back.

"It's alright," she said (a li'l wetly). "You don't have to give us stuff anymore. We're the People's Government, so it's our job to give you stuff."

Even though he didn't look old enough to have met any of the Provincehumans from before, Hae knew he could still think like that, especially since they hadn't been able to visit Kaesong at all to start teaching people it was wrong (and obviously the Southern One never had, and Rhee and 'Merica never let GG do it). She knew from her common sense that the old Gyeonggi had been all snooty and already had everything she could ever need, but whenever she came down to the town or villages, people still gave her stuff for free, all their hard-earned crops they'd broken their backs harvesting when they already had to pay too many taxes.

It made Hae proud when her people offered them things 'cuz it meant they were generous, and that they thought she was doin' a good job. But back then, the provinces hadn't actually done anything for them. They'd just handed over their stuff because they felt like they had to, like some people felt like they had to leave their best harvest out for their ancestors just to go bad. That wasn't being generous- it was just being superstitious and afraid. And old Gyeonggi had never turned them down, even though she was rich enough to even have ice to make bingsu.

The old Hwanghae had done the same thing. But not the new one. Hae didn't want people ever being afraid of her. (Except for traitors and Yankees, they should be real afraid.) She'd only accept free food if she was really really sure it wasn't a bribe, and if whoever gave it to her was doing it because they had enough to spare.

And right now, no one did.

"If it weren't for you, my trees wouldn't be mine," the peasant told her. "I'd still just be the man taking care of them. Giving away one pear won't kill me."

She was tryin' real hard not to look at the fruit he was still holding out.

"And if it makes you feel better-" He looked side to side, then leaned forward, cupping his hand over his mouth so he could whisper, "If folks see a Provincehuman sampling my stock, they might buy more."

Ohhhh. That was true. Hae still didn't want to take something someone else could buy, but-

'Oh!'

"Alright," she caved. "Ah'll take it. But ah've got to pay."

"Then I won't complain too much," the man said, passing her the pear.

Hae eagerly took it, rummagin' in her belt pouch and pulling out the wallet she kept her Party membership card safely in, handing him some money from her salary. With all the soldiers watching the marketplace, they didn't need to worry about any lumpenproles jumpin' him later.

"Thank ya!" she said loudly. "This is the best lookin' pear ah've ever seen!"

As she said goodbye, a few people were already coming over to look.

'Hehehe.'

Hae trotted back over to Korea, who was dragging Mao Zhilong away from the lady. His eye narrowed when he saw the fruit in her hand, so she quickly explained what she wanted it for, and he relaxed.

It really was a good lookin' pear. Nice and round with no punky spots, and good firm flesh. It would probably be real crispy an' juicy an'-

Hae wiped her forearm across her mouth, glancing over to make sure Korea hadn't seen, and tucked the fruit into her bag before she could drool on it, trying to make herself forget it was there as they carried on.

Kaesong was surrounded by hills, with Mount Ryongsu and Mount Nam across the highway to the south, and Mount Yami and Mount Jine to the west (they were really all just steep hills). To the north were the real mountains, the Songaks towerin' over the city like they were keeping an eye on it. Koryo had built his big fortress at the foot of them, building walls around the palace and more around all the commonfolk that settled down in the river valley to farm and trade, so he could lord over them.

Also prime ginseng pickin' territory.

Kaesong was full of li'l streams that came out of the mountains to wrap around and through the city on their way down to the Imjin River in the southeast, like roots searching for water, even though they were already made of it. The soil here was naturally real fertile, but as they walked along one of the thinner tendrils, Hae made a note to suggest channelizin' some of 'em once the war was over. This year definitely wasn't a cold wave, and the blazin' sun had dried up a few of the shallow ones, leaving trails of rocks. GG would complain since this was really part of his province, and he'd have to help lead the diggin', but people would be happy if they didn't have to go so far to do laundry, and if they could grow gardens easier. And even though the Imjin didn't flood as bad as the Taedong or the Pothong did, when it did, the streams flooded worse, and the carved banks weren't enough to stop them.

The hospital and the orphanage were by a branch of the main stream, northeast of Janam Hill and outside the city a li'l, so in case the Yankees started bombing it again, they didn't have any excuse to hit them. Even though Hae didn't think they needed one. It wasn't like they'd ever got in trouble for the germs they were dropping. Or the napalm.

They didn't have to go all the way there, though. Korea led them through the maze of chosonjips, and they popped out on a dusty stretch of riverbank a ways north. Less-fancy chogajips lined the other side, with wattle and daub walls and straw roofs.

The stream was wide here, but more shallow, with patches of sand covered in scrub brush pokin' up through it, and a set of wading stones crossing the narrowest part like a belt. A boy was standing on one, lifting himself up to balance on one leg before hopping to the next stone and landing with the opposite foot, making some of the other kids cheer.

They were scattered around the river, a dozen of 'em. Some were frolickin' in the water, shrieking as they splashed each other, and others were squatting around the bank, playing games with stones and sticks. Two sat a li'l way away, a girl with her legs pulled up to her chest, her brown skirt all puddled around her as she scratched at the dirt with a stick, and a boy watching her draw. A few older women were farther along, doing laundry and keeping an eye on the kids, and a couple militiamen in thin jackets were smoking on the back stoop of one of the chosonjips. They were the only ones that noticed them, saluting.

Hae waved back, but noticed Korea wasn't paying attention. He'd stopped, and was watching the kids with a dark look in his eye.

She glanced back at them, heart squeezin', knowing what he was looking at. She tried to take his sleeve, but he stepped away again.

"Korea?" Hwang turned back. "Can we go over?"

Their Countryhuman nodded, and her brother approached the river, looking way too serious.

He looked back over at her as he went, asking a silent question. Hae answered with a blink.

She could feel it. She'd been feelin' it for a few hours. But Korea didn't need to worry about them when they were here for the kids. And when she knew he always felt it, too.

Mao Zhilong looked at Korea, pushing his scarf back so he could flutter his long lashes at him. Hae liked- would like him, but she hated when he did that.

But Korea sighed. "Fine. But keep your mask on. I mean it."

"If that's an order," Mao Zhilong said mischievously, flittin' off.

"Korea." Hae tugged on his uniform, careful not to touch his arm this time. When he looked, she shuffled her feet. "Ah brought some of the letters folks wrote us on Liberation Day. Ah thought the kids might like to see. Is it okay if me an' Hwang read 'em a few?"

Korea didn't say 'yes' right away, making her pout.

The letters had made her really happy. After Korea left that night, her and the others had stayed up for hours going through them all, and hadn't finished half. They couldn't even read a lot of them, not even Hwang.

The idea that so many people around the world were cheerin' them on, hoping they won, filled her with joy, making her forget her empty belly for once (CCCP's pickles had also helped). Hae had never even heard of 'Tan-gan-yi-ka,' but someone from there that lived in Britain had sent them a letter, telling them he wished both their countries could be free soon.

They'd never had that during the war against Japan. The only people that cared that weren't Korean were the Chinese and the Soviets, and they'd been dealin' with their own stuff. And even they'd turned on their people, worrying that they were Japanese spies when really they hated Japan even more than them. So sometimes it felt like no one cared at all. And even when Korea and the General said before that the eyes of the world were on them now...

Hae believed them, always, she'd known they were right. But now it felt like it. There were people out there, everywhere, that were all still dealin' with their own things. But they were also watching Korea, thinking about them, hopin' they beat 'Merica and all his bloodthirsty puppets and the Southern One, and Liberated their country. Hae and her family and their people weren't the only ones that cared about Korea now.

But she didn't think he felt the same way. She'd seen his face light up whenever he read them the letters he received from the General after he'd left for the Soviet Union, or when one of their old comrades would write after Liberation to let him know they were alive. And even if it was obvious he'd look that way when it was one of their people, he'd looked the same way when one of the Korean-Soviets had came all the way to Kangwon to track them down and give them that letter from CCCP, before he'd even known him. She'd been watching him as he opened those Liberation Day letters, hopin' to spot it again, thinking maybe she'd see that shadow disappear from his eye for the first time since she'd died.

But she didn't. It had just got darker.

It was there now as he looked away.

"Go ahead," he clipped.

"They're the ones ah read to you last night on the drive," she told him hopefully. She'd been tryin' to distract him since he always got all tense when he drove now, and she'd been trying even harder after the bloodstains showed up on his neck.

"I said go ahead." His face didn't change at all. "Now get over there. We're here for a reason."

Hae was still holding his sleeve. She attempted to wrap her fingers around his wrist instead. He pulled away.

She tried not to pout, knowing he was just as crispy as her. And she couldn't let the kids see her look upset. She took a few steps for the river, where they'd noticed Hwang an' Mao Zhilong now, looking back when she realized Korea wasn't coming.

"Go," he repeated, still not looking at her. "I'll be over in a minute."

She knew he needed alone time first, just like they'd had to wait at the bottom of the stairs so he could be alone before the speech. Korea was not awful with kids the way SH said, but if he was thinkin' about stuff he didn't want to be thinking about, he could make a scary face. And they had to be real careful with these ones. They weren't just normal children.

Hae looked over at one of the boys that'd been splashin' in the water, and was coming over to investigate Hwang. Most of them were wearing shirts, but he wasn't. He was tiny, barely taller than even her ribs. Someone like CCCP could probably wrap his big hands entirely around his waist.

But there was already something wrapped around him. Long red weals patterned like the water he flicked at another boy. They stretched across his belly and up his thin chest, worst on his left side, where a thick mat of them was. Hae could see from his rolled-up pants that it had got his legs, too. A stray one clung to his neck and jaw, shiny pink swollen flesh, even though the wounds were old. He hadn't been sprayed with cool river water, but liquid fire.

And he wasn't the worst one she could see.

Hae thought of smoke an' flames an' screaming, and the stench of burnt flesh, and wanted to hug herself, or wait for Korea to come with her.

Instead she grinned and skipped over to the riverbank, callin', "Howdy, comrades!"

"Hello, comrade!" the kids all called back, trying for one voice like how they'd greet their teachers, and gigglin' as they ended up all scattered.

Hae grinned, even though some of the voices had been broken or slurred. All those letters from their comrades across the world had made her feel better. But it was her job to make everyone else feel better.

She glanced over her shoulder, where Korea was still lurking under the eaves of the chosonjip, her heart aching.

Even if right now she couldn't do it for the person she wanted to most of all.

'The pear blossoms are always surrounded by the dust, but never stained by it.'

I like old poetry better than new poetry. New poetry embarrasses me (which is not the poets' fault). Old poetry is always like 'I saw a peach tree the other day. Immaculate.' That really speaks to me.

Hae could develop a life hack where she walks into the bunker room and Korea immediately tells her to get out, she's not sleeping with him. So she 'hmph's and tells him she's not there to cuddle with him, she's there to cuddle with Mao Zhilong, thereby assuring she gets to sleep in the same room as North, and since it's so small, she's pretty much right next to him, and can easily roll over to cuddle with him. However this could not work because North would immediately eviscerate China the moment she said that. Wouldn't even see him move, there would just be bloodstains on the wall.

Singed Petals

Hae thought it was the cutest thing when li'l kids stared. They'd see something they thought was neat, and gape at it with their mouths open and eyes all big and wide. She thought she'd probably looked like that after Korea rescued her from the hole, and she couldn't stop starin' at the mountains and sky and fields of golden autumn rice. And him. Though she knew the first time she'd ever laid eyes on his face, she'd looked a thousand times more awed. She'd been seeing the Sun for the first time, after all.

The children that gathered around her, Hwang, and Mao Zhilong looked awed, too, but it wasn't the bad kind that peasants had used to look at their Provincehumans with, and that made Korea uncomfortable when they still sometimes did. They were lookin' at Hae the same way they'd look at any ol' soldier as they clustered together on the riverbank to gawk at her.

"Hyungs are so tall," a boy said in amazement, craning his neck back to look up at Hwang and Mao Zhilong.

"Are you wearing a mask 'cuz you're a spy?" the shirtless boy asked the Chinese guy.

A girl furrowed her brows at Hae. "Why do you have so many bandages? Are you hurt?"

She yelped as the boy that'd been jumping on the rocks jostled her, leaning over her shoulder to look at their firearms and ask, "Can I hold your gun?"

Hae giggled, and one of the women rushed over, leaving her laundry behind.

"Children, children," she fretted, hovering over them. "These are your Provincehumans and..." Her eyes flicked to Mao Zhilong, seeing his PVA uniform.

"Single," he supplied, Hae whippin' her head over to him.

"I-" The woman blinked. "What?"

Hwang cleared his throat. "This is one of our close Chinese allies."

"Yes," the lady said, pulling the boy makin' grabby-hands for Hae's pistol back. "So show some respect. You didn't even bow, you little ruffians."

All the kids looked real dismayed, the way Hae did when she realized she'd done somethin' Korea had told her not to. Their moms had probably seed-drilled it into them to bow to older folks, but they'd been too excited to remember.

"Sorry!" a girl said, bowing at the waist, and all the others rushed to follow her, bobbin' like ducks.

"I'm so sorry for their behaviour, comrades," the lady said, bowing too.

"It's alright," Hae chirped, looking over her shoulder.

Korea was still lingering by the chosonjip. He'd looked away, even though they weren't even bowin' to him. But at least he hadn't crept off.

"I've never seen a Provincehuman before," the boy interested in her gun said, excited as he peered up at Hae (she loved kids- they were the only ones that had to do that). "Your eyes are so weird, it's cool!"

"In-su!" the lady hissed.

"It's okay," Hae said. "They are pretty weird."

She didn't mind that. Korea's eye was white, so as far as she was concerned, pure white eyes were the best eyes ever.

She leaned (she still wasn't so tall she got to crouch) over, pulling her bottom eyelid down a li'l to show In-su more of her eyeball. "See? No pupils. You can't even tell where ah'm lookin'."

"True for anyone but you," Hwang muttered. "You aren't exactly subtle."

Nope! Korea scolded her a lot for starin' at him in meetings.

"Whoa," the boy breathed. "Cool!"

"Ah hear you're super strong an' stuff," an older-looking boy said excitedly. "How does that work? Are your muscles made different? Can you really not feel pain?"

"Those are all just rumours," Hwang told him, pushin' his glasses up as he got into teacher mode. "Provincehumans aren't any internally different on an anatomic level, only on a biological one. Though we have certain advantages compared to the average person, those come from our military training, not any genetic marvel. Aside from-"

Hae poked him, sensing he was about to go off about borin' stuff, and he coughed.

"We're made of flesh and blood like you," he told the kids. "It just repairs itself faster."

The older boy smacked a palm into his hand. "Ah told you, Yeon-ae! But that's still so awesome! You heal faster? How does it work?"

Hwang went off ramblin', but Hae didn't stop him this time, 'cuz the kid seemed interested. She got to answer her own questions like she was at a press conference- about Korea (she made sure just to say he was amazin' and not everything she'd really like to say about him, since she didn't want to embarrass him), how her guns worked, if she'd ever flown a plane, and what being a soldier was like.

Hae thought about slinking through the alleys of Sincheon with her rifle clutched tight in her hands, forcing herself to walk slow, even though the screaming was getting louder and louder, like the woman was being torn open, because she knew if she gave their unit away before they were in position, the people doing whatever they were doing to her would get away and do it to more people, and told the kids it was fun.

Sincheon hadn't been about being a soldier, anyway. It was about being a province. Soldier stuff was fun, bouncin' around the battlefield and killing bad guys, making sure they'd never hurt anyone again. It was just the stuff that came after that wasn't, the casualty counts and medical tents, and recognizing the body you were carrying off the field.

But they didn't need to know about that. SH had said they were never going to be able to stop fighting. Even once Korea kicked his ass, 'Merica was going to be lurking out there, and they might need these boys and girls to join the army someday so it would be strong enough that he wouldn't even think about invading again, and no traitors could ever overthrow them. She couldn't scare them out of it.

And the war would be over by then, so hopefully these kids would only ever get to experience the real fun parts about being a soldier- the trainin', scarfing down rations with your comrades, sharing stories about their homes an' families in the barracks at night, and getting praised by Korea for doing a good job.

"I wanna be a soldier!" In-su declared, swishin' a stick he'd picked up around in the air. "I'd kick all those Yankees' butts, and Rhee's!"

"You can't be a soldier if you don't learn discipline," the woman scolded him. "And Comrade Yun Sun-ok says you didn't listen to her when she asked you to come in last night."

"Ayuh," Hae agreed. "'A disciplined army is an ever-victorious army,' so make sure you always listen to your commandin' officers."

In-su pouted, but the orphanage lady gave her a thankful look.

She looked down as someone tugged shyly on her sleeve. It was the girl that asked about her bandages, her hair done up with a piece of string.

"Um," she said, wrigglin' her shoulders like Hae did, one arm hanging at her side. "Oppa said you could feel pain like we do. Does that mean all those bandages hurt?"

It wouldn't be the bandages that hurt, but Hae got what she meant. And why she was asking.

She made sure to look her in her eyes and not anywhere else, or towards Korea. "They hurt a li'l," she confessed, keepin' her voice bright. "But they're not too bad."

"Did you get fire dropped on you, too?"

"Sort'a," Hae told her. "We feel all the napalm and bombs the Yankees hit you with."

The girl's eyes widened. "All of them?"

"It's not as bad as getting' hit with 'em ourselves," Hae quickly said, not able to stop her eyes from flickin' down this time.

She looked relieved, holding her arm close. "That's good. I hope you get better soon, miss."

Hae did, too. She wanted to stop waking up and going to sleep soaked in blood and pus, take a bath without soaking in bits of her flesh, and be able to work the fields without breaking open like something she'd forgot on the fire for too long. She wanted to be able to hug Korea and her cousins again without it hurtin' them. And most of all, she wanted her skin to heal, 'cuz it meant their land had, too, which meant the war was over.

"Ah'll be better real soon," she said chipperly. "Korea'll make sure of it."

She said this louder, hopin' to cheer him up at least a li'l.

"So those are all burns?" a boy asked, looking at the bandages covering her head and hands (and ruining her charm).

"From bombs hittin' our land?" The kid Hwang had been telling about their biology looked up at his wrappings with curiosity. "How does that work?"

Hwang opened his mouth, but before he could answer, In-su gasped, eyes bulgin' out of his head.

"It's Korea!"

Hae felt her heart skip at the words, even though she'd known he was there. She jumped around to see he'd finally decided to come out, marching over from the shadows under the eaves with an expression that sort of said he was entering active combat.

The lady straightened up, and the comrade she'd been doing laundry with hustled over from the river, drying her hands. She was wearing the same white smock over her choson-ot that the first woman was, and had her long curly hair pulled back in a thick bun so it wouldn't get in the way of her chores. Hae could see the back of her neck was soaked in sweat, and wondered if she could convince her to let her chop the bun off. She'd brought her scissors.

"Comrade Korea-"

"You don't need to bow," he said before they could, all tight, and Hae could hear SH in her head scoldin' him about being polite. Which was probably why he'd sent her off to her province instead of letting her come along like she'd asked.

"None of you do," he said as one of the li'l girls tried.

She looked up at him, blinking in shock. All the other kids gaped, too, and the women looked... scandalized, that was it.

It wasn't just that they'd been told all their lives to make sure to bow to adults, and especially adults with authority, and were now being told not to bow to the most important adult in the world (Hae could say confidently) that was making them look that way. Korea was doin' it again. The kids were using overly polite speech the way kids were taught to, but he'd just used hao-che with a girl that didn't look older than eight, like she was just as good as him.

Hae paddled her feet smugly. You'd never see Joseon or any those other stuffy ol' 'Koreas' doing that.

The kids looked thrilled, too, but the one orphanage lady looked frazzled, head swivellin' between the children, herself, and Korea. Even though he'd told her not to bow, she made a jerky li'l half one.

"Comrade Oh, it's fine," the other women soothed. To Korea, she said, "I'm sorry, we're both still getting used to how things work."

"Comrade Ri Jung-hi." Korea nodded to her. "You were part of the Worker's Party southern branch, and came north-" He didn't pause, but Hae could see his hands flex under the bandages. "-during the tactical retreat."

Jung-hi looked pleased he knew that. "Yes, Comrade Korea. And now I'm back home."

"And Comrade Oh Ryong-jin is from Seoul."

"I, ah, y-yes, Comrade Korea." She'd sounded confident with the kids before, but now she stuttered, trying to figure out what speech she should be usin', before sticking with hasipsio-che.

He dipped his head to them. "Thank you for your efforts in taking care of Korea's orphans, comrades."

"It's the least we can do," Ryong-jin said, a li'l calmer as she placed her hand on In-su's shoulder, making him squirm.

"Thank you for coming to visit," Jung-hi added. "And Comrades North and South Hwanghae as well. We were so surprised when we received the message."

"You knew Comrade Korea was coming?" a boy cried, soundin' betrayed. "And you didn't tell us?"

"Don't blame your guardians," Hwang chided him. "Our schedules need to be kept as classified as possible."

"So we can't tell people you're here?" another kid asked, sounding disappointed.

Korea was going to say 'no,' so Hae caught his eye, blinking quick.

'You should let 'em.'

He narrowed his eye.

She pursed her lips, tiltin' her head a li'l, silently telling him kids were light-mouths.

She knew she'd really want to tell someone she'd met Korea if she was a child. She wouldn't if he told her not to, but even she sometimes forgot about things she wasn't supposed to do if they weren't super important, like how she was supposed to knock before she entered his room. And kids din't know that military confidentiality was super super important. People would find out they'd met them anyway, so they might as well be able to brag to their friends about it. They should all know how great Korea was.

He considered, then told the boy, "You can tell them. But not until tomorrow."

He lit up. "Yes! Chang-sik's goin' to be sooo jealous!"

Hae giggled, though she frowned as she realized something.

All the kids around the river had came over to see them, except for two- the girl drawing in the dirt and the boy with her. They were on the other riverbank, a li'l ways back from the water, where the low stone bank was. The boy was standing now, lookin' like he was saying something, but the girl had turned around, sitting with her back to them, her stick held tight in her hand.

She saw Mao Zhilong was watching them, too, as he told a boy he was a Chinese spy back from a super-secret mission in the south.

She got distracted as Korea straightened up, turning to the kids.

He asked for all their names first, getting a cute li'l roll call, then asked, "Have you all recovered well?"

The excitement in the air dimmed, and some of the kids looked down or away. The girl that'd asked about Hae's burns cradled her arm to her chest, and Hwang winced a li'l, even him hearing that Korea had been too blunt.

Hae had been doing her best not to stare, but now that Korea had mentioned it, her eyes couldn't help drifting.

Out of the twelve children, all ten on this side of the river were burned. There was the shirtless boy with the weals, and one who'd hobbled over on a foot that was just a lump, dead white skin carpeting the calf it was attached to like vegetable mildew. The ear of the curious kid was merged into his head like a lump of lard left in the sun, the skin around it all bubbly and bumpy, like his entire neck and shoulder had melted and congealed. The arm the girl held to her chest was shrivelled and pale, thinner than the other one, and the last three fingers on her hand had fused together. The others all had those same thick red welts comin' out of their collars, their sleeves, their rolled-up pants. They bulged out of their skin, so smooth and unnatural looking, Hae almost felt like she could reach over and pluck them off like a slug from a cabbage leaf.

She couldn't, though. They were part of their bodies, left there by the Yankee deathbirds spewin' fire from their bellies.

Hae could still remember Chipyong-ri, watching the silver cannisters tumble from the sky and burst with plumes of flame, splattering sticky, burning jelly across the field, and how the Chinese soldiers had screamed as it clung to their skin, just like their soldiers had screamed on the way south. Not for their comrades to put it out, but for someone to kill them. Grown men and women that would rather die than feel the pain for one more second.

And these kids had burned like them. The youngest couldn't be older than five, but the thumb he was suckin' on was grey-white, all the colour burnt out of his hand like it was the ash on North Hamgyong's cigarettes. Hae could picture him slapping at the napalm that caused the dead patches his neckline showed, only for the jelly to stick to his hand, scorching it, too.

She'd been hit by white phosphorous on their way to the Raktong, a stupid stray ember that fell back down to earth to land on her arm, burnin' through her uniform and down into her skin in a flash. She'd screamed, trying to beat it off, but it had already reached her flesh, sinking down and refusin' to be budged. She'd never felt anything like it before and never had since. Not getting shot, not the needles, not the bayonet to her belly or her ribs getting kicked in at Sincheon. That pain all came and went, turned sharp or dull, got better or worse. But that one li'l ember didn't change, eating down into her with an agony that was almost boring because of how the same it was, like all those long hours of being chained in the dark unable to see or hear or move concentrated into one spot on her body, bringin' her to tears and burning away all her thoughts.

If SJ hadn't noticed and screamed her name, and one of their comrades hadn't tackled her to the ground and torn off her jacket so he could scrape it from her skin with his knife and douse her with his canteen, Hae knew she would've kept burnin' and burning.

But you couldn't do that with napalm. You couldn't swat it off or douse it, or even smother it. It would just burn until it burned itself out.

Her breath hitched in her throat, not able to stop seeing the burns now that she'd looked, knowing how bad they must've hurt, even after the flames were out, the way their heads must have been filled with hot agony and the choking stench of melting fat and burning flesh, the same stench that hung over Sincheon as she found another chunk of raw red meat with a face and the same stench suffocating her now.

Something touched her ribs, and Hae flinched, afraid it would be hot.

But it was just Hwang, pokin' her. His face was all worried, and she realized she'd been hugging herself with one arm, and had the other hand over her mouth and 'nose,' making the burnt-meat smell worse than it should be.

She quickly put her hands on her hips and a smile on her face, grinning at her brother to let him know she was okay, and keeping it on, upset that she'd let it fall around the kids, especially after Korea brought up their injuries.

Their burns couldn't make her scared or sad. They made her angry. Fear was useless, but anger would help her kill more Yankees and Southern soldiers, and win this war for Korea. Anger would help her make sure no one else would burn.

But these kids didn't need angry. And they probably didn't need Korea bringing up their injuries either. He'd known exactly what to say on Liberation Day, meltin' away all the anxiety and fear Hae had seen in the faces in the crowd while she waited for him to come out, and loosening the knot in her own belly, at least for a bit. But... sometimes he really didn't seem to know how to talk to children.

But that did not mean he was bad with 'em.

"I'm all better, Comrade Korea," the girl with the burnt arm- Su-jin- quietly volunteered. "It doesn't hurt no more."

The others all agreed, but one boy said, "I'm worried about my big brother. They won't let him out'a the hospital."

Hae could see Korea's jaw twitch, and he looked down the river. She couldn't see past the ridges of Janam Hill, but she knew where he was lookin'.

"Ah'm sure he'll be okay," Hae told him when Korea didn't say anything. "He's probably just takin' a bit longer to get better."

Korea tore his eye away from the hospital. "What is his name?"

"Min-ho."

"I'm going there soon," he said. "I'll ask how he's doing."

"Can you tell him I miss him?" the kid asked.

Korea's eye flickered. "I will."

His face lit up in relief. "Yay!"

"And what do we say?" Ryong-jin prompted.

"Thank you, Comrade Korea!"

"I'm all better, Comrade Korea," In-su said first, puffin' up his thin chest.

His scars weren't as bad as the others, even if that didn't mean much when you were talkin' about an eight-year old. They weren't swollen or dead like the napalm burns, but all wrinkly and pitted, and purple-red where they spread across his arms. They made her think of Kang Dong-joon, the burned man from Sincheon.

"You can even conscript me if ya want," he said enthusiastically. "I'm ready to go back down south and kill traitors!"

"You're too young for the army," Korea said seriously. "You can join in a few years."

"But the war'll be over by then," Hae made sure they all knew.

She turned her smile on Korea. He didn't look at her.

In-su pouted. "Aw."

"That's a good thing," Korea said, sharp enough that Hae told him to be nicer with her face. He gave her a look, but added, "But we will always need loyal soldiers to safeguard our country."

The boy's eyes lit up. "Don't worry, Comrade Korea, I'll be the best soldier you've ever seen!"

"No, I will!" the shirtless boy waved his hand, and the other kids all started protestin', saying they were going to be Korea's best soldier.

Korea usually liked when kids did that, but as they ran around pretending to shoot Yankees, Hae snuck a look at him, and saw that even though his face had softened a li'l, his eye had only grown darker.

She looked over as Hwang nudged her, and realized the boy with the clubfoot- who'd said his name was Kwan-mo- was watching the others and lookin' all upset, his burnt foot hid behind his other ankle.

Her brother wrinkled his forehead at her, so Hae trotted over.

"Don't worry," she told Kwan-mo. "You don't need two feet to be able to do stuff for the army. There are plenty other jobs that help, like-" Makin' uniforms probably woudn't sound fun to a kid. "Building guns an' ammunition, and testin' 'em."

"And if you have the mind for it, you could go into university for mechanical engineering, and even become one of those that design new weapons systems," Hwang added.

"Really?" the boy asked, looking like he liked the sound of that.

Hae nodded vigorously. "The Yankees are always goin' to be comin' up with new ways to kill us, so we'll need to come up with new ways to kill them!"

And that was... a li'l scary. Hae wasn't scared, it was just sca*ry.* 'Merica already had the napalm and white phosphorous, and the germs he grew in the poor bugs that made folks' skin rot and organs shut down, and diarrhea themselves to death. He had the weird gases he shot from artillery shells that blinded their soldiers and fried their nervous systems. What else could he come up with to murder their people?

And he'd already made the worst weapon of all, that atom bomb he waved around like it was a flag on Liberation Day, but nowhere near as good. Could he make a worse atom bomb, one that would'a burnt all of Japan to the ground instead of just two cities, and that could burn Korea?

Hae glanced over at her Countryhuman, still watching the kids as Mao Zhilong showed them his guns, and saw his face covered with nuclear burns, eyes leaking black like Japan's in that picture she'd looked at once with the others and then never again, even the empty one. Her stomach churned.

If America had a pistol pointed at Korea, she could shoot him dead 'cuz she had one, too. But she couldn't keep him safe from the atom bomb. CCCP was the only other one that had those, and even if he was real nice and brought them the letters and food and took Corn home to give her a good life, Hae wanted to be the one to be able to protect Korea.

She wished...

"To defend ourselves," Hwang corrected her. To Kwan-mo he said, "But we will need to develop new weapons and vehicles for military use, both to advance with the times and decrease our reliance on imports."

The kid only looked maybe six or seven, so he was confused.

"'Develop' means 'make,'" Hae told him. "And 'reliance' means we got'a depend on other people for stuff, which we don't want to do."

Korea didn't, which meant she din't either.

"Yes," Hwang said. "We receive- get most of our military supplies from the Soviet Union and China right now, but we need to start producing them domestically. That means in Korea."

"But we already make our own submachine guns." Hae slung hers off her back, showin' the kid (it was safe 'cuz Korea had told her to make sure her weapons were all unloaded before they got here). "And they're already better than the Soviets' or the Chinese's."

She didn't actually know if that was true. All that mattered to her about guns was that she could pull the trigger and they could shoot bullets, and she thought their Type 49 did that about as well as the Type 50 and the PPSh-41.

But their people had made it, so that automatically made it better.

She heard someone clear their throat behind her, and added, "Much better," without lookin'.

Kwan-mo ran a hand over her gun with big eyes. "I could make these?"

"If you have the aptitude for it and are willing to devote-" Hwang cut himself off as an elbow hit his ribs (gentle so nothin' burst).

"Ayuh," Hae said confidently, puttin' her Type 49 back on. "Soldiers won't have nothin'- anythin' to shoot while they're runnin' around if people don't make guns. So that would make you just as important to the army as them."

A big ol' grin split the boy's face round face, and he limped off towards his friends in a hurry.

"Didja hear that?" he called. "I'm going to make guns, and hyung and noona say I'm going to be more important than all of you!"

"Not what we said!" Hwang said, looking stricken as all the kids protested.

Hae giggled, thrilled to finally be called noona by someone, and happy to see him get sucked into their play-fightin' (it was okay to use that word for kids), even if it made her sad he'd felt left out in the first place.

'Damn 'Merica an' the Southern One.'

She looked over at the kids on the other side of the water again. Ryong-jin was trying to wrassle the ones on this side into behavin', but Jung-hi had gone over to them. Her and the boy were talking to the girl, whose back was still to Hae. The woman had a real gentle expression on her face. But Hae could see the sad clingin' to the lines.

She was about to go see what was wrong when In-su successfully tripped up one of his friends, who laughed as he went down with a 'thump,' dust plumin' up.

"See, Comrade Korea?" In-su panted, smilin' real wide as he bounced happily. "I'm gonna be a great soldier! I'll take down Rhee and shoot America like 'boom!' And then I'll kill the South for ya!"

Hae barely had time to think 'Uh-oh,' before Korea was rounding on him, eye flashin' as he snarled, "South is not the enemy!"

In-su flinched back, and all the other kids stopped playing, looking over uncertainly.

Hae was really hopin' Korea would regret snappin' right away like he always did, and remember you weren't supposed to shout at kids. But instead he moved in, stalking towards In-su.

"South isn't the one in control," he growled. "Rhee is, America is. The South of Korea is just as much your country as I am. It is Syngman Rhee and his traitors that deny half of our country and spread slander against it, not us."

Korea stopped in front of In-su, loomin' over him, his voice going cold as he demanded, "Are you a traitor?"

In-su cringed back, shaking. "N-No, K- Comrade Korea."

Korea's eye narrowed to a slit. "Then why would you want to see half of our country destroyed?"

A voice murmured in Hae's 'ear,' "Maybe the Little Tiger wants to intervene?"

She'd been frozen in dismay, but jumped into action now, darting away from Mao Zhilong to latch onto Korea's arm, hoping he wouldn't toss her off when people were watching.

He didn't, though he went rigid, muscles quivering under her grip as his head jerked over to look at her, eye flaring.

She held tighter to him, but looked at In-su. "Obviously Korea doesn't actually think you're a traitor!"

Her voice sounded way too bright for the tense riverbank.

"He just..." She faltered, unable to say 'Gets way too defensive about a guy that kidnapped us and cut out his eye.'

"-simply can't condone dangerous thinking," Hwang cut in, hustling over to stand on Korea's other side, slightly between him and In-su. "From the moment Korea was Divided, the enemy has been painting our Korea as a bloodthirsty dictator in order to justify their attacks over the 38th Parallel and the notion of declaring Rhee's republic, citing-"

"Sayin'," Hae corrected, still clingin' to Korea.

"-saying that it would be too dangerous to let our Korea and theirs Reunify. They wished to turn half of our country against the other, and that is part of what ultimately led to this war," Hwang explained in a rush. "While we've always refrained from slandering the South himself because we are aware that he's- blameless in this entire situation."

Hae didn't think the kids noticed the li'l falter in her brother's voice before 'blameless.' But Korea did. His teeth ground above her, his quivering getting worse.

"And we know it would create unnecessary division between our people. America and the Syngman Rhee clique treat our Korea himself as the enemy, and spread their propaganda to paint anyone who supports him as a Communist, which is any patriotic Korean, regardless of their political leaning, and this has led to hundreds of thousands of deaths." Hwang shoved his glasses up. "So you can understand why when hearing one of our own spread similar rhetoric- sentiments-"

"Ideas."

"Ideas, Korea might get-"

He stopped, frazzled, and Hae could hear the gears in his churnin' as he tried to think of a word that wouldn't just make Korea madder.

"Alarmed," Hae tried desperately.

"Yes, alarmed," Hwang snapped his fingers. "But he knows you didn't truly mean anything by it."

He gave Korea a pleading look over his thin shoulder, and Hae heard his teeth grind louder.

"I- I really didn't." In-su's eyes glimmered. "I'm sorry, Comrade Korea. I didn't m-mean to make you upset."

The anger left Korea's face, and he looked stricken all of a sudden. He yanked his arm free from Hae, eye flicking over all of them like they were enemy soldiers instead of kids, backing away as he tried to corner himself, even though the riverbank was too open.

"...I have to go," he said, voice tight, then turned around and marched away, jerky and stiff, disappearing into the chosonjips, even though the hospital he had to get to was almost straight down the river.

Hae gave Hwang a worried look in the silence he left.

Korea almost never snapped at their people, unless they were politicians that messed up, and even then it was more criticism. She'd especially never heard him go off on a kid like that. And the way he'd been backing away...

It'd been okay for him to get like that at Hoengsong, after the Fourth Phase Offensive failed. They'd been alone, aside from Mao Zhilong, and him being a foreigner made it make more sense. But to look at their people that way, like they were about to attack him...

"Sorry Korea had to take off like that," Hae said loudly, turning to smile at the children. "He has to go to the hospital to meet the other kids that got hurt, and he can't be late."

Some of the younger ones looked confused, and the older ones looked nervous. In-su was putting on a brave face, but his bottom lip was wobblin'.

"Is... Comrade Korea mad at me?" he asked quietly.

"Nope," Hae chirped. "He's just..." He wasn't here, so it should be okay to say this. She couldn't let the kids think he was mean or didn't like them. "Seein' y'all hurtin' makes him upset. And that makes him more upset about other stuff than he should be."

That was part of it, anyway. The part Korea wouldn't hit her upside the head with a boot for saying (just with his hand).

"It's not you he's mad at," she assured him, and all of them. "And he ain't disappointed either."

She'd messed up her 'isn't,' but Hwang didn't correct her, staring after Korea with his brows curved in. He looked at her, and she nodded, joggin' off as he kept trying to make the kids feel better.

"Comrade North Hwanghae." The boy that liked asking questions shot his hand up. "Ah heard the South made Comrade Korea lose his eye. Is that true?"

"That's a rumour," Hae heard Hwang say, not really a lie. "It's... a little more complicated than that."

It wasn't. But Hae didn't turn back, running through the alleys between the chosonjips, the air nice an' cool for a moment before she was back on the hot street.

Like she'd thought, Korea had just gone one over so they couldn't watch him walk to the hospital. She called his name, but he didn't stop, walking faster. Hae puffed her cheeks, stretching her legs, even though it hurt.

"Korea!" She tried to latch on to his arm, but they were mostly alone on the street, so he shoved her away.

"Go away, South Hwanghae."

Hae didn't bring up the way he'd shouted at In-su, 'cuz she could see he already regretted it, and was pricklin' with embarrassment. He'd just snap at her.

"Do ya want me to go to the hospital with you?" she asked instead, trying to sound confident.

She knew that was where the real wounded kids were. They didn't just have injuries that looked bad or made it hard to walk right. They were the ones that had barely survived, who'd only just burned longer than the napalm. The ones that couldn't walk, or talk, or blink, that would terrify the other kids just to look at.

It would be scary, and make her furious and sad to see what the Yankee had done to their kids. But Hae didn't want to let Korea go alone, not when he was already so upset by a few welts.

"Ah could help."

Korea halted, twitching towards her. Somethin' flashed across his eye before it hardened, and he drew himself up so he was as taller than her as he could be.

"I do not need 'help,'" he said, all cold as he glared at her. "Go back and do what you came here to do."

Hae blinked, confused, as he sped off again.

"Can ah tell In-su you say sorry for bein' mean to him?" she asked before he could get away, keeping her voice low in case anyone was behind the open windows in the chosonjips.

Korea just jerked his head in a nod, then disappeared down another alley, putting himself another street over so she couldn't see him anymore.

Hae pouted. She knew Korea liked doing things himself, but when he first turned to her when she offered, he'd looked... He didn't get scared, not really. But he'd looked a li'l... panicked?

She frowned after him, then turned to plod back to the river, wishing SH was here to drag him back so he could apologize himself, and show the kids he really wasn't mean.

Mao Zhilong was showing them some of the stuff in his sleeves when she got back, pulling all the weird things he had in there out. One went reelin' back as he let him sniff a li'l blue and white vial he had, snorting like he'd just sniffed chemical fertilizer (Hae liked the smell of regular fertilizer, but that stuff was nasty). Off to the side, Hwang and Ryong-jin were in a 'I'm sorry, no I'm so sorry' match.

In-su was still sulking, staring glumly at the ground, not even looking up when Mao Zhilong showed off his throwin' knives.

Hae skipped back with a big smile on her face. "Korea says he's real sorry," she announced. "And that when the war's over, he'll let you try drivin' a tank to make up for it."

In-su's head shot up. "Ya mean it?"

"Ayuh!" Korea had told her it was okay to apologize for him, so it was probably okay to offer whatever she had to to make him feel better, too. And Jong-il had been allowed to get in a tank before, so there was a... precedent! for letting kids try them out.

Hae was proud with her word choice, and In-su was thrilled with his apology.

"Did ya hear that?!" he cried to his friends. "Comrade Korea's gonna let me drive a tank!"

They all erupted with jealousy and excitement, and Hae hoped that was enough to make 'em forget Korea's outburst. She remembered every time he'd ever snapped at or scolded her, but that was 'cuz she remembered everything he said ever. Hopefully these kids would just remember the good stuff.

Hwang's eyebrows dipped. 'Is he alright?'

Hae hesitated, then smiled.

He would be. Once they won the war and kids weren't dyin' nomore. Anymore. And he... got the Southern One back.

Hae shook her head, clapping her hands. "Let's play a game, comrades!"

She ran around with the kids for awhile, chasin' 'em like she was chasing chickens around the yard (hope for the bliss of the dead for Cucky), and showing them her guns and Party membership card (though she didn't let them touch it). It didn't really matter what they were doing, so long as they had fun, and they knew their provinces and Korea cared about them. She made sure they knew Gyeonggi did, too, and that he'd be here if he wasn't trapped down in the south.

She hoped he was okay. She knew their guerrillas in the enemies' rear had been getting more active as more people turned against Rhee, so all her southern cousins were probably still being bombed occasionally. But GG and Gang would be getting the worst of it, since they were on the front. Those distant rumbles and blasts she could still hear over the children's shrieks of laughter once and awhile were all hitting Gyeonggi.

And she could feel her own burns cracking under the bandages.

Some more kids showed up, a few from the orphanage and ones from town drawn over by the sounds of playing, and overjoyed to see two of their Provincehumans. Hae was happy to entertain all of them until they all collapsed, dirty and sweaty, to lie on the sunny riverbank or splash in the water again.

In-su skidded up to Hwang, fallin' to his knees at his feet. "Hyung, can ya tell us some war stories?"

Hwang looked thrilled. "Of course. To start, how about I recount the time I was trekking through the northern mountains and saw a bear..."

Hae let him tell his bear story to all the interested kids, wanderin' a few paces away to drink from her canteen, keeping an eye on the children to make sure they drank from the jar of clean water one of the militiamen had brought before leaving, instead of the stream. It didn't matter if the Yanks probably wouldn't drop their germs close to a place with so many foreign correspondents- they could just as easily put them in the mountain rivers to get carried down here. These kids had been through too much to get sick now.

As she clipped her canteen back on her belt, she looked across the water. The li'l girl and boy were still over there, her drawing with her head down again, and him staring at the other kids, looking all wistful.

"Are they okay?" she asked.

Jung-hi had left to take the laundry back to the orphanage to dry, leaving Ryong-jin. She looked over at the two, her lips turning down.

"That's Hye-mi and Chul-sam," she said sadly. "Hye-mi is... a little more damaged than most of the kids in the orphanage. It makes her shy. They're both from Sariwon, so they tend to stick together."

Hae watched Mao Zhilong finally lose a game of go and stop obliteratin' children at it, standing and stretching before he padded over to the crossing stones, stepping lightly over them. She decided to follow, hopping across to join him.

"What are you drawing there, meimei?" she heard him ask.

Hye-mi startled, but didn't look up. She combed her fingers through her black hair, spreading it out. It wasn't in stubby braids or the adorable bob most girls had. It was long and messy, sweeping over from the other side of her head to drape over her shoulder, covering the side of her face on the side Hae came up on. She held it in place there.

One of the small hands wrapped around the strands was swollen and shiny, with only a couple thick, mangled fingernails on it. The fingers didn't bend all the way.

Chul-sam greeted them, then nudged her other shoulder, whispering, "Hye-mi, it's rude not to answer."

Hye-mi shrank down, holding her hair tighter.

Mao Zhilong tipped his head, looking at what she'd drawn in the dirt. Hae looked, too.

It was a girl with her hair in a high-banged bob that showed off her round face and large eyes. She had two cheeks like li'l round apples above a tiny smile that showed a dimple on one side. It looked good for just being drawn with a stick, and the li'l girl seemed real happy.

"Is that you?" she asked Hye-mi.

The girl tensed at her voice. Her foot peeked out from her skirts like she might erase the drawing, before it retreated.

As Chul-sam nudged her again, she said, "That'sh... It was me."

Her voice was small and hoarse, all burnt out and wheezing. Kang had told Hae all about napalm so she knew to avoid it at all costs, and what to do if she or one of their comrades got hit, so she knew it was 'cuz the burning jelly had sucked all the oxygen out of her lungs, and left them and her throat scorched. There was a slur to it, too, way worse than Gyeong's lisp, like she was talking with her mouth full, turnin' all her 's' sounds to mush.

Hae almost complimented her by calling the drawing cute, then remembered what Ryong-jin had said, and bit her tongue.

"Hm." Mao Zhilong squinted down at the portrait. "Well drawn, meimei."

He reached out, scuffin' his boot over it, turning it back to flat dirt.

"Hey," Hae protested at the same time the girl did, looking up.

The province's stomach clenched, her legs going numb.

Hye-mi's face was almost the same as the drawing's on one side, with a big brown eye that glared up at Mao Zhilong, a little shell ear, and half of a pair of rosebud lips with the hint of that dimple at the corner, hidden by her frown.

The other side was just flesh, all red and brown and lumpy. It was like her brow had melted, running down her face like wax to puddle around her neck. Her little snub nose was half-missing, not mangled like the rest of her skin, but like it had been removed, leaving a gaping hole where one nostril was supposed to be. Her hair had shifted when she turned her head, and Hae could see that her ear was melted, too, melded with the rest of her neck, where the damage continued down into the high collar of her child-sized choson-ot.

And her right eye was completely gone. Her brow and upper lids had merged with one of her apple cheeks, leaving a rippled plane of skin. Only a little dark slit was left at the inner corner where it hadn't sealed up completely, and Hae could tell that the inside was empty. It gave her that same sick, tingly feeling that Korea's missing socket had, back before they gave him his eyepatch, her body telling her she was looking at a part of a person she shouldn't be.

Hae tried not to react, but Hye-mi must have seen something in her face, or just realized she could see the burns, 'cuz she quickly ducked her head, slapping her bad hand over them again as she used the other to tug her hair back into place. As she did, Hae saw that the left side of her scalp was bald, covered with more of that lumpy flesh that wouldn't let hair grow up through it.

A cotton pad held in place with medical tape covered her cheek, hiding the other half of her lips. It made her slur worse as she pressed it to her face.

"Why did you do that?" she asked Mao Zhilong. She'd just seemed indignant when he first brushed away her drawing, but now she sounded like she was about to cry.

Hae tore her eyes away to squint at the Chinese guy. He smiled under his mask, sitting next to Hye-mi on the low stone bank. She turned her head away more, ducking into her other shoulder.

"Art isn't any less precious just because it was temporary," he said, leanin' back on his hands. "All beauty fades eventually. Besides, you were going to wipe it away yourself, weren't you?"

Hye-mi glanced back at the dirt, then hid her face again.

Hae glared at Mao Zhilong, silently threatening to tell Korea he was bullying kids. He just tipped his head back to the bright blue sky.

"Do you like art?" she asked Hye-mi, keeping herself upbeat as she squatted in front of her.

"Hye-mi's great at art!" Chul-sam said, leaning over his friend. "She used to help make posters for the Children's Union, and she even won an award in school for her painting of Jongbang Mountain in spring!"

"Ushed to be," Hye-mi muttered. "I can't paint anymore."

Her burnt hand twitched around her hair, but still didn't close.

"You seem to be doing just fine with your left hand," Mao Zhilong said, nodding to where her drawin' had been.

"The left hand's bad." This one did clench, pulling at her hair. "So anything I make with it'sh bad, too."

"Aiya, superstition, meimei?" Mao Zhilong *'tsk'*ed. "I thought your Comrade Korea was raising smarter youth than that."

"Mama said it." She turned her head like she was about to glare at him, then ducked again. "She wasn't dumb."

"Not dumb," Hae agreed. "Just taught wrong stuff."

A lot of the things her brother called 'peasant superstitions' were just good sense, like not cuttin' your nails at night. Spirits and stuff weren't real, so mice wouldn't steal your identity, but they would come to nibble the cuttings, and then you'd have mice in your house. And telling someone they'd shake their luck away by shaking their legs was just so kids would be scared into sitting still. Hae knew that 'cuz Chungnam had used to use that on her (until she realized they had no wealth to shake away, and also remembered that South Chungcheong called superstitious people a word Hae was too nice to repeat). And whistling at night wouldn't attract ghosts, but it could call over a tiger or a wild dog that wasn't as friendly as Ppang had been.

But some superstitions were just silly, like the left-handed one. Sure it was a li'l inconvenient now that they'd switched to writing left to right, but they'd used to write right to left, and vertically, not to mention most people couldn't write at all, so she thought being left-handed would've been just fine before. The left hand was supposed to be dirty, but since it was the right hand that always got used, Hae thought it made more sense to consider that one gross. And neither of them would be gross if you just washed your hands. She'd asked Hwang about it, but he'd just said people in the majority always ganged up on people in the minority. She thought that was stupid (and also not true- feudalism and capitalism were all about the minority oppressin' the majority).

So since she was in charge of helping break their peasants of some of the useless superstitions, like convincing them not to waste their food on the dead during Chuseok and other holidays, part of that had been trying to teach them that being left-handed wasn't evil. It just made it even harder to learn how to write if they were using their off hands, and it was already hard enough. Once they learned the basics, then they could start learnin' how to use their right, if they really wanted to.

"Your left hand is the same as your right hand," Hae told Hye-mi, showing her hers, then realizing that wasn't true. "And your left hand is even better than your right hand. So if that's the best you have, you should use it."

"Mm." Hye-mi looked down at her left hand, splaying her fingers, then curling them into her hair again. "I guesh."

Hae looked at Mao Zhilong, wonderin' if he was going to say something inspirational, or if he'd only come over here to ruin her drawing. It seemed to be that one, 'cuz he was just lazily watching In-su terrorize the rest of the children with water.

"Why aren't you playin' with the other kids?" Hae asked the two here.

Chul-sam pouted. "I want to. But Hye-mi doesn't, and I'm not leaving her alone. Even if we missed Comrade Korea 'cuz of it."

"I told you you could go say hi," Hye-mi muttered, shoulders hunching.

The boy shook his shaved head. "Then you'd be the only one that didn't meet him, and you'd be all left out."

"Why din't you want to meet Korea?" Hae asked, hopin' she wasn't the kid of a reactionary they'd executed or anything like that.

Hye-mi hunched, muttering something under her breath.

"What?"

The girl didn't answer, but Mao Zhilong did. "She said 'Because I'm ugly.'"

Hye-mi flinched like he'd hit her, but didn't deny it.

"You're not ugly," Hae protested. All burnt up, sure, but that din't mean she was ugly. And the other half wasn't burnt at all.

"Liars get their mouths washed," Hye-mi said into her knees, pulling them up.

"Ah ain't lyin'!"

"You are," she said stubbornly. "All the other kids make fun of me for how I look."

"No they don't," Chul-sam denied. "No one's ever said anything like that. They just don't like looking at you 'cuz it makes them feel bad."

"How eloquent, didi," Mao Zhilong hummed.

Chul-sam probably didn't know what that word meant. "It's 'cuz you're hurt, not 'cuz you're ugly. Hye-mi isn't ugly."

"You have to say that," she mumbled. "We have the same hometown."

The boy looked frustrated enough that Hae thought they'd had this talk before.

"Why would everyone else think you're ugly?" she asked Hye-mi. "They're all burned, too."

"Not like me."

Hae thought some of them were worse than her. At least she had both her feet, and her fingers were all still separate.

And she was alive.

"Ah don't think you're that bad," she offered. "You're missin' an eye, but there's nothin wrong with that. Korea's missin' one too."

'Oops.' She'd done it again. Hopefully Hwang had already told everyone earlier so this one wasn't her fault.

"It'sh not 'just' an eye." Hye-mi's good hand squeezed, then she reached up, picking at her medical tape. When the cotton pad came loose she raised her head, just a li'l, and Hae put more effort into smiling.

Part of the girl's cheek was gone. Her lips stretched wider than they should, showing off some of her lower teeth and all of her upper ones, and her pale gums, like she was grinnin' with only one side of her mouth, but far too wide. Hae could see where her teeth ended. The skin around the place where the corner of her lips should be was smoother than the rest, and had a thick, wormy scar fencing it in.

"The doctors put new shkin on me," Hye-mi said, her tongue flashin' pink through her white teeth as she spoke. "But they ran out. And none of the stitches they used on my eye can get it to close, so they want me to go back so they can shtaple it."

Her good eye brimmed with tears, and she hid her face again, holding the bandage back to her cheek, pressing it in like she could fill the hole in her flesh.

Hae guessed it wasn't like Korea's, where he could keep it open. Kang had wanted him to get it stitched if he wouldn't get a fake eye, but when he refused, decided it was fine to leave it so long as he kept it clean. But Hye-mi's socket only had that tiny hole exposed, so if bacteria got in, it'd be hard to get out.

"I'm ugly," the little girl sniffled. "They wanted to keep me in the hospital with all the other ugly kids, but they didn't have the room."

Mao Zhilong had leaned over to see her face, but sat back now. "Maybe if you didn't think the other children were ugly, you wouldn't think you were ugly either."

"But I am," she croaked, and Chul-sam fluttered his hands, lookin' distressed. "And they're going to put metal in my face and make me even uglier. I'm never gonna be able to get married or get a job because everyone's gonna think I'm a freak, becaushe I am."

"No you ain't," Hae said, and Mao Zhilong agreed, "You don't look so freakish to me, meimei."

"You're shaying that, but you're ugly, too, aren't you?" Hye-mi tearily accused. "That's why you're wearing that mask."

"Actually, I'm wearing this mask because I'm stunningly attractive, and if I wasn't, the women in this town would jump me," the Chinese guy corrected. "And gege's chastity is very important to him."

Hae didn't think you were supposed to talk about chastity with kids, but she also thought they didn't know what chastity even meant. Neither did she, if anyone asked.

Hye-mi shook her head. "You're lying. You're wearing it because you're a freak, too, and I'm gonna have to wear a mask for the rest of my life, just like you, even when it's hot out."

The idea seemed to upset her even more, and she tugged at the collar of her jeogori like it was chokin' her.

Mao Zhilong tipped his head at her, and Hae could see his narrow eyes flicking around the stream. He started to reach up for his face.

She leaped at him, bowlin' him over onto the bank, scrabbling up so she was half-sitting on his stomach, one hand over his face, keeping his mask firmly in place so Korea wouldn't get mad at him.

"Comrade Mao Zhilong keeps his mask on 'cuz he's an important Chinese officer and doesn't want the Yankees to take him out," Hae told Hye-mi, pretending she hadn't just done that. "But there are plenty of soldiers that do have scars and they don't wear masks."

Not all burns and stuff were bad enough to be discharged for, especially not permanently when they needed as many soldiers as they could get. And a regular soldier couldn't hide his identity all the time. She thought the girl would've had to at least see one of them here, especially with the injured veterans around.

"Ah met a man who was missin' an eye like you," she informed Hye-mi. "The reaction'ries lit him on fire. He was real upset, too, thinkin' everyone thought he looked like a freak. But he was the only one that thought that. And look- the other orphanage kids have scars. Even if they're not as bad as yours, they're still bad. But they're still havin' fun." She gestured to where the others were splashing around, a few more of the them shirtless now. "See? Even the town kids don't care."

"Because they're boys," Hye-mi said glumly, peeking at them. "And that guy was, too. Scars look cool on boys, so they don't care about them."

Hae thought about Dong-joon, dropping out of the Worker's Party and wearing that hood to the meeting, trying to hide his disfigured face from everyone. She didn't think that was true. But she also didn't think Hye-mi would listen, just like she wouldn't listen if she told her that not all of them were boys, and Su-jin didn't seem to have a problem scoopin' water back at Kwon-mo with her flipper-fingers when he soaked the hem of her skirt. The girl didn't seem like she wanted to be cheered up.

But obviously she did. Everyone wanted to feel better when they were sad. You just had to find the right way to do it.

"Hae, get off of Comrade Mao."

Hae looked back to see Hwang coming over, a big wet patch on his uniform where he'd gotten splashed. Story time was over for now, she guessed.

"Don't worry, I'm enjoying this," Mao Zhilong said from under Hae, muffled by her hand.

She slid off anyways, letting him sit up. She'd been chokin' herself with burnt-meat smell earlier, she didn't want to do the same to him.

He hadn't been at Sincheon. But he had been at Chipyong-ri.

Hye-mi had yanked her hair back over her face now that someone new was here. Chul-sam got up to greet Hwang, then sat back at her side right away.

Hwang raised an eyebrow at Hae, and she pouted a li'l. He nodded, keepin' quiet.

"Scars look cool on everyone," she told Hye-mi. "Ah've got tons'a scars, and so does Hwang, and Korea. The General has 'em too."

She didn't bother mentioning her own burns. They weren't permanent, so they might just make her jealous.

"They don't look cool on me."

Hae kept her smile up, but she frowned inside. She knew how Hye-mi felt. Her tooth had made her upset enough, thinking she wasn't cute anymore and that everyone would think she was a clueless li'l hick because of it, and no one would respect her. She'd been being way sillier than the girl, since a missin' tooth was nothing compared to the napalm burns, but she did know.

She'd already tried the method SH and Korea used to make her feel better, reminding her that tons of people had the same problem as her, and she'd never thought they were ugly or unrespectable (or even noticed). And her number two method of telling her she shared something with Korea hadn't worked, either. She didn't think asking Hye-mi if she thought Hae looked like a freak with all her burns would make her see a li'l sense, like it had with Dong-joon. She thought the girl might just say she did, which would hurt a bit, and she'd see that it hurt a bit, and then she'd think Hae hated her own burns and wanted to get rid of them (which she did, but not because they made her ugly), and that just brought them back to her bein' jealous that Hae's could heal and hers couldn't. So she couldn't do that.

And she couldn't tell her her burns represented the resilience of their country. She hadn't been targeted for helpin' their people or fighting the enemy- she'd just had a bomb dropped on her by some Yankee deathbird whose pilot probably wasn't even looking down. Hye-mi was resilient, all the kids were. She'd lost her family and survived being drenched in napalm, something even grown soldiers usually didn't.

But she was only maybe ten, and kids couldn't see big stuff like that all the time, even ones in the Children's Union. If Hye-mi went over to the river and looked in, Hae didn't think she'd see 'resilient' in her reflection, just hurt.

But she didn't give up, trying what Korea had said to make her cheer up for good about her tooth.

"Ah still think you're cute," she said, crouchin' in front of her so she could see part of her face, the good part of her lips crushed between her teeth. "Even if your scars aren't, you're still real pretty."

Chul-sam nodded so quick his head blurred. "I think so, too! Hye-mi's always been real pretty."

"I'm not!" Hye-mi burst out, shootin' up and stomping her foot on the ground. "I was pretty, but now I'm not anymore! Mama- always-said-" She took deep, gasping breaths between the words, her voice cracking like glass. "Mama always said I was pretty, but- I'm- not-anymore!"

Her good eye poured tears down her unscarred cheek, and she thumped back down onto the bank, startin' to sob into her hands.

Oh. This wasn't about her thinking she was ugly, not entirely. And Hae didn't think her not wanting to use her left hand was about superstition.

Chul-sam hung his head, clasping his li'l hands on his knees. He was just a kid, too. He didn't know how to cheer his friend up. Neither did any of the other kids that looked over at Hye-mi's crying, then away, their playing getting quieter.

Mao Zhilong stood up, taking Hye-mi's stick and walking away down the riverbank, like a barncat that came to check things out when you were counting grain sacks, then strutted away once you were strugglin' not to drop them.

Hae wished Korea was here, even though she knew he wouldn't know what to say now that the girl was sobbing. But he'd make her feel better, and then she would.

She looked at Hwang, helpless.

He made a sign to Ryong-jin, telling her everything was okay, then looked down at Hye-mi, hesitating before he took Mao Zhilong's place next to her.

"It sounds like you cared for your mother quite a bit," he said, adjustin' his glasses. "Would you like to tell us about her?"

The girl gasped raggedly into her hands, her sobs choking in her throat, and Chul-sam quickly reached over, placing a hand on her back and the other on her chest, pushing her up straight.

"Hye-mi, breathe like the doctor said," he urged. "In and out, real slow."

She struggled to, and Hae balanced on the tips of her toes, ready to take off and find a doctor, only returning to flat feet once the girl's breathing evened out a bit.

She thought she knew why it looked like part of her nose had been removed. It must have melted into her face. And with how bad her lungs were, she couldn't afford to be able to get air in only one nostril.

Hye-mi took slow, deep gulps of air until she was breathin' normal again. But she kept her face in her palms, her hair hanging over it.

"...My mama was... really kind," she sniffled after awhile. "Papa loved Hye-seong more, 'cuz he was the only boy, but mama always treated us the same. She'd always take me and Hye-yong with her to the market so we could look at stuff, and she'd brush our hair and sing to us before bed, a-and she got me my first inks when I asked, even though they cost a lot."

"She sounds like a good mother," Hwang said, gentle-like, and Hye-mi nodded shakily.

"She was. She took really good care of us, and made the best baeksuk in the world, and she was n-nice and funny and pr-pr-pretty." Hye-mi's eye filled with tears again, her breathin' getting ragged again. "So w-why did they kill her? We already l-lost papa and Hye-yong, so why did her and Hye-seong have to go, too? Why'd they have to leave me all alone, l-like this?"

She looked down at her hands, one balling up and the other spasming as it refused to close. Her tears pattered down on her tiny fist.

"You're not alone, Hye-mi," Chul-sam said, clutchin' it in his own hands. "I told you you're my best friend now, and when my dad finds us, he'll take you in, I know it."

"All the other kids are missin' their folks, too," Hae told her. "That's why you got sent to the orphanage- so you won't be alone, and y'all can look out for each other."

Hwang nodded. "And your peers want to look out for you. Su-jin and Yun-gun are worrying about you over there."

Hye-mi raised her head, her burnt hand over her face as she looked across the river. The two kids waved, and she ducked down again.

"Why won't you let us help, Hye-mi?" Chul-sam asked, his li'l eyebrows all scrunched up. "We want to."

"I-" Hye-mi's lip quivered, her nailless fingers diggin' into her forehead.

"Your injuries bother you so much because they make you think of your mother, don't they?" Hwang asked softly.

Hae darted a look at him, then back at Hye-mi, worried. Talking about what happened to them could help adults, 'cuz they could get everything out and start forgettin', but kids might not even fully understand what happened themselves yet. Which didn't mean they shouldn't try, but she'd been thinking about working up to it, not asking so bluntly when they already knew the answer.

Hye-mi swallowed. "M-Mama said Hye-seong and Hye-yong looked like papa. But she always said I l-looked jusht like her. And I was gonna grow up to be pretty like her. B-But I don't look like her anymore. When the fire... I don't remember."

She put her hands over her ears, even though the melted one couldn't hear, drawing her knees up to hide her face instead.

"I don't remember. I just woke up, and she was there, and she was- she was all- She was staring at me for forever, until the guy came, and then I was in the hoshpital." Her words were getting more slurred with her tears, meltin' into each other. "I was really happy when they finally took the bandages off and I got to go out, but- but then I looked in the water, and-"

Her shoulders shook as she whimpered, "I don't look like her anymore, but I do. N-Now- When I see my face, it's l-like- I don't want to forget what she looked like, but every time I see it, all I can see is her staring, and she didn't even- didn't even have-"

She slapped a hand back over her missing eye, the one still there squeezing shut, sendin' more tears pouring down her cheek.

"I don't want to see her that way," she whimpered. "I don't want to forget what she looked like before. I don't wanna forget my mama."

Hwang moved back, letting Hae sit next to the girl, wrappin' her in a big hug. She shook in her arms, all small and fragile, burying her face in her shoulder.

"But Hye-mi." Chul-sam looked confused. "None of us have ever met your mom. We're not forgetting what she looked like when we see you, 'cuz we don't know what she looked like at all."

"I kn-know." Her broken voice was muffled even more by Hae's uniform. "But it feels like- It's like if people see it-" The grip around Hae's ribs tightened. "I don't know, it'sh dumb."

"Just because you don't have the words for it, doesn't mean it's dumb," Hwang said. "Feelings are irrational. That doesn't mean they're inconsequential."

Hae smiled proudly at him over Hye-mi's head. He gave her a worried furrow back.

'But I don't know how to fix irrational things.'

Neither did Hae. She'd never been able to for Korea, to get him to eat or join their celebrations or cuddle with her when he was awake. Even SH had never been able to get him to dance with them, even when Hae thought he... didn't not want to. He was always punishing himself, even though he hadn't done anything he deserved to be punished for.

She guessed grown-ups got irrational feelin's about stuff, too. Even Korea.

Knowing that didn't help her with Hye-mi. Maybe all you could do for stuff like that was give the person a nice long hug and let them know they weren't alone. And at least she was lettin' her hug her for more than five seconds.

But she didn't want to leave without doing more. She just didn't know what.

A light hummin' came closer, and her eyes opened as Hye-mi was suddenly pulled out of her arms with a li'l yelp.

"I'll take this," Mao Zhilong said, holding her up in the air by the waist as he padded away again, Hye-mi squirmin' as she tried to cover her face.

"Oi!" Hae protested, scurrying after him with the others.

Now he was like the barncat that came darting over to steal the piece of chicken you dropped.

Mao Zhilong carried her over to where he'd been drawing in the dirt, placing her on her feet.

"I made you something, meimei," he said, grandly gesturing at the ground with his glove.

Hye-mi looked down, and her teary eye went wide. "Ish that...? That's me."

Hae gaped, just as shocked as her. Mao Zhilong had only been using a stick, all the lines were just grooves in the grey-brown earth, but somehow he'd made a drawing Hae wouldn't think twice about seein' next to one of SH's in a gallery.

It really was Hye-mi, but not like she'd drawn herself. She had her burns, ripply lines tracing the outlines of melted skin, dirt pushed into waves to give it the texture it had in real life. But she looked happy amyway, with a big grin on her face that stretched the good side of her mouth almost as wide as the scarred part, showing off all her teeth without the dressing or her hair to get in the way. Her round cheek was pushed up so much it turned her eye into a crescent, almost hidin' it completely.

Hae really didn't think she was ugly. The burns weren't nice to look at, but they didn't make her hideous. But even though she already didn't think she was ugly, somehow Mao Zhilong's portrait made the girl look...

"You made me look pretty again." Hye-mi sounded awed as she raised her hand to her face, forgetting to hide it as she touched the tips of her fingers to the scarred skin where her eye should be. "How'd you do that?"

"You haven't stopped being pretty, meimei," Mao Zhilong told her. "You just stopped seeing it."

He unbuttoned his sleeve and leaned over, using the long fabric to sweep away the portrait. Hye-mi reached out a hand like she wanted to stop him, then let it fall to her side.

"You erased it," she said, voice wavering.

Mao Zhilong was unbothered. "En. But you remember what it looked like, don't you?"

She nodded, fist over her heart, and he smiled.

"Art has that effect. Feelings, beauty, memories, they all fade. But great art is unforgettable. It captures whatever was poured into its creation." He sounded softer as he said, "The closest a human can get to immortality is to be painted by someone that loves them."

Hye-mi looked down at the stick he pressed into her left hand. Mao Zhilong smiled down at her.

"So keep working on your art, meimei. Immortalize your mama. That way if you ever start to forget what she looked like, or how it felt when she brushed your hair, you can look at it, and it will all come back to you."

"I..." Hye-mi wiped her firearm across her eyes. "I will. I'll- I'll make an amazing picture of her, and then I'll show it to everyone so they'll know how pretty she was, too."

Her little fingers closed around the stick, and Mao Zhilong let go, smiling.

"I can't wait to see it, Hye-mi," Chul-sam chirped, and she gave him a wobbly smile.

"And if you ever forget how pretty you are again, or if anyone too blind to see it comes along-" Mao Zhilong put a finger under her chin, lifting her face to smile down at her. "Just know gege thinks you're the most beautiful girl he's ever met."

Hye-mi's eye widened before her wobbly lip lost the fight and her face crumpled in, fat tears startin' to roll down her cheeks again as she started to bawl.

Hae hovered in distress before realizing she was crying less like she'd been before, and more like Jin-suk had at the mineral spring.

"Ayuh." She glomped on to the girl. "Hye-mi's super pretty!"

"The prettiest," Hwang agreed quickly.

"I think Hye-mi's pretty, too!"

"Chul-sam, stop saying that," she mumbled through her tears. "It's embarrashing when you do it."

"Eh? Why?"

Hae giggled, givin' her another squeeze when her tears finally stopped.

"Do ya think you want to play with the other kids now?" she asked, pulling back.

Hye-mi hesitated, looking at the far shore where her friends were running around. "But... I haven't made my painting yet. What if...?"

"The best way to lose happy memories is to dwell on unhappy thoughts," Mao Zhilong said. "Go, meimei, have fun. I promise you won't forget her."

When she shuffled her feet, he added, "And if you go play now, I promise that if by the time you're twenty-five no man truly wants you, gege will marry you."

Chul-sam frowned at that, but Hye-mi looked up at him hopefully. "Really?"

"Really." Mao Zhilong lay a hand over his heart. "I promise."

Hye-mi glanced at the other shore, tightening her hold on her stick, then nodded determinedly. "Okay."

She took a step towards the crossin' stones, then stopped. Her hand lifted a li'l, like she might hide her face, but Chul-sam grabbed it.

"Here, I'll hold your hand, Hye-mi."

"Embarrashing," the girl mumbled, but let him pull her across the stream, helping her over the rocks so she wouldn't trip on her skirt.

The kids on the other side all stopped what they were doing as she reached them, staring at her. Hye-mi lowered her scarred face, clutching at her chima with her free hand.

"U-Um-"

"Hye-mi!" Su-jin trundled over on her short legs, taking her arm. "Come play yutnori with us!"

"She doesn't wanna play kid games," In-su protested. "She wants to sword fight. See? She's already got a big stick."

Hae grinned, relieved as the kids fought over who would get to play with Hye-mi, until Su-jin won, and her and Chul-sam joined her an' a couple of the others to play a stick game that looked a li'l less like yutnori and a li'l more like kids that had seen their parents play real yutnori once or twice, and were now trying to recreate it.

Hwang sighed with relief, rubbing his chest. "I'm grateful that succeeded."

"En. Another job well done I'd say, comrades," Mao Zhilong's voice said from directly between them.

Hwang jumped a bit, and so did Hae.

"Yes," her brother said, fixin' his glasses. "Thank you for the assistance, comrade. I'll confess, I'm not sure we could have cheered her up without you."

"We could'a," Hae denied, 'cuz Korea wouldn't want them to say they'd needed a foreigner to help.

"It would've been more challenging," Hwang compromised.

"Luckily for you, I'm irresistible to women of all ages," Mao Zhilong preened.

Hae pursed her lips. She didn't think it was his offer to marry Hye-mi that really helped.

"Korea won't let you actually marry her, y'know," she said, hands on her hips. "It doesn't matter if it's fifteen years from now."

"The bold make promises they don't know if they can keep," Mao Zhilong said airily, slippin' between them. "The wise make promises they know they won't have to."

He lifted his scarf to wink at her, then crossed the stream to keep winning children's games against children.

Hae puffed out her cheeks, even though she was actually really happy with how he'd handled the girl. She just thought Korea would maybe be a li'l nicer to him if he acted more like that and less like a barncat. Maybe.

"I hope she'll be alright," Hwang fretted, watching Hye-mi as she tossed yut sticks at the ground, the other kids squealin' as they came up good. "Recovery isn't a straightforward road, especially not with what she must have been through."

"She'll be just fine," Hae assured him confidently. "She's got Chul-sam an' Su-jin an' Ryong-jin an' Jung-hi an' everyone else. And she's got us. When Chul-sam's dad gets found, they'll be headin' back to Sariwon, so we can keep an eye on 'em."

"And if he isn't?" Hwang asked, keeping his voice real low.

The thunder rumbled in the east, and Hae's skin burned from the thunder she couldn't hear.

"He will," she said. "And even if he doesn't, we'll still look out for them. Once we win the war, we'll be able to come to Kaesong whenever we want."

"Mm." Hwang took his glasses off, looking down at his boots as he polished them. "Once we win."

Hae's stomach knotted, but she kept smiling as she grabbed on to him, crushin' his ribs for the second time today.

"Oof," her brother grunted. "May I ask what that was for?"

"'Cuz Hwang's getting' better at bein' sensitive," she said into his chest. "You din't stick your foot in your mouth even once."

He'd even been able to ask about her mom without sounding like he was asking about how big the harvest would be or if a factory was close to fulfillin' the economic plan, like he was only asking 'cuz he wanted to add more stuff to what he knew.

Hae nuzzled into his sun-warmed side. "Ah'm proud'a you, oppa."

Hwang coughed. "Yes, well... I'm proud of you, too. I know this isn't quite the same ordeal as returning to Sincheon was, but... I'm proud of you for that, too."

Hae beamed, feeling all warm and fuzzy. "Does that mean you'll call me noona?"

"Absolutely not."

"Danggit."

As they went back to spending time with the kids, Hae looked down the river towards the green curve of Janam Hill, where Korea had gone.

She wished Mao Zhilong could use some of his cheer-up power on him. Maybe if he really did it, she'd be jealous that a foreigner managed to make her country feel a li'l better when she couldn't. But she knew he couldn't. And... she didn't care how it happened, so long as Korea felt better. She wanted them all to feel better. She wanted Hye-mi to be able to wear her hair short again, and for Chul-sam's dad to come home. She wanted the kids in her province to be able to play like the kids in Kaesong, and for folks in the market to be able to shop without lookin' up at the sky, waiting for the deathbirds to come, and she wanted people to have enough to eat again.

But it wouldn't happen until they won the war. Korea wouldn't cheer up until then, either. Even if once he did...

Well, Hae cared about him being happy more than almost anything in the world. So that would be enough for her.

Hae chapters are always long because she needs to go rambling. It would not be a Hae chapter without a ramble or three.

China is the type to beat children at games a few times in a row before purposely losing so they can get the thrill of a win and feel even more accomplished. He's giving them their 'underdog comes from behind' moment to enhance their narratives. But North refuses to lose. Not even to a kid. He will obliterate them at games, then tell them to get better. Sometimes SH feels like being his PR is harder than literally running light industry and an entire province. America is the same way, but he plies them with candy afterwards. Meanwhile CCCP will lose to a child every time.

Also Hae number one supporter of East Asian ugly bob hairstyle for little girls. 'Aw, so cute!' she says of the tiny walking mushrooms. Her opinion of the left hand would also change if she knew South was originally left-handed. She'd think 'Well... maybe bein' left-handed is a li'l evil.'

While South Chungcheong hates superstitious people, she does also hate left-handed people. It's not magically 'bad' to her, she just considers it poor etiquette (she's supposed to be left-handed, but she refused).

A Divide That Doesn't Ache

Hae and Hwang (and Mao Zhilong) spent the rest of the day playing with the Kaesong kids, telling them war stories that weren't too scary for them, listening to 'em ramble about their families and how they'd ended up in the city, or what it was like growing up there for the ones born in it, and playing whatever games they wanted.

She kept an eye on Hye-mi the whole time. The girl looked like she got a li'l overwhelmed once and awhile, breaking off from the other kids to go sit on the shore by herself, but Chul-sam brought her back every time. And even though Hae was worried about the town kids that showed up teasing her or saying something insensitive about her burns, none of them did. She guessed they'd been playing with the other injured children too much to be too scared by them, though a few of the younger ones gawked at her missing eye until In-su chased them off.

More of their comrades from the orphanage came by with dinner, serving juk stuffed full'a vegetables from a big pot, alongside rice and kimchi. Hae and Hwang turned their bowls down, 'cuz unlike kids, they could wait a few more hours to eat, and they couldn't take from their supplies.

"Oh!" Hae suddenly remembered something, and rummaged around in her bag, triumphantly pulling the pear she'd bought earlier out.

She'd been doing such a good job at forgettin' it was there, she'd almost forgotten she'd got it for the kids at all.

"Ah have a pear for... everyone." She frowned, realizing there were too many kids and not enough pear.

"I believe I can help with your supply issue." Mao Zhilong took a peach out of his long sleeve.

"Where did you get those?" Hae demanded as he removed a couple more.

Peaches weren't tiny, she should be able to see 'em weighing down his sleeves. And she'd been on top of him earlier and hadn't felt anything.

"Don't worry, I'm not taking from your people," he said, spinnin' a fruit on the tip of his gloved finger. "I received them from my comrades."

He clearly wasn't as smart as Korea and SH said, 'cuz he hadn't understood her question.

Hae pouted, but took the peach he offered her, callin' to the kids, "Everyone who wants some fruit, come get some!"

They all wanted it, obviously, 'cuz fruits were the best food ever. Her and Hwang cut them up, handing the pieces out. Some of the kids had came and went, so there were only around twenty now. Three peaches and a pear were enough for everyone to get a slice, even if it was tiny.

"I wish I got to eat a whole pear," a town boy lisped, licking sticky juice from his hand, his piece already gone.

"A li'l pear shared with all your comrades tastes better than a whole pear alone," Hae told him, passin' Mao Zhilong his paring knife back (and realizing he'd made her and Hwang do all the work).

"I believe Confucius said that," he said, hiding the blade in his sleeve again.

"No he din't," Hae protested. "Ah just did."

She'd learned that herself. In the hole, on the few days Eyebrows got to feed her alone, she'd got three bowls of soup or rice a day. But even her most well-fed hole days were nothing compared to the ones where she ate only a handful of berries or nothin' at all with her family.

"You inherited your curse of literalism from your Countryhuman, didn't you?" Mao Zhilong asked.

"Curses aren't real."

He sighed.

The sun started to slide down in the sky, golden light pouring over the roofs of Kaesong and glimmerin' on the shallow stream. Some of the town kids left as their parents called them from a few streets over, or came to pick them up. Full of juk an' fruit, the others lounged on the shore while Ryong-jin and Jung-hi (who Hae had successfully convinced to let her cut her hair to her shoulders, hehe) cleaned up.

Eventually Hae noticed that Korea had come back. He was standing under the chosonjip eaves again, but back in the alley, just watchin' them.

He was probably trying to be broody an' mysterious, but Hae ruined it by taking Hye-mi and pushing her over to him. He twitched like he was going to leave again, but stayed put.

"Korea," she chirped, stopping in front of him with her hands on Hye-mi's shoulders, holding her still 'cuz she was trying to run away, too. "This is Hye-mi. Ah just cut her hair for her. Doesn't she look cute?"

The girl hadn't let her actually cut it, still wanting to hide her face. And Hae knew she couldn't push her on that, like Korea hadn't pushed her to return to Sincheon. She could cut her own hair when she was ready.

But she'd had trimmed it a li'l, styling it so it wouldn't look so messy when she used it to cover her burns.

Hye-mi looked up at Korea, trembling a bit.

He looked at her melted face and slit eye, and said, "Appearances mean nothing. All of Korea's children are beloved, no matter what they look like."

Hae pouted at him over the girl's head, and he sighed.

"But yes. You look cute."

His province beamed. "See, Hye-mi? Korea thinks you look cute, too! That means you are."

Hye-mi's left cheek turned red, and she made a sound like "Eek!" before runnin' away with her face in her hands.

"That means she's happy," Hae said confidently.

Korea watched her go, not happy. "What happened to her?"

"Ah'll tell you on the drive later." She didn't want to gossip where the girl could see, even if it wasn't really gossip.

His eye came back to her, narrowing. "Is your province being bombed?"

Hae put her hand over her burning arm, looking down as she nodded. She hadn't wanted him to know until he dropped them off at Haeju, but if he was asking, she had to tell.

"But ah'm okay, and so's Hwang," she tried to reassure him. "And ah don't think we'll have to worry about 'em tomorrow. That typhoon's comin' in."

The thick grey clouds were still distant, way away over the West Sea the storm had been makin' its way across. But the heat felt heavier, pressing down on her the way it did when it was about to break. And once it did, that meant hopefully no ships firing on their west coast for the day, and maybe even no planes.

But Korea didn't look relieved. He just nodded.

"Korea, do you want to come over and talk to the kids?" she tried. "They really want to see you again."

"No."

Switching tactics, she said, "Hwang says you should. You snapped at In-su earlier, so he says that might be what their impression of you is now, which isn't good. Ah mean, ah'm sure they wouldn't hate you or anythin'," she quickly clarified. "But kids don't really get things like adults do, so-"

"No," he repeated. "And don't tell anyone else that I'm over here. That's an order."

Hae deflated, but obeyed, heading back to watch the magic tricks Mao Zhilong was showing the children, who were all sitting around with big eyes. And even though she was worried about Korea, she couldn't help but be sucked into watching him make coins disappear and reappear behind their ears, and flowers show up in his palms like they'd grown there.

"How are you doin' that?" the curious boy- Ge-hyok- asked, marvellin' at the go stone the man caught out of midair, even though he hadn't tossed one up.

Mao Zhilong spread his empty fingers. "Magic."

"Magic isn't real."

"Isn't it?" the Chinese man asked, closing his palm. "Check in your sleeve."

The boy reached in, eyes widening as he pulled out the same black stone he'd been holding.

"That's a trick!" he cried. "You still have the other one."

Mao Zhilong opened his hand, showin' that it was empty, smiling as the others gasped.

"If you think it's just sleight of hand, why don't you figure out how I did it?" he teased.

Ge-hyok furrowed his brow, starin' at the stone like it was one of Hwang's math problems as the other kids crowded in, giving suggestions on how it worked.

"I, too, would like to know how you accomplish your feats," Hwang said, eyeing Mao Zhilong's uniform. "Tiny pockets sewn into the inside of your sleeves? But while that would make sense for some of the smaller items you carry, I don't see how that would've worked for those peaches earlier."

"Disbelievers all around," Mao Zhilong sighed, shifting so he was sitting with his legs stretched out. "Even if they were just tricks, a magician never reveals his secrets." He considered this. "Unless you were to ply him with red-braised pork belly."

"I'm afraid we're currently low on that," Hwang said dryly.

"Then my methods will remain a mystery."

That disappointed Hae. She knew magic wasn't real, but she had no idea how he kept all that stuff in his sleeves, or how he made some of it appear outside 'em.

"I could teach you some of my other party tricks," Mao Zhilong offered. "Have you ever wanted to try sword swallowing?"

He pulled one of his throwin' knives from nowhere, swinging it around by the red tassel.

That interested Hae, but Hwang coughed and said, "I'm afraid I'll have to pass on that. But while we have a moment, perhaps you could clear up another mystery that's been on my mind?"

"No promises."

"What happened to the Republic of China?"

Hae perked up. Korea had reminded them a few months ago to tell him about anything Mao Zhilong said about his past, and to ask about it if they could (Hae had tried, but he was really good at makin' her forget what they were talking about). He'd definitely want to know that.

She looked over at the alleyway. It looked like he was watching them, but she didn't think he could hear.

"I've only ever heard rumours about his fate," Hwang continued, keeping his voice low so no one could eavesdrop. "With Manchukuo's disappearance it's easy enough to posit that his handlers fled with him in secret, only for him to perish once the Soviets arrived and that part of your country was liberated, but there's so many conflicting stories about the Republic of China, and nothing credible about what befell him. Did he dissolve in obscurity, or did you truly execute him?"

"According to my Nationalists, he's alive and well in Taiwan," Mao Zhilong said, examining his nails (even though he was wearin' gloves).

"Everyone knows they simply slapped a new flag on the Taiwanese Provincehuman," Hwang replied. "Your revolution was entirely successful. There isn't any way another Chinese Countryhuman could survive."

Mao Zhilong spun his knife around his finger again. "I am the only Chinese Countryhuman."

"So he did perish?"

"And I've always been the only Chinese Countryhuman."

"That isn't true." Hwang sounded a li'l frustrated. "There were several during your civil war."

"Puppets and pretenders," Mao Zhilong dismissed. "No more worthy of the mantle of China than the Republic."

Hwang pursed his lips. "I've heard there's a possibility that he killed himself a few years before the war, and that's what helped plunge your country into chaos. Can you at least confirm or deny that?"

"Aiya, an interview? And I'm not wearing my best suit." He was still spinning the knife 'round and 'round. "How am I supposed to know whether or not some lazy little cousin killed himself? You'll recall I don't exactly get along well with the people who claim to support him."

"Not entirely true," Hwang countered. "I've heard that many of your Nationalists supported you during the war, and even believed you were one of them."

"You believe everything you hear? And I thought you were supposed to be your Countryhuman's intelligent province."

"Hwang is intelligent," Hae chimed in, eyes trackin' the knifepoint as it flashed by.

"Then you would think he was smart enough not to put any stock in rumours," Mao Zhilong replied. "After all, I heard rumours that the Korean Countryhuman supported his own Nationalists over your Communists, or even that he approved of Japan."

Hwang's brow crinkled. "Those who heard about the South being in the possession of the Provisional Government likely, or saw that news article featuring him and Japan, but not ours after. Regardless, those did have a seed of truth."

"Most don't sprout."

Hwang frowned at him for a second, then asked, "Do you actually not know?"

Ohh. Maybe Mao Zhilong didn't know, and that was why he was being all dodgy, so he wouldn't have to admit it, like Korea sometimes did.

"If you ask me, there never was a 'Republic of China,'" Mao Zhilong said idly. "Only a crumbling nation and a bunch of old fools that wanted everything in the world but change."

"There had to be a Republic of China," Hwang denied. "Every land with people on it has a representation. Even the soviets in your country that wished to represent it. Ah, while we're on the subject, I've been meaning to ask- which 'China' were you? The Jiangxi Soviet?"

Hae blinked as the spinning knife in Mao Zhilong's hand abruptly stopped, now pointed an inch from Hwang's face, held in the Chinese country's hand.

"The People's." Mao Zhilong still sounded friendly, but the eyes Hae saw under his scarf didn't look it.

Hwang must have seen, too, 'cuz he quickly said, "Of course. My apologies for prying into your internal affairs."

The knife disappeared down Mao Zhilong's sleeve again.

"No apologies necessary," he said, waving his hand like he didn't care. "There's nothing wrong with curiosity. I just don't like answering questions on an empty stomach. Maybe if you treat me to some pork belly after this war is over, I'll tell you what you want to know."

Hwang's eyes lit up. "Truly?"

Mao Zhilong's eyes squinted up. "I promise."

"Can ah come?" Hae asked, droolin' at the thought of pork belly.

"Sorry, Little Tiger, I only do my interviews one on one. You would have to treat me to your own meal."

"Ah don't think Korea would like that." She couldn't see him letting a foreign country eat at one of their restaurants. CCCP always brought his own food.

"That's a shame," Mao Zhilong sighed. "And here I was thinking it could be in exchange for all those candies I've given you. Since you were so worried about me bribing you before."

Wait! If Hae took him out to dinner, that could make up for the first candy he'd given her. That way it wasn't a bribe, it was just two people tradin' each other something. Or... would that be her bribing Mao Zhilong?

No, it couldn't be, 'cuz she didn't want anything from him. She'd just be paying him back for the candy, and then she wouldn't have been bribed anymore, and she could actually like him!

"Okay," she happily agreed. "Ah'll ask Korea."

But she stopped her legs before they could stand up.

They'd agreed not to talk about being hungry around him anymore, and if she brought up takin' Mao Zhilong out, he might think it was because she was thinking about food. She'd ask once the war was over, and their food situation was back to normal.

'Not normal- better than ever.' Meat three times a day, like Korea had promised.

"What kind'a food do you like?" Hae asked Mao Zhilong. She'd never seen him eat anything but the rice rations, fried potato powder, and the delicious soup Korea had made, plus some of the canned things CCCP had given him, too. Oh! And the meal at his birthday party last year.

"Surprise me," he said, and Hae might have thought there was something cat-like in the satisfied curve of his mouth, but he was wearing the mask, and she was already dreamin' about fragrant jokbal and roasted goldongbap and pyeonsu bursting with pork and vegetables an'-

She sucked all her saliva back after Mao Zhilong wandered off to flirt with Jung-hi and Ryong-jin, and Hwang exhaled, pinchin' where his nose should be.

"Are ya feelin' alright?" she asked.

He'd pulled out the short course draft to look over, and startled a bit at her voice. "Yes. Why do you ask?"

"'Cuz you stayed up all last night to work, and you usually only do that if you're worried about somethin'." The shadows under his eyes had faded since morning, but they were still a li'l bruised.

"Not true," he denied. "You know I like to finish projects as expediently as possible. Quickly."

"Ah knew that one. You use it a lot," Hae said, then shook her head. "Ayuh, but that's when you can finish the project. We're collaboratin' with the rest of our comrades for the winter courses, and we're still waitin' on more surveys an' stuff so we know what needs to be taught. You can't finish it, but you were still lookin' at it when ah went to sleep last night. And you're lookin' now. That means you're worried."

"Proving once again you have far clearer eyes than me," Hwang sighed. "I'm fine. I was simply... trying not to mull over yesterday."

Hae nodded, still not pryin'. "Ah'm here for you, Hwang. Even if ah don't know what for."

He smiled tiredly. "Thank you, Hae. And I'm here for you."

She wiggled happily at that. "So you're really okay? Ah mean, not okay. But not worried?"

"It was just that," he assured her. "And..." He gestured at his body, and the pain that had been ripplin' through both of them for hours.

Hae nodded in understanding. "Good. You don't need to be worried about the war or anythin'. Ah told you Korea says we're still goin' to win, so we just got to keep our heads up until then."

She smiled at him, tryin' to make him feel better. He gave her a tiny smile back, reaching over to hold her shoulder, gazing down at the short-term course pages shivering in his other hand.

Their heads jerked over as a loud cry split the air, and one of the kids started to bawl. Jumping up, Hwang stuffed his papers back in his pack, and Hae hurried over to the riverside, where one of the younger kids was sitting in the dirt, wailing with his head thrown back.

"What's wrong?" Hae asked, squattin' down next to him.

"J-Ji-won s-splashed me," he sobbed, tugging on his wet shirt. "I told him not to, but he did anyway! I just got dry and now I'm all wet again, and I'm gonna have to s-sleep in 'em."

"Don't be such a crybaby, Dong-il," the other boy scolded, sloshing over from the river, shaking himself like a dog as he jumped out. "You got like, a drop on you."

Dong-il stopped crying for a second, looking down at his soakin' wet shirt, then back up at Ji-won, before bursting into tears again.

"That's a bit more than a drop," Hwang said politely. "I don't think it can be denied that splashing him was intentional."

Ji-won wilted like a plant in the sun at being chided by an adult.

Hae didn't want him to feel ganged-up on, so she told him, "Don't worry, no one's mad at you."

"I am!" Dong-il cried tearily. "I hate you!"

"Oi," Hae scolded him. "No you don't. Good kids don't tell comrades they hate them. What if somethin' happened to Ji-won tomorrow? Wouldn't you be upset you told him that?"

Dong-il looked down, sniffling, and she looked over at the other boy.

"And good kids also don't splash their comrades when they don't want to get wet. Wouldn't you be upset if somethin' happened to Dong-il, and the last thing you did was make him sad?"

He hung his head.

"Exactly." Hae crossed her arms over her knees. "You never know what could happen. We've all got to stick together an' get along."

She was glad the last thing she'd said to Gang before he got stolen was thanking him for taking care of her, and that she loved him. And that she'd told all her other southern cousins to fight hard and that she'd see them again soon. Except for Chungnam, but she wasn't supposed to think about that.

"And this is a trivial matter," Hwang said, pushing up his glasses. "Comrades Ri Jung-hi and Oh Ryong-jin did your laundry earlier, and it's had plenty of time to dry by now. You'll be able to wear dry clothes to sleep, Dong-il."

"Oh," he sniffed, lookin' embarrassed as he plucked at the dark water stains on his shirt.

"But that doesn't mean he overreacted," Hae added. "It's not fun when someone does somethin' to you you don't want 'em to do."

She knew that real well, even if getting splashed with a li'l water really wasn't that bad.

Ji-won rubbed his arm, all sheepish, while Dong-il fidgeted.

Hae looked at Hwang to tell him 'Let 'em say it on their own,' but he'd looked at her at the same time, sayin' the same thing. Both their eyes squinched.

"...I'm sorry, Dong-il," Ji-won muttered after a moment. "I shouldn't have splashed you."

Dong-il wiped his eyes. "It's okay," he mumbled back. "I'm sorry, too. I don't actually hate you."

"Will you still play with me tomorrow?"

"Yeah, I just didn't want to get wet again today."

Ji-won's face lit up, and Hwang said, "If you still want to play in the water, you could go play with Myong-ho. He's a little older, but I'm sure he wouldn't mind."

Ji-won looked over to where the other boy was digging in the silt for loaches. But first he came over, holding a burnt hand out to Dong-il.

"Do you want to come, too? I won't splash you again."

The boy eyed him warily. "Promise?"

"Promise."

He brightened, chirpin', "Okay!" as he let the taller boy pull him up.

Hwang raised a brow at Hae. She pouted. He raised his other brow.

It was so unfair she couldn't do that.

Not reluctantly at all, she reached into her pocket and pulled out the milk candy Mao Zhilong had given her.

"Take this," she told the boys. "And make sure you share it."

Their eyes went even wider than they had at the fruit, promising they would as they snatched it and ran away, gigglin' with excitement.

Hae popped up, relieved it'd just been a tiny issue. She hated when kids cried. Well, she hated when anyone cried, but she really hated when kids cried.

"It's good they can still smile," she chirped, looking around at the rest of the kids. "All of 'em."

"Yes," Hwang said, his eyes all soft as he looked at her. "It is."

Even with all the burns and how scrawny they were, they could still run around and play like kids should. 'Merica and the Southern One hadn't been able to take that from them, not even from Hye-mi.

But she couldn't forget that some children couldn't. There was an entire hospital in this city alone full of kids that could never be kids again. And that had to make her furious.

Hae breathed in, then grinned up at her brother.

"Hae an' Hwang victorious again," she sing-songed to him, bumpin' his shoulder.

"Indeed." He nudged her back. "But it's 'Hwang and Hae.'"

"Nope!"

"That is quite literally the name of our province."

Hae pouted up at him until he sighed.

"Hae and Hwang are victorious again," he conceded.

Hae grinned, looking over at Korea by instinct. He was still there, lurkin' as the golden light grew richer and the shadows around him got deeper. Unlike her, it really was hard to tell where he was looking sometimes. But right now she could tell he was watching them.

She knew all of her Countryhuman's expressions better than she knew her own, all the tiny li'l movements he used to talk to them silently, that other language she hadn't even realized she'd been learning alongside Korean. The way the groove between his eyebrows would deepen like a field furrow bein' gone over with a tiller, or his eye would subtly widen or tense at the corners. His twitchy jaw and how his thin lips would curve slightly at one edge like they were being tugged by invisible string, usually down, but sometimes, with a rarity that made it even more elating to Hae when it happened, up. She could picture his face perfectly even with her eyes closed, and had often when she'd been in Sincheon or locked up in the POW camp, and in the hospital as she felt the life draining out of her. She knew every combination of his features he could make, even if it had taken until Liberation to see that final one.

Except for tears. She'd never seen those, and knew she never would.

But even if she knew how all his expressions looked, she didn't always know what they meant when he didn't want her to. That would make her sad, if she didn't think no one did, maybe not even the General. And she didn't want to think about the person that might. Korea was always thinkin' and feelin', so even if he looked at something one way, it might be because he was thinking about something else. Hae knew he felt a lot of things all mixed up together, so sometimes it was hard to pick out which of those feelings were on his face.

But she could tell which one it was right now.

"Hwang." She looked over at her brother. "Ah think we should tell Korea we want to be our own provinces."

"We already-"

"Now."

He blinked in shock. "Right now? But we haven't finished the short-term course outline."

She knew that was part of the reason he'd been staying up so late to work on it. He was worried like her, maybe even more, 'cuz she at least knew Korea made the right decision ninety percent of the time.

"Right now," she confirmed.

"B-But- Right here? With the children, after he visited- Hae, I don't think-"

"No more waitin'!" Mind made up, Hae seized her brother's hand, pulling him with her as she forged across the riverbank, past where the kids were still trying to figure out Mao Zhilong's magic tricks.

"Good hunting, Little Tiger," he called, not looking up, like he'd heard everythin' they said, even though he'd been a good ten metres away.

Hae ignored him, focused on her goal with single-minded determination now that she'd decided it was time, marching right up to Korea, only letting go of Hwang to plant her hands on her hips. Her Countryhuman eyed her.

"What?" he asked, all tense.

"Korea," she announced, puffin' her chest up and making sure she was using her imperative speech. "We want you to make us our own provinces."

His shoulders relaxed a bit, but he just stared at her, like he was waiting for her to say more.

Hae... hadn't really planned anything more to say. She'd kind'a just been hopin' he'd say 'yes' right away, and then she could throw herself at him.

"Um..." She wiggled her shoulders, but then put them back again, lifting her chin.

"Ah know you said by mergin', we'd just be becomin' who we were supposed to be. But..." She reached over to take her brother's hand again, and met her country's eye. "Ah don't want to be Hwanghae. Even if I'm supposed ta be. Ah just want to be Hae."

Hae, who her cousins saved the last bite of their meals for, whose back SH always washed, who their people looked up to and loved, and who he let sleep in his bed. The Hae he'd let hug him for longer than five seconds without fighting one day. Her people's Comrade General, her country's province, and her brother's sister. Her Korea's South Hwanghae.

Korea stared into her for a long moment, as her pulse galloped like a colt and Hwang squeezed her hand in his.

Then his eye flickered, and he broke contact.

"Fine."

Hae's heart leapt, but Hwang, unable to hold himself back anymore, burst out, "Korea, please reconsider. We've already been cemented in our people's minds as North and South Hwanghae, to combine us now might alienate us from them. Not that I think merging us would be inherently alienating, of course, I just mean for us since our people are well-acquainted with the both of us, and Hae has had sensitive stories shared with her by women that might not appreciate a man knowing, if we even become a- Anyway, I also I have a rapport with many religious figures in our province that she simply doesn't have, and when you consider that Hwanghae Christians have been a major reactionary base-"

"North Hwanghae."

"-I think keeping me as is to serve as an in with them, and keeping Hae as she is since she's so close to our peasantry would be wise. Post-war rebuilding will be delicate as is. We've spent years entwining our roots with those of our people, to change their representatives now could weaken them, and waylay our efforts. Of course, we wouldn't actually be changing, but those who know us personally might not feel that way. Ah, but I'm sure that wouldn't be the case for-"

"North Hwanghae."

"Anyway, I think we're simply too useful as two people to combine into one when you consider how much we're both capable of getting done, Hae with her fieldwork and me with my writing and incul- teaching. We're much too-"

"HWANG." Hae let go of his hand to grab his shoulders. "He said yes!"

Her brother blinked at her. "What?"

"Korea said we can be our own provinces!"

Hwang looked over at Korea, who nodded, expressionless.

"Just like that?" he asked, sounding disappointed for some reason.

"I made the decision before the war," Korea said. "I've already spoken to the General about it."

Hae tipped her head. "But ah asked you just before the war, and you said you'd think about it."

"I already had."

Hwang's mouth opened as he blinked rapidly at him. "And you didn't think to tell us? You would've saved us some stress!"

"You shouldn't have been stressed about unifying in the first place," Korea answered flatly. "And I didn't need to. Your new administrative zones were going to be set up by the next year anyway." He grimaced a li'l. "And now it will be when the war is over."

"Next year!" Hae threw her fist in the air, heart soarin' as she realized it would be so soon.

Korea's expression didn't change. "And South Hwanghae annoyed me by pestering."

"And you're sure it's that easy?" Hwang asked, rummaging in his pocket, pulling out a paper covered in his chicken scratch draft handwriting. "I wrote a persuasive essay to convince you."

"I don't need it," Korea said bluntly.

Hwang looked hopefully between him and the essay. "...May I read it to you anyway?"

"No."

He sagged.

"Hwang, who cares about the essay?!" Hae cried, shakin' him violently back an' forth. "We get to be our own provinces!"

He paused, then the eyes behind his glasses lit up, like he finally realized what they'd been saying.

Jeez, for such a smart guy, her brother could be a li'l dense sometimes.

"We get to be our own provinces," he repeated, amazed, and Hae nodded so hard they were both vibrating as it sank in for her, too.

A li'l laugh of amazement left Hwang's lips, and Hae beamed, laughin' with him as she yanked him into a hug, and even though she was crushin' his ribs again, he didn't protest, just hugged her back, pressing her into him like he was trying to merge with her even now that they'd been told they didn't have to.

But Hae knew there was no danger of that now, so she hugged him back just as tight, tighter, anchorin' herself to his bony shoulder blades.

He was never going to slip away from her now. She'd never be left huggin' herself and pretending she was hugging the piece of him inside her. He would never have to do that either, or wake up alone in the dark in the root cellar he was staying in, with no one to ask if he was okay.

"We get to be siblin's forever now." Hae's words were muffled by her brother's chest, but his were clear.

"And we get to be ourselves."

All Hae could see was uniform, but she could feel Korea's eye on them.

"We still would'a been ourselves," she mumbled "We just would've been each other, too."

She just didn't want to be.

"Enough with the theatrics," Korea grumbled from next to them. "People are watching."

Hae pulled away from Hwang, only to launch herself at him next.

"Thank ya, Korea! Thankyathankyathankyathank-!"

"Get off before I change my mind!" he barked, shoving her away.

Hae went, grinnin'. "Thank ya!"

"Truly, Korea." Hwang placed one hand on her shoulder and the other on his chest. "Thank you."

"Don't thank me," their Countryhuman muttered, tugging his collar up. "It's just the pragmatic decision. I've already considered everything you said, and splitting Hwanghae into smaller zones will make economic planning easier." His eye flicked away. "And the use-value of the both of you is too high to risk degrading."

Hae smiled so wide it hurt as she threw herself at him again. His scent had been swallowed up by the burnt-meat smell, but that didn't stop her from burying her face in his chest to listen to his heart. It was her arms wrapped around him, and always would be. And it always had to be his heart pounding.

He didn't respond to the words she spoke into him, but he never did, so that was okay. She didn't need a response to know he felt the same.

He struggled, but couldn't push her off right away. She got a full five seconds before he managed to.

"Off!" he hissed, bristlin' as he looked over at the others. "You got what you wanted, now stop embarrassing yourselves and get out of here."

But Hae didn't go right away. Instead she clasped her hands at her waist and took a deep breath, tasting the country air, the slight tang of chemicals and smoke that lingered in it, and the smell of burning flesh that wafted from her bandages. The laughter of the children, bright and clear despite their burns, rang over the shore.

"Korea, when you draw up the border... can ah have Sincheon?"

Hwang looked at her in surprise. "Are you sure-?"

"Ayuh." Hae moved her hands up to her heart. "It's mine. Ah want to keep it."

Ra Hye-in, Kim Moon-sik, Choe Kwang-seok, Un Ji-ha, Jung Jae-soon and Min Pong-su, Oh Hyang-gol and his missing li'l girl, Dan Yeon-hwa, Yang Jeong-nyeo and Ko Kuil-hwa and their children, and all the rest, dead and alive. Their stories were all hers, all their grief and rage and pain an' love. They were all hers. All South Hwanghae's.

And South Hwanghae wanted to be theirs. She wanted to make them happy again, to make Sincheon a place where people could laugh and kids could play without fear, even if they could never forget what had been done to them.

She knew that look in Korea's eye, too. The way the corners softened just a li'l, not enough for most people to notice. But she did.

"Yes," he said, a li'l less flat as he braced his hands behind his back. "You can have Sincheon."

Hae solemnly dipped her head. "Thank you, Korea."

He dipped his back, before returning to sounding gruff.

"Now go. You're drawing eyes."

Hae shot up, salutin'. "Ayuh, Comrade General!"

She took a few steps away, then looked back at him.

"What?" he demanded.

She couldn't ask him. She already knew what he'd say, anyway. Korea had got to make the right decision with her and Hwang. But that didn't mean he could magically start making all right decisions. Magic wasn't real, and some of the wrong decisions were still necessary, and probably always would be.

She guessed some of them weren't even really decisions at all.

So instead she said, "You won't regret this, Korea. Ah'll be the best South Hwanghae ever for you!"

"You're the only South Hwanghae," he called as she skipped away.

And he was the only Korea. He always would be. He'd always be hers, no matter what.

So she'd be satisfied that he was right ninety-nine percent of the time, and that even if she couldn't tell what all of his expressions meant, she would always be confident about the most important one, the one he'd been looking at her an' Hwang with as they helped the kids. Even if there was a shadow over it, even if she thought he would've broken her hug sooner if he could've...

Hae knew what love looked like.

—

Thrumming with triumphant elation at their future division (and slight disappointment that he'd wasted paper on his essay draft), Hwang went to follow his sister.

But he hesitated. He'd seen that look on her face. She hadn't been speaking their facial language, but Hae had truly never been the subtle sort.

That question she'd asked him at Songnim burned in his mind. She may not be thinking of the possibilities the rest of them had discussed at the secret votes, but he still was.

He knew it was dangerous to ask at all, especially when Korea had just returned from the hospital, and when he already knew the answer. But...

They didn't know what could happen. But he did know what would happen to Korea if he ever got in a situation like he and his cousins had discussed. It may be safer if he at least planted the idea. Maybe he should think about it.

And he wanted to know. Call it intellectual curiosity.

He drew in a deep breath, then asked, "Korea. Do you ever think about... not Reunifying?"

His Countryhuman's reply came frigid. "No. Our country cannot remain Divided."

That wasn't what he'd meant. But judging by Korea's lack of outrage at being asked, Hwang knew he was aware of that, just as he had been when Hae asked him the same thing.

He dipped his head. "Of course. And... thank you again, Korea. I know..." He cleared his throat, pushing his glasses higher. "Thank you."

He felt lighter than he had in months. It felt good to know with certainty that one day he would be able to tell Hae about Choi Jung-nam, that they could sit down with Choi Yoshi and toast to his memory, and he would never have to dread the day he had to reintroduce himself to his former student, or when there would be an empty space on his futon while he typed at his typewriter in silence.

His Countryhuman didn't answer, turning away.

It still felt like a small betrayal, feeling this happy that he and his sister would never have to unify. But he was glad for it, and glad that Korea hadn't let his own situation influence his decision when they were entirely different.

For North and South Hwanghae, at least, the only change that came to who they were would be from their own efforts. There would never come a day when there was one less cushion around their family table.

Even if Korea could never imagine 'himself' sitting at it.

What if I told you this mini-arc just became four chapters.

Also Hwang still had the draft for his persuasive essay because while he finished his first draft immediately after him and Hae agreed to ask North to be their own provinces, he wanted to keep perfecting it right up until the last moment. The plan was to write the final draft the day before they told him. But he didn't want to waste paper, so he was just editing the draft on one piece. Which means even if North had let him read it, he wouldn't have been able to.

In the hole, Hae's guards actually had orders to feed her three times a day, but most of them grew tired of that quickly, and some of them actively enjoyed starving her as we know. You know, super loyal to Japan-sama, they'll do anything he tells them to. But only if it's killing people or exercising their authority, not if it's consistently feeding a little girl trapped in a root cellar. Eyebrows always fed her three meals a day, and wasn't aware some of the others were starving her when he first got the job, until he realized Hae was way too weak. He protested to his superior, who assured him they would tell Japan. He didn't. When he pushed back against Big Nose specifically, he made it clear that continuing to do so would end with him being released from the position. And it was not the sort of job you were released gently from, or your family. So In the future, Eyebrows could only make sure she was fed during the weeks he was there, and if whoever was on watch with him told him not to feed her, he didn't argue out of fear for his family. He'd have to wait until they were resting, and just try to make more than usual, which is a big part of the guilt that grew up inside him, especially after his daughter was born

Meant To Be

North watched Hae and Hwang settle in with the kids again as China showed off his sleight of hand. They sat next to him, grabbing at his sleeves after he pulled a live frog out of one, the female Hwanghae exclaiming loudly as she tried to shove her entire head into it to find out where the creature came from, giggling as she was batted away.

He shouldn't have decided to divide them. He should have forced them together, should have-

But he couldn't take the decision back now. His General would just talk him out of it if he tried. And he... It just made sense. Hwanghae needed to be cut into smaller administrative zones, just like South Hamgyong would be. There wasn't any point in unifying them just to sever them again. He didn't want to risk leaving his provinces with the same ache he had, worse than the one he'd used to share with them. It would get in the way of their work.

And he refused to let one of them fade away.

He grit his teeth. 'Fucking North Hwanghae.'

It wasn't like he was blind to the way they looked at him when he mentioned his brother, or what they had been trying to do at their criticism session after he won them back. And he would have to be deaf not to hear the constant harping about the southern army being South's army when it wasn't. He had expected one of them to get stupid enough to bring it up directly to his face, but he'd thought it would be North Hamgyong.

He knew some of his provinces didn't like his brother right now. But that didn't give North Hwanghae any right to suggest jeopardizing the future of their country when they didn't know what would happen if-

Korea was meant to be one, he knew they all knew that. Their country had been a unified state for over a thousand years, and not a single one of his provinces, north or south, would accept anything other than the total restoration of that, he knew it.

So why did they think they had any right to imply that the Korean Countryhumans shouldn't be one? Why did they think they had any right to slander half of their country behind his back, or threaten him, or want to see him dead like In-su did when South was half of their country? Just because he had Commanded them, just because he'd kept them in the POW camp? He hadn't had any say in that, America had made him. The foreign country was the one that made him send South Hamgyong after North Hamgyong, he was the one that ran the camps and taunted them in their imprisonment. South had let Kangwon out to visit, given him yakgwa, he'd let North Pyongan go in the woods and brought South Pyongan her brother's hat, and he'd given Hae a scarf to keep her warm and food to share with their people. Outside of what America had made him do to them, he had been nothing but kind.

'He had to Command me?'

Didn't he? Yes, he could have just pretended to use the Commands over the radio and avoided imprisoning the provinces in the first place, but South wasn't brave enough to try that. And if he hadn't, America would have punished him for it. It didn't matter if it would have impacted his claim that he was here on a 'police action' when he would just lie to the world about it like he lied about everything else. And South wouldn't come forward to tell the truth because he was a coward that didn't want to get hurt again, like he always had been.

'Can we please not do that again?'

South Hamgyong had no right to be pissed that his brother had used the Commands on her. He was her country, he had the right, just like North did. He just... He saw no use for it.

And South hadn't meant for her to end up wounded. He hadn't been there during their guerrilla days, he hadn't known that North Hamgyong was capable of shooting his own sister because he knew his brother would never be able to hurt him. And he hadn't Commanded her to hurt the comrades that got in her way, he probably just hadn't thought about what 'stopping them' would lead to. South... didn't think about things like that.

Fingers gripping his jaw. 'So let them.'

It wasn't an excuse, he knew that. Even if South had to Command them, he still shouldn't have. He really... North had really thought he wouldn't. After twenty-six years with his will stripped away and held in Japan's hands, he hadn't thought his brother could ever even think about doing it to their own provinces, and far more thoroughly. At least with Japan, they had had the choice of disobeying, even if South never had.

It wasn't an excuse, but it was his business. He would talk to South after- after the war was over, he would make sure he knew why what he had done was wrong. He would ask him why he had. But that was his job, he was North's brother. And he was the other half of the provinces' country, and they had no right to want him not to be just because he had done things the other half of it never would have. He wasn't North.

But he would be. And North would be him. The Hwanghaes had the luxury to deny becoming who they were meant to be, but Korea didn't. And he didn't want it. He just wanted to be Reunified, to be one, to be- He just wanted their country to be whole again, the way they were meant to be. And he wanted his brother back, and he wanted their provinces to love him because he deserved it. He knew they would like him more if they just gave him a chance. He was the one that had wanted to meet them so badly, he was the one that wanted them to be able to attend banquets and court dances together, to be a family. North had never wanted any of that. He just wanted them all to be free.

He was the one that had failed them, he was the one they should hate. If he had just won two years ago like he said he would, America never would have had the chance to force South to do those things. If he had even just knocked South out and dragged him back across the Raktong, damn what he wanted, this never would have happened. His brother could gripe about it, but North would just remind him that a lump on the head was nothing compared to having your ruined eye scooped out of its fucking socket. America would have just used it to keep the war going, but it was still going anyway. At least South would be safe, and the provinces wouldn't have it out for him like they did now.

And they didn't even know the full extent of what he had done.

North's jaw creaked, his hackles raising.

Was that what China had been telling them as they sat over there whispering and sneaking glances at him? Had he been telling them about that message, about Seoul? Was that why Hwang had dared to ask him that now? Was the foreigner trying to turn them against the other half of their country even more, to finish what America had started? Did he think it was safer having a neighbour he knew, or was he worried that becoming Korea would take North's weakness away and make him a more difficult enemy if they ever stopped walking the same path? Or was he trying to turn his provinces against him because if they knew what South had done to their people, but that North still-

Everyone was looking at him, the eyes of the children on the riverbank and the washerwomen across it fixed on him, along with the provinces' and China's, gazes burning with accusation.

They knew. They knew what South had done, China had told them and now they hated his brother, too, hated him even more. They wanted to hurt him, to take him away from North, and they couldn't understand why none of them should ever want that.

'Because he's the other half of your country!' North wanted to scream at them. 'He's the other half of your country and it's not his fault!'

But his jaw was locked shut as the agony of Hwanghae pounded through his body. Hae's mouth had split open when she smiled, blood dotting the bandages on her cheeks, and he could feel his own splitting now, bursting open on his sides and soaking his drabs black. The disfigured children watched him with the same pity his province had earlier, thinking he was weak, that he couldn't handle a fucking hospital visit to kids he had been supposed to save or another damn bombing, watching the blood spread and knowing that he couldn't keep them-

"If I didn't know better, I'd say you were the one who clawed out your own eye."

North's neck snapped over so fast it cracked, his nails raking his face as he yanked his hand out from under his eyepatch, going for his hip.

"Ah ah," China *'tsk'*ed, stepping into the alley with him. The Korean somehow hadn't noticed him approaching head on, even though he had been looking. "Don't make me reset the 'days since I've had a gun pointed at me by a comrade' counter."

North balled his fist, heart pounding as he shot a look back at the children. They were saying goodbye to the ones from town as the final few trickled away. None of them were looking.

But he knew they had been. Even if they didn't know about South, they had been watching him, judging him for his outburst earlier, waiting on another, because he was an idiot who couldn't just-

'Ssi-bal.'

"I look forward to attending United Nations meetings with you in the future," China said, not leaving, even though North was making it very clear with his face that he didn't want to talk. "I assume you'll stand in the shadows and watch everyone menacingly there, too. It will make for nice set dressing."

"I'm not being menacing," North muttered, subtly checking his uniform. He hadn't bled through after all. "I'm just standing here."

"Those children would really like to spend more time with their Countryhuman," China told him, like Hae had. "But they're worried you're still angry. On account of the menacing stance."

North looked away.

He shouldn't have lost his temper. But how could he not when that boy said he would kill South for him, like that was something he would ever want? How many other children felt the same way?

How many of them heard 'southern soldiers' or 'southern government' and thought that meant South? How many of his soldiers did, or their guerrillas behind enemy lines? What if one of them thought South was complicit, and that North would want them to remove him? They would risk their lives and end up killed for something he could never want.

And they might hurt his brother before they did, like Hwang wanted to take him away from North just because he had locked his sister up.

If they blamed South, if they hated him, then what if after they Reunified, they-

"We're walking them back to the orphanage soon," North muttered. "They can talk to me then."

That wasn't any excuse for what he had done. In-su was a child who hadn't even understood what he was saying. He had almost brought an injured orphan boy to tears because he still couldn't get control of himself.

'Your emotions aren't the curse you see them as.'

They felt like it, more often than not.

The last group of town kids edged towards them, and North stepped aside to let them pass through the alleyway. They hustled over, stopping in front of him to bow with utter solemnity.

His skin prickled, but he forced his hackles to smooth. It was just a parting bow. They would give the same one to their teachers or grandparents.

"Get home safe," he ordered them. "Don't stay out too late."

One of the boys popped up, eyes glowing like sparks as he grinned.

"We won't, Comrade Korea!"

The group scurried off down the alleyway, giggling excitedly and glancing back, all their hard-fought-for dignity gone.

They could have left through any of the dozens of alleys between this stretch of chosonjips. They'd clearly only chosen this one to pass by him.

"Scurrilous little creatures, aren't they?" China remarked. "How was your hospital visit, by the way?"

North's teeth ached as he saw the barrage of hospital beds again, skin in shades of ash-white and burnt black, melted and crackling like his, but not capable of healing. Tiny malformed limbs fused to sides that fought to rise and fall as tiny mouths gasped for air in faces that wouldn't move. And eyes, so many eyes, never to open, never to shut, never to see. Either filled with so much agony that he'd had to stop himself from reaching for their pillows or with that light that was almost worse. The way they had lit up as his flag appeared in their rooms, like he could do anything to fix them, and the way they must have dimmed when he walked out, and they remained ruined.

"Bad," he answered China, quieter than he'd meant to.

"I would've been happy to come with you."

North's jaw feathered, though his comrade didn't say it in the same way Hae had. It wouldn't have mattered as much if he did. It would be annoying for a different reason.

"They are Korea's children. It was Korea's duty."

"It should be every country's duty to look after all the children of the world," China answered, watching In-su and the others yawn sleepily as Hae and Hwang herded them up for their minders.

For a moment, the eyes the fading light revealed under his scarf looked sad. North's fist flexed, wondering if he was feeling that small hand gripping his, too.

"I trust you got my present at least," his comrade said, slightly lighter.

"Yes." North's pockets were empty now, almost all of the milk candies that had been slipped in there at some point without him noticing handed out. Many of the children hadn't been capable of chewing the solid candy, but the ones that were had been overjoyed to receive it.

He opened his mouth, then looked away.

"The kids were thankful for it."

China smiled. "I'm glad."

North exhaled, then made his way over to the orphans. They all turned to look at him, just as wide-eyed as earlier. But he knew they still had to be wary about him snapping again.

"Comrade Korea, look what Big Brother gave me!"

North blinked as a frog was thrust in his face by one of the girls. Its bulbous yellow eyes stared at him, glistening sides swelling in indignation at the stubby fingers wrapped tightly around them. He blinked. It blinked back.

"You can't keep that."

"But he's my friend!" the girl- Su-jin- protested, stroking the animal's rubbery head.

"And you can play with him tomorrow," Hae cut in. "But he's got a family to go home to. You don't want his mom an' dad to miss him, do you?"

Su-jin looked down at the frog, her face falling. "No," she said quietly, trundling over to the river to set it down gently on the edge. "Bye-bye, Mister Frog. Give your parents a big hug."

North cast a look back at China, who pretended he didn't see it.

"Come on," he said to the children. "Comrades North and South Hwanghae and I will accompany you all back to the orphanage."

He tried not to see the expressions that bloomed on his provinces' faces as he said their names. They shouldn't be happy to know they would be becoming official. He didn't understand how they could be.

"I'll get there first!" In-su announced, taking off immediately.

"No, I will!" a boy yelled, charging after him.

"Children, don't run! Stay together!" Oh Ryong-jin called as she hustled after them, her skirt held up in her hands.

North shook his head, going to follow them.

"Um, Comrade Korea." A shy voice stopped him, and he looked down to see the boy from earlier, Myong-ho.

His jaw tightened.

"Did you see my brother?" he asked hopefully.

"Yes," North answered after a moment.

"Did you tell him I miss him?"

"Yes." He hadn't heard it. The doctors said he would never be able to.

"And is he...?" Myong-ho trailed off, unable to finish.

North couldn't lie. He couldn't give him hope that his brother would be who he had been ever again when he knew he couldn't.

Instead he said, "When Min-ho gets out of the hospital, you're going to need to look out for him."

Myong-ho's bottom lip trembled, but he nodded seriously. "I will. We always look out for each other."

Pain lanced through North, followed by more of the bombs. Wordlessly, he led the younger brother after the others.

The nearby orphanage was a cluster of chosonjips behind a stone wall, a family estate seized from landlords when the Agrarian Reform came to Kaesong, repurposed to keep Korea's children safe. The original building was also still in use, but the city had too many orphans for it to serve alone.

The windows were all dark, except for a candle flickering from one.

The children stumbled through the gates on tired legs, yawns engulfing their faces. It wasn't that late yet, and the sun was still lingering beyond the western hills, but for young kids that had spent the day playing, it was time for bed. The excitement at seeing their Provincehumans and Countryhuman that had been buzzing in them all day was wearing off, leaving them to crash. North was more than familiar with that from all the villages they had visited, both before and after Liberation.

Hae carried in a young boy on her back, even though North knew it had to be aggravating her burns.

What had that pause been earlier, when he had asked if Hwanghae was being bombed? Had she been going to lie, to try and hide it from him? Did she think he couldn't handle it, that he needed her to fucking shelter him, like Hwang had done by not telling him what was happening with her in Sincheon?

The idea made his chest tighten with that hot, uncomfortable feeling, and his stomach churn.

It was good that she was finally becoming less blindly obedient, he tried to remind himself. He was proud that she had been able to stand in front of him and demand they be made their own provinces, instead of just accepting his vague answer of 'I'll think about it' without pushing. But between her stunt with Kangwon in the hospital, keeping that cat, and that pause...

Hae was the one province he could trust not to lie to him. She had her loopholes, but if he pressed, she would always cave. She knew he could handle whatever she had to say, she told him everything because she knew he was strong enough to deal with it. If she started lying to him now...

North tore his eye away as she woke the boy up, setting him on his feet.

She hadn't lied. She had told him, that was all that mattered. She still believed in him.

"Comrades," he said to the children when they were all inside the walls. "I came here today to make sure you were all recovering well from what the enemy, what America, has done to you."

He couldn't help the inflection, or noticing thay In-su flinched at it.

"And I'm glad to see that you are," he continued, hiding the shame in his voice as he scanned them, burnt faces and marred flesh, but bright, clear eyes. "It heartens me to see that the enemy has failed to make you live in fear."

He made sure to look the girl Hae had presented him with in the face as he said it, catching her eye from behind the curtain of black hair.

"You are all resilient, brave, and bright," he said. "Everything that Korean sons and daughters should be. The children of a country are its future. And after today, I am very hopeful for ours."

His thoughts went to the children in the south, left homeless by the culling of their parents, or buried with them, the living ones forced to scrape by, surrounded by foreign invaders and Rhee's butcher police. He tried to rein them in.

"And I promise," he said, keeping his voice firm, not letting it fill with the anger the children might not understand wasn't directed at them. "I will avenge your families."

North wasn't going to let whatever 'United Nations' committee that would be watching Korea like a hawk after the ceasefire stop him from punishing those that deserved to be punished. Any of the southern soldiers or police that had slaughtered his people would pay the price for it, whether they had done it with their own hands or issued the order. And as for the Yankees...

If America was going to keep refusing to sign, then North would gladly keep making his men bleed for it.

"It won't bring them back," he said, watching some of the young faces fall, like they'd been holding on to some ember of hope that it would, that all they needed to see their parents again was the blood of those who had taken them from them. "But it will bring peace, and it will keep it. You will not grow up under the shadow of war forever."

Not like their parents, born under the Occupation and living under its darkness for most or all of their lives. Some of these children were so young that they likely couldn't remember the time before the bombs had fallen clearly, and thousands had been born in the two years since America had invaded that knew nothing but war.

It was unacceptable. But he wouldn't let their futures carry the same stain. He couldn't.

"One day the children of Korea will be able to live carefree lives again. I promise."

He could see Hae's grin off to the side, glowing like an early star.

'Next year.'

He didn't know if she believed that, or if she was mocking him.

He let all the children, both those that had been at the river and those here, gather around him to sleepily say goodbye, while he reminded them to behave for their caregivers and focus on growing up well. As they were escorted into the dormitories, his thoughts wandered to the children he had sent out of the country.

The Socialist Bloc countries had remained professional in their official correspondences to him on Liberation Day, but SH had found their personal ones in the chest and given them to him the day after. North still refused to read the letters, but he couldn't ignore those from the other Countryhumans. Those whose lands he'd sent his orphans to had assured him they were doing well, and settling in fine. Poland had even said he visited them personally.

North didn't like that. He didn't want foreign countries anywhere near his youth, especially not when ones like Romania and Hungary were still in the process of being re-educated by their people after what they had done.

But it had been... relieving to know they were well. That at least some of Korea's children were able to wake up and go to sleep under peaceful skies.

Even if it should have been all of them, under their own skies.

He shook his head, calling, "Wait," before the last child could go in for the night.

In-su looked back uncertainly, and North gestured him over.

"Korea-"

"Go," he ordered the other three. "I'll be out in a minute."

His provinces hesitated, then left. North stared at China until he sighed and followed them.

In-su padded across the cobbles of the courtyard, stopping in front of him with his head slightly lowered, like he thought he was about to be scolded again.

North grit his teeth. After a moment, he said, "I am sorry."

The boy glanced up, startled. "What? I mean pardon?"

"I shouldn't have snapped at you," he made himself say. "I'm sorry."

In-su looked over at Oh Ryong-jin standing off next to a small vegetable patch, almost like he was expecting her to reprimand him for making their Countryhuman apologize to him, then back at him.

"Um." He fidgeted with the stick he'd brought with him. "Comrade Hwang said the South is your brother."

North's jaw feathered. "He is."

"Then... I'm sorry, too," he said, lifting his head. "I shouldn't have said that to ya. I always get- got upset when people picked on In-chol, so I know why ya got mad."

'Don't fucking excuse it.'

But he couldn't argue with a child about why he didn't deserve grace. And he hadn't been mad about the threat because South was his brother. He'd been mad because he was half of In-su's country. Just like any patriotic Korean, regardless of political leanings, supported North, they should support him, too. It wasn't about South being his brother, it was about him being half of Korea.

"It's fine," North said. "You will make a fine soldier someday, Rim In-su."

The boy's face twitched, unable to stifle his smile. "I will! I'll grow up, and I'll get revenge for In-chol and everyone. And, um, the South, too."

North hoped he never got the chance. He hoped he would only ever wear the uniform in peacetime, guarding their borders and skies to make sure no one else needed revenge.

It was his job to get justice for their families now.

North glanced around, eye skirting away from Oh Ryong-jin as he reached into his pocket, holding something out for the boy.

"Here," he said, trying not to flinch as the short fingers brushed his. "Take this. Don't brag to the other children."

In-su gaped at the one candy he hadn't left with the hospital staff. "Milk candy from Comrade Korea? And a tank ride?"

North blinked. "What?"

But the boy was already sprinting for the dormitories, definitely about to brag to the other children.

"Thank ya, Comrade Korea!" he called. "Bye! Kill lots of traitors and Yankees!"

The door slammed.

North blew out a breath, not letting his shoulders relax.

Grit crunched under Oh Ryong-jin's rubber shoes as she came over.

"I'm sorry about him," she murmured, bowing her head. "We've been following the guidance about making sure the children know they aren't to blame the South or our brothers and sisters down there, and most of them understand that. But..."

She reached up, tucking a stray hair behind her ear as she gazed at the dark dormitory. "You know we're from Seoul. In-su's family all died when it burned. He was the only survivor."

North's eye closed.

"So it's a little more-"

"When?" he cut in.

"Pardon?"

"Which time that Seoul burned?"

It had burned when they first Liberated it, and the American planes swept in to destroy Yongsan District and everything Rhee's clique had left behind, and it had burned constantly after, worse when North retreated, and America had tried to leave nothing for the KPA to take with them. It had burned for almost every single day they held it.

And it had burned in 1951, before North's army had ever even reached it.

"Last winter," Oh Ryong-jin replied. "When it was freed for the second time."

His throat swelled shut.

"In-su's father was too stubborn to evacuate," she said sadly. "They were at home when... Well."

Well.

"I was heading for the mountains after my husband..." Her mouth twisted, her head tipping in a helpless little shrug. "Sold me out. I found him wandering around, covered in burns. I figured it was better to die trying to get him to safety instead of hiding and waiting for the frost or Rhee's hunters to get me."

North's larynx clenched, working almost painfully until he got the words out. "You made the right choice."

"Mm." She smiled. "In-su is very hardy. But he also takes Syngman Rhee and his crooks more personally. I should've been doing a better job at making sure he knows who the real enemy is."

North looked away as she bowed in apology, promising she would do a better job at educating him.

"But he really is a good kid," she said fondly, glancing over at the muffled voices coming from the children's room.

"I can tell," North managed.

He bid her and the other minders goodnight, then stood in front of the gate, alone and numb.

People had died when Seoul burned. He had known that. America had only issued the evacuation order less than a full day before bombing it, and his troops and vehicles had clogged the roads out. North had found the bodies in the hills, huddled together and crammed into crevices, and the ones in the city, lying broken under shattered rubble. Whether from frost or fire, his people had died.

But it had been one thing to haul an old man with ash in his hair out from the cobbled-together shack he'd been living in the ruins of Yongsan while his granddaughter wailed over him, and silently curse America and his butchers for what they had done, and promise her he would avenge him. It was another to hear what had happened to In-su's family, and know that he wasn't the only one to curse.

America had given the instructions. His pilots had carried them out.

But South had given the order.

Was it fair to tell In-su that he wasn't the enemy? Was it fair to look him or that daughter or any of those whose loved ones had perished in the blitz in the eyes and tell them that it was wrong to view the man who had given the order to burn their homes as the enemy, that they were traitors for even thinking it?

But South wasn't the enemy, he was being manipulated, threatened, he had to have been. America wouldn't have told the full truth in that letter, he must have-

Yet North's mind kept crashing up against that wall- '잘못했어.' The thing he'd clung to so desperately had become an obstruction that stabbed needles into his brain.

South wouldn't have risked leaving that message unless he felt truly guilty. And he wouldn't have felt truly guilty unless he had a reason to. North had broken him of that during their years in the shack, so that he wouldn't be devoured by guilt after another escape attempt had failed because he was too slow or too weak. All those failures had been his fault, and his brother had to know that.

And he had to know that now. He hadn't said 'jalmothaesso' the night he cut out his eye, when he told him he was sorry about the Communists murdered in Suncheon and Jeju and so many other places, but 'it had to be done.' He had used 'mian,' because he hadn't had a hand in it, and he knew it wasn't his fault. Just like he'd used 'mian' at the Raktong, apologizing for his eye. He hadn't felt truly guilty, because America had made him do it. Even if he should have known that if he just told North what he had been sent to do, his brother would have taken him back to Pyongyang and kept him safe, and they could have joined together to speak out against Rhee and his 'republic,' like he had said. He should have known he would keep him safe.

South had given the order. Even if America had planted the seed, he knew his brother had played a big enough part of his own volition for it to drive him to hide that note.

North's brother had burned Seoul. He had killed the Rim family and hundreds more like them. He had made thousands of their people homeless, and killed them.

And for the first time, North wondered if they would forgive him for that.

The idea that they wouldn't hadn't even been an option to him- of course they would, South was their country. They would forgive him, just like he had. They would understand that Korea would never do something like that unless he had to, and that he was sorry.

But his provinces hadn't forgiven him. And what was sorry to a boy who would never see his brother again? What was sorry to a woman sobbing over the mangled body of the last person she had left in the world? What was sorry to the refugees driven into the hills in the dead of winter to starve and freeze among the mass graves? What was 'sorry' to the seventy thousand and counting on Jeju Island, or in Suncheon or Yeosu or Busan, or scattered across the hills of Taejon, those hundreds of thousands of Communists and 'Communists' who had been exterminated, cut open, imprisoned, made to dig their own graves only for one of their own Countryhumans to say it 'had to be done?'

South hadn't known. He hadn't known that blowing up the Hangang bridge would kill hundreds, or that their people were being massacred. But he should have. And he shouldn't have gone back to America, shouldn't have Commanded their provinces, shouldn't have stood in the middle of Busan while it was announced that Rhee had won again, like he supported him, like he was glad. He shouldn't have...

North reached under his eyepatch, running his fingertip along his sagging lower lid, the bandages rough against the delicate skin.

He had forgiven South. He had to- he was the other half of their country. He was his brother. But if he told their people that...

"Korea!" Hae's voice echoed from outside the gate. "It's gettin' dark out!"

Hwang hushed her, but added, "If you want to get updates from Comrade Nam Il before we go, we should get moving."

He did. And had to get back to Pyongyang tonight to look over more letters from his people for problems to solve, then take Kangwon and Chagang to the front tomorrow.

North exhaled, then slid open the gate, grumbling, "Be less noisy."

"Oops," Hae exaggeratedly whispered. "Sorry Korea."

"Are you sure?" China asked, smiling. "It might be even harder for someone to follow me."

North hunched under his embarrassment. "I still don't know what you're talking about."

"M*hmmmmmmm."*

"Korea." Hae tried to snag his sleeve as they crossed the open ground back to the city proper. He shook her off, skin prickling. Undeterred, she asked, "Did you apologize to In-su?"

"None of your business."

She nodded, satisfied. "Good. He really din't mean to upset you."

'That's the damn problem.'

"En, when I said the secret to being good with kids was to treat them like dogs, I didn't mean the yelling part," China said.

North's eye flicked to him, then he muttered to his provinces, "Don't tell South Hamgyong about this."

Hwang lifted a knowing brow. "Because she'll use it as more proof that you're hopeless with children?"

North didn't answer.

"Don't worry, Korea, ah'll never tell," Hae chirped. "On purpose. Do ya want to hear about all the kids?"

Her and Hwang launched into talking about the children- what they were like, what they thought they would be good at when they were older, what supplies and improvements the orphanage could use, how skilled Ge-hyok was at go, and how Hye-mi had a future in art. They left out her injuries and anything unpleasant, but North would accept that here. Peasants were coming in from the fields with the soldiers that had been helping them, and people were cooking in their homes, the smell of steamed grains and vegetables drifting from kitchen windows and open-air stoves. They didn't need to hear about the maimed children they already saw most days.

North let his provinces talk, their voices overlapping as they spoke over one another and suggested better words for each other, South Hwanghae's sickeningly sugary, squeaky rural drawl and North Hwanghae's thinner, more refined cadence, one of them making animated expressions as she skipped along, and the other talking more with his hands, almost hitting North as he swept one sideways, excited by how the children had enjoyed his story about that bear.

It was good he wouldn't be unifying them. If they were one...

Hwanghae would never shut up. North didn't think he would ever get a moment of silence again.

He couldn't help but look at them as the sun set, and darkness settled over Kaesong.

Hwang didn't have that irritating look on his face anymore, and he wasn't glancing at him more than he should. And the constant looks Hae threw his way, like she was checking he was still there, didn't hide anything under her enthusiasm.

China hadn't told them about South. In this moment, he could believe he wouldn't. Anything he could gain wouldn't be worth it to sow division between North and his provinces now, as America's steel production recovered and the talks held on by a thread. The final draft had been entirely settled on the 6th- the armistice was now finalized, but they still had to deal with the Americans' refusal to free their POWs. He wouldn't add a spanner on this side of the works as well. North should be sure that his provinces wouldn't let their dislike of South get in the way of peace and Reunification, but...

He glanced at them again, at Hae, who had never looked at him with anything but... adoration, even when he was criticizing her or screaming at her for feeding that dog, and Hwang, whose eyes had held that traitorous hope earlier.

North had forgiven his brother for what he had done to him, and their people. He had to. But their provinces hadn't forgiven him for what he had done to them, and some of their people hadn't forgiven him for what had happened to them under his watch. If they knew what all he had truly done, if they knew that North forgave him for all of it...

Would they forgive him?

'On summer days in Kaesong, I used to watch the Korean children swimming. In any group, at least half were covered with napalm burns. Ears which were shapeless blobs melted into the rest of the face, arms and legs with great rubbery, raised weals on them, and one boy who seemed to have stepped out of Hugo's L'Homme qui Rit with a fixed, terrible smile in a distorted mouth which would never close. And these were the ones which could run about and swim. There were tens of thousands of others under the rubble of schools and homes which could never again run about. There were cases in the hospital which were too terrible to turn loose among other children, faces which were dead, horrible masks, eyes that were gone, staring, red eyes between eyelids that would never close, eyes hidden by eyelids that would never open, and where one could not distinguish where upper and lower lids met, limbs on which the flesh had been fused into the rest of the body, hands and feet that were twisted, useless claws, flesh that had been cooked and boiled- mute testimony to American 'humanitarianism.' After all, these children would only grow up to be Communists.'
-Wilfred Burchett, 'This Monstrous War'

Americans say North Koreans are raised to hate them. Maybe they should consider why telling the truth about what they have done to them could make someone do that.

Holding Back The Flood

"Uncle!"

As soon as the rest of the 2nd Division of the Second Corps dispersed, a female soldier with short roan hair headed for Kangwon. Chagang knew who she was before his cousin said her name.

"Comrade Choe Kang-ok." He let her embrace him in the rainy mountain village. "It's good to see you again."

The soldier grinned. "You too, uncle. And Comrade Chagang and Uncle Korea."

She turned to Korea, half-lifting her arms. He tensed. Kangwon stepped half in between them, subtly stopping her.

"Don't call me that," Korea ordered. He looked annoyed. Chagang didn't know if he was.

Choe Kang-ok grinned. "If you say so, uncle."

Their Countryhuman huffed.

"How are you doing?" Kangwon asked, eyes scanning her. They had heavy shadows under them, the same shadows she had.

The woman smiled at him. "I'm doing great. Even if I'd rather be back on the line."

The Second Corps had been shifted off of the front to reconstitute itself from the chipping away it had taken from the American 25th Division over the past months. The 'National Defense Army' divisions in the eastern sector posed no threat to the First and Third, so they were in reserve now. They could easily be mobilized to reinforce the other corps, or moved to replace the coastal defenders if their fresher divisions were needed at the front.

They would be. All their intelligence indicated the Americans were planning an offensive. Van Fleet was overtly asking permission to push into the north in force, and while Mark Clark had denied him so far, he didn't seem to have as much caution as his predecessor, and would likely soon give in to the desire to be the commander to conquer Korea for his Countryhuman. If they didn't accept America's demand to surrender their prisoners of war, he would try. And the Korean People's Army needed to be ready.

"Don't begrudge a break," Kangwon advised. "They're what keeps you healthy enough to stay fighting."

He looked at Korea. Pointedly.

He sounded more nonchalant than he felt. Chagang couldn't see his colours, but he knew that. His cousin couldn't say he was relieved his old comrade's daughter was no longer in active combat with Korea here, but he had been fretting about her for months, asking Chagang about the situation on the eastern front whenever he took his blood. And for the casualty reports.

"I know," Choe Kang-ok said. "And we've been fighting the Yanks and their puppets for awhile. If the war ended tomorrow, I'd feel like I avenged Abeoji at least a little."

Kangwon's eyes dipped. Korea's jaw feathered. Chagang's temples strained, an invisible pressure demanding to be let in.

"I knew Choe Bong-nam," Kangwon told his daughter. "The best way you can avenge him now is to help drive our country forward."

The soldier saluted, her face solemn. "I will. We'll win this war, and I'll help build the country my father always dreamed of."

Korea's teeth were grinding. Chagang's eyes slitted.

"We're leaving now," their Countryhuman said, nothing of what he must be feeling in his voice.

"Are you all heading to the front?" Choe Kang-ok asked, wiping warm rain from her face.

"Just Korea and Chagang," Kangwon supplied. "I'm staying here for our injured comrades, and to do check-ups for the villagers."

And because Korea didn't want him so close to the front. He didn't want Chagang either. The province had only been able to convince him to postpone his deployment to Kanggye by saying he wanted updated information from the ground.

Korea was still letting the vow he had made to him stifle his usefulness, when it was supposed to do the opposite. Chagang would not allow that.

"Anything I can help with?" Choe Kang-ok asked Kangwon. "My unit deploys for anti-aircraft watch later, but I can get free for now. If a high-ranking uncle gave me permission."

She batted her eyes. Kangwon looked at Korea, then nodded at her.

"Sure, I could use a hand."

"We'll be back either late in two days or early in three," Korea said, already striding away. "Depending on if this cloud cover holds."

A typhoon had hit the west coast, sending low, grey clouds the colour of sorrow over the Peninsula, and finally cooling off the summer heat. Heavy rain had been soaking 'their' Jeep's canvas for the entire drive to Kangwon province. It meant they hadn't had to wait for the cover of night to leave, and could head to the combat zone in the daylight.

"Drive careful," Kangwon said.

Chagang's head was pounding so hard, his eyes narrowed to almost nothing, that he almost didn't catch his cousin's look.

'Keep him safe.'

He forced himself to blink in agreement.

Neither of them liked that Korea had wanted to visit the front on his own. He had even insisted that China stay in Pyongyang.

Acquiescing to bringing Chagang with him couldn't be taken as assurance that he wouldn't do anything rash. They had all been with him in Kimhwa after all.

He had promised not to undertake missions on his own anymore. Chagang believed him. But he also knew how strong Korea's emotions could surge, and what that could lead to.

"Take care, uncle!" Choe Kang-ok called.

Korea paused, rain plinking off his epaulets. Chagang watched his shoulders hunch under them.

"Comrade Choe Kang-ok," he said, turning back for a moment. "Stay safe."

She grinned, and gave a small, cocky salute. "No promises."

Behind his back, Korea's bandaged fingers sunk into his wrists. Chagang's head throbbed as he followed him back to the Jeep.

Their soldiers waved to them from the doorways of the village houses they were staying in, and from under canvas canopies. Korea had already spent an hour inspecting the men and women, praising them for their efforts, as well as congratulating them on another Liberation Day past. Now they wished them well as they left.

"Watch out for Yankees, Comrade Korea!"

"Tell our comrades in the Third and First to keep workin' hard!"

"Happy late Liberation Day!"

They all appeared worn, with ragged uniforms and haggard faces after being pounded with artillery and air strikes, and repelling enemy probes for months on end. But their tired smiles were bright.

Chagang yearned to see if the air around them was filled with red and shades of gold. But he couldn't. He couldn't let the colours in anymore.

He had been coping with repressing them in times of crisis, on the battlefield and during air raids, and on not letting them overwhelm him during his daily tasks of war room planning, assisting refugees, and helping factories operate around the blackouts. But then Korea had returned from his mission in the south with that terrible raging storm of furious red and ashen sorrow, filled with roiling clouds of sickly discomfort and unease, and murky green dread that had kept growing deeper and more eye-aching, flashing with lightning strikes of ochre and chartreuse, flaxen mahogany that kept squeezing its way out, and an unnervingly strong purple-grey. Chagang had hoped it would dissipate after China recovered and he stopped avoiding him, but it had not. The guilt and shame had faded slightly, but that was all. The storm had only been growing stronger when he had finally managed to cut it off.

Something had happened down south. Something worse than China getting shot. But Korea hadn't said anything, and would not.

It had gotten to be too much. Waking up choked by the black smoke billowing off of North Hamgyong like a house fire, and all the pain his other male cousins were filling the room with, before SH burst in to wake them up with her crackling aura of rage and inky blue-black that drew the same colour from her brother and pierced straight through Chagang's eyelids like hot needles. Sitting with his cousins and the Liaos, unable to taste his rations past the clouds of flax-mahogany and discomfort, and those around the Hamgyongs that hurt him somewhere deeper than his head. And that was if Korea hadn't slept at the bunker. If he had, then it was all Chagang could do to keep his eyes open and his jaw moving. If he hadn't, then reaching the muster point was like being flash-banged, his head torn open by that localized storm. The province would rather stand on the deck of a sampan in the middle of the typhoon ravaging their coast. At least he could try and escape it.

He spent most days at Korea's side in the war room, his head being split open by the dread that only grew heavier each time they were told another day had passed with America refusing to sign, and the anger that had already filled his mouth with its metallic tang before his expedition. Chagang couldn't usually taste the colours. But Korea's had started to taste like blood.

He couldn't leave his side if he did not have to. If his Countryhuman was walking the streets when an air raid could happen, Chagang had to be there. Hae had told them about the one on July 11th, and how Korea had tried to head off on his own in the middle of it, and risked himself to save her. The same thing he had done to Chagang, shielding him with his body on that first test atom bomb run. He still needed someone to restrain him, until his body accepted the same thing that his mind had, that as their Countryhuman, it was him that mattered. So he had to remain by his side, in the devastating radius of that emotional typhoon.

It was all just too much. His cousins' pain and grief, the constant clinging sorrow that clung to Kangwon ever since he had lost his brother, and the exhaustion that cloaked him as he took his blood, Korea's raging maelstrom, the ever-present fog of dread and olive and grey and discomfort of hunger that almost everyone around him was carrying, from military officers to recruits to refugees and civilians, and their politicians. He couldn't take it anymore. They filled his head and blotted his thinking. He had found himself having to be called twice before he heard again. That couldn't happen. Korea needed his support now more than ever. He needed him to be a pillar.

And Chagang didn't want to see the negative emotions anymore. There were too many. They made him feel sicker than his sympathetic fever did, especially the Hamgyongs' and Korea's. He didn't want to see his family thrust those blue-black spears at each other, or the grief and hurt that shrouded the city after another air strike, or that pall of murky green around his Countryhuman when he couldn't do anything about them.

They hurt too much.

So he had to shut them all away. He could not let only the positive ones in. Not when the war had tinged most of them with grey or olive, even at their happiest. And like a battle line, if the enemy was allowed to breach at one point, it could cause the entire formation to crumble.

So he was blocking them all out now. He had finally managed to do it. He had just needed to picture the shield that he wanted to be for Korea, and hold it up in his mind. He refused to let Hae's cloud of pink past it to soothe him even when they were alone. He refused to let the General's gentle golden glow of hope comfort him. And he refused to see what he knew their soldiers were looking at Korea with now.

He had only let his diligence slacken on Liberation Day. If he hadn't let down his mental walls at Korea's speech, he was sure their people's flood of love and wild hope would have burst a blood vessel in his brain.

And he had needed to see it. Even if Korea couldn't be, Chagang needed to be reassured by the creamy gold and bursts of azure-indigo. It was necessary for believing in victory.

He had also tentatively tried to look at his cousins when they received the letters from CCCP. He had thought it would be safe. That there would be only bright emotions that didn't hurt. And there had been, on them.

But Korea had only grown darker. Twisted tendrils of ochre, chartreuse, and ash had been lashing at the words in his hands, trying to tear them to pieces.

Chagang did not want to see that. He would have liked to see the colours coming from the strangers around the world as they penned their letters, but he did not want to see the blue twined in with the red of frustration start to darken like ink had been spilled in it. He didn't want to know if the chartreuse wouldn't be strong enough to strangle it next time.

So he held his shield up against all the colours coming from their soldiers as he climbed into the Jeep with Korea. His Countryhuman started the engine, and they drove up the narrow mountain road.

The Kumgang Mountains looked dull. Even the emeralds and viridians of the pines still clinging to the stark rocks above. The lack of emotional colours drained the real colour from everything, like their absence had somehow made the world darker.

'Unpleasant.'

Chagang could feel Korea's aura wanting to pierce his skull. He sat beside him like a fire trapped in a cage, yearning to burn away the steel around it. The province kept his eyes on the muddy path, trying to keep the shield he had built up.

His guards didn't help. Kim Chul-sop and Kye Byung-cheol were clinging to the sides of the Jeep to survey the rolling mountain ridges. The men had used to be reconnaissance officers in the KPRA, and were always shrouded in clouds of wary green-yellow and anxious olive. Chagang was sure Korea had chosen the two most alert and paranoid bodyguards for him to make sure he wouldn't be taken.

They were also in love. This was not Chagang's business. It had just used to relieve his headache slightly.

But the red and gold hid when they were at work. When they were guarding their province, there were only the drab, tense colours as they stood watch for enemies. They pushed at his temples now, sensing the weakness in his defenses caused by the force of Korea's feelings. Chagang's eyes strained with the effort of keeping them out, but he kept them forward.

This was going to be another long ride.

And it was. Two hours to the front, made longer by the washed-out road they had to stop to help repair. It was late afternoon when they arrived at the farthest eastern point of the battleline, south of Kosong and north of Oemyon-ri, one of the villages marked 'destroyed' on their war room maps. The First Corps was headquartered in the mountain mass west of Nam River, but Korea wanted to visit the entire line, so they would be starting east and moving west.

Korea cut the engines in a narrow ravine where a few supply trucks were parked. Before he got out, he turned to Chagang.

"Chagang," he said seriously. "I appreciate that you know how to keep your mouth shut. Continue to do that."

His province dipped his head, pleased. He couldn't have talked on the ride if he wanted to. But he also didn't want to. They had already gone over the reports he had missed while in Kaesong.

He followed Korea from the Jeep, his guards keeping watch as they used the tarp the men overseeing the vehicles gave them to cover it.

The land was more level here, mostly decimated forests and low hills. Their 6th Division was holding on to the last of the major heights before Kam Lake. It gave them a good view of the flatter no-man's land between them and the territory held by Rhee's 5th.

As they climbed the hill, the sound of artillery firing became louder. Korea lifted his head, like the extra centimeter could help him see over the crest.

"I do not think we have to worry about probes today," Chagang said. "It's too wet."

The weather hadn't just grounded the planes that would usually be dropping bombs over this section of the front. Ground operations would be halted, too, leaving just artillery barrages to worry about. He was glad. It meant it was safer for Korea to be here.

His Countryhuman made a noise of agreement. The lines on his face didn't smooth.

"Comrade Korea, Comrade Chagang!" a voice hailed from the top of the height, and an NCO came hustling down, snapping into a salute in front of them.

"Unit Commander-"

"Han Eun-gol," Korea interrupted. "I remember." He eyed the embroidered bars on his epaulets. "You're in charge of your unit now?"

The man had lit up as he remembered his name. Now he dimmed.

"Comrade Ko died in an air strike, and Comrade Kim went a month ago," he reported quietly. "I was the one left with the most experience."

Korea nodded stiffly. "You'll do well."

Han Eun-gol cleared his throat, saying more professionally, "My apologies no one was here to greet you, we weren't notified of your arrival."

"At ease," Korea said. "This is an informal visit, and we're moving clandestinely."

"Understood. Are you here to survey the situation?"

"In part," Korea replied. "We're also here to congratulate you on Liberation Day."

Chagang had never been good with expressions that weren't his family's. But he thought Han Eun-gol looked surprised.

"Oh," he said. "Of course. I should've expected that. I just thought- You visited on Foundation Day last year."

He sounded pleased, the way Hwang did when he was trying to act professional, but Chagang could see emerald and gold excitement fizzling around him. But blocking out Korea's colours suddenly became more painful.

"There were concerns with me travelling the front last Liberation Day, due to the delicate state the peace talks were in," he told the soldier, though Chagang knew that wasn't true. "I had to postpone my visit. It won't happen again."

"It's okay if it has to," Han Eun-gol said quickly. "We still receive the broadcasts. And Comrade Korea's safety comes before all else."

Chagang tried not to narrow his eyes as the pressure in his skull increased.

"Would you like me to muster the other unit commanders?" the soldier asked.

"No need." Korea walked past him. Chagang followed.

"Ah, Comrade Generals, I don't think you should head up the height," Han Eun-gol quickly said, hastening after them. "It isn't safe."

"I'm here to visit all my soldiers."

Korea sounded tense. So Chagang fought past the straining in his head to say, "It raises morale for them to see us."

"That's certainly true," Han Eun-gol conceded. "But please be careful. I'll go ahead to let them know you're coming." He hustled off, calling back, "And watch your footing- it's slippery!"

Chagang and Korea were already covered in mud from assisting their soldiers in fixing the road. Falling face-first into it wouldn't change much. But seeing them do that could be demoralizing.

Unless you were South Pyongan. Then it was the opposite.

"Stay low," Korea ordered him as they worked their way up the muddy, barren slopes. "We don't want to draw an assault."

Chagang nodded, keeping an eye on his Countryhuman as he climbed. His chest was rising purposefully slow. The path up the hill wasn't steep. He shouldn't be labouring for breath.

He knew the fog of exhaustion around him wouldn't have gone away since he had forced the colours back. And he also knew he wasn't eating any better. Though he had never been able to tell that by his aura.

He had always thought it was strange. Korea hadn't eaten well even in those months after Chagang had been formed and before the war. But he never had that dense, grey-yellow clawing at him. He had thought maybe it was because the General made him take meals in private.

But he knew he wasn't eating now. And while that muddled, impenetrable hunger around his cousins only grew stronger, even now that they were eating most of their rations again, and his own hollow stomach shrank in, Korea remained free of it. He carried the thin wisps of empathetic hunger, but not the thicker cloak of his own. It wasn't like the pain that welled out of him before being choked off. It just wasn't there.

That meant he either didn't feel it strongly enough to be seen, or he didn't feel it at all. Neither one made sense to Chagang. Not when he could see his legs shaking slightly as they reached the top of the height. And not when he hadn't eaten after he returned last night, or before they left this morning. Chagang had, but he was still starving. Kangwon was, too. He didn't need to see the colours to know that.

So how could Korea not be?

His Countryhuman turned sharply to look at him. "What?"

Chagang's eyes flicked past him. Korea followed his gaze.

From this height, they could see out to the East Sea. The slate grey waters, the pale strip of sand, and the few spindly trees that remained from the forests that had once bordered it. A large blackened spot, like a patch of despair, marred the shore, lined with rubble that could have been flotsam swept in from sea. The only trace left of the fishing village of Songdojin-ri that had once stood there was a few ramshackle houses.

He shouldn't have drawn Korea's attention to it. A lance of hot agony shot through his skull as he stopped to gaze out at it, making him close his eyes.

But their Countryhuman had been getting more aggressive about staring lately. Even looking at him for a few seconds on the way here had gotten Kangwon snapped at in front of all four of their guards.

After a moment, Korea wordlessly continued on.

Chagang stumbled slightly as he followed. He turned his head away from him to try and keep his footing even.

He couldn't see it with the bulk of the hill in the way, but he knew another ruined town flanked it. Taegang-ri. None of the villages near the front had been allowed to stay standing. Their maps were an endless list of place names with 'DESTROYED' written under them. Choe Yong-gon had learned not to add a new one until Korea left the room.

"Comrades!" Han Eun-gol appeared from the ground, moving close to it as he beckoned them over.

Chagang hadn't realized he was so near. Not being able to see people's colours was inconvenient. He needed to become more vigilant naturally.

He and Korea darted across the open terrain to slide into a large foxhole. Kim Chul-sop followed, but Kye Byung-cheol said, "I'll keep watch outside."

His other bodyguard couldn't say it, so Chagang ordered, "Be careful. Stay close."

"Yes, Comrade General." He saluted, and his silhouette disappeared from the mouth of the hole.

Kim Chul-sop's face didn't change. Chagang knew any concern he might have felt would be hidden even if he could see.

He also knew both of the men would choose his life over their lover's. They were professionals that wouldn't have accepted the assignment if they couldn't. It wasn't something he enjoyed thinking about. He had thought about asking Korea to assign someone else to him, but he couldn't explain why, and he knew his Countryhuman would demand to know. He would just have to make sure he never put the men in a position where they had to choose.

Another reason he had to get better at holding back the emotions.

"Comrade Generals," one of their soldiers greeted them, and the five men in the foxhole stood on their knees to salute. The roof was too low to stand.

"Get in, get in." An older man with cropped hair beckoned them away from the entrance. "Kim, put down your jacket so our Comrade Country and Province don't have to sit on the dirt with us."

"No need," Korea said shortly, stopping the other soldier from disrobing. "We're just as used to battlefield living as you are."

He was getting even more impatient about being out of combat. Not a good thing.

"How are you all faring?" Korea asked after getting their names and ranks, squatting on his haunches.

"Minimal losses when they've repulsed our probes, Comrade Korea," Han Eun-gol answered. "They tried to take a foothill a couple days ago, but we pushed them back."

"And how are you faring?"

"Damn good, Comrade Korea," a soldier said with a rakish grin, one of his comrades hissing at him to watch his mouth.

"Morale's been flagging a little," Han Eun-gol admitted, shamefully. "But you and General Kim Il-sung's broadcasts on Liberation Day brought it back." He patted his damp uniform. "This rain's done wonders, too. Never thought I'd say that."

Rain often dimmed people's moods to a soft grey, especially soldiers. But the war had made it the opposite. They were able to get a rest day today because of it. Not to mention all the times it had aided their army on the retreat.

Chagang wanted to see if there really was a faint gleam of relieved teal or emerald around their comrades, or if Han Eun-gol was just trying to reassure their Countryhuman. It would be useful to know.

But he could already feel the strain at being in this small space with seven other people's emotions, one of them being Korea. He knew if he dropped his concentration for a second, he wouldn't be able to get it back again.

"Did your Liberation Day rations arrive on time?" Korea asked, even though they had received the report that said they had.

The soldiers confirmed it.

"Is there anything else you could use?"

"Not unless you can get ammunition here sooner," Han Eun-gol replied. "Our main problem is supply chain issues, but we're aware that's usually out of Supreme Command's hands."

Korea opened his mouth, but the youngest-looking soldier, Sip Il, cut him off.

"Wait, it's not completely." He leaned forward, palms flat on the damp soil. "The locals showed Division Headquarters a footpath through the mountains that we could expand to a cart track with a little road work. If we did, we could still keep at least some supplies flowing when the trucks get pinned down. But we're low on manpower, and Command says they don't have the resources to send anyone."

"Don't complain to your Countryhuman, boy," the oldest soldier scolded, smacking him lightly on the back of the head.

"No, we need complaints," Korea said. "It's how we know there are problems to fix."

Sip Il pushed his hat brim away from his eyes. "Do you think you could put in a word for us then? I think it'd be stupid to ignore it."

"I will," Korea assured. "The food situation at the front weighs heavily on Supreme Command and I. Anything we can do to lighten our soldiers' burdens should be done immediately, no matter the cost."

"We could mobilize Second Corps recruits," Chagang suggested. "It could serve as part of their training to teach them the Korean People's Army works for the people. And there are refugees in the hills that would volunteer."

Korea's jaw feathered. The extra rations would work as lures for the locals driven from their homes. But it also required getting more supplies to this part of the front.

"As soon as I return to Pyongyang, I will speak to our comrades," he told the soldiers. "We will get something worked out."

Sip Il grinned, looking pleased, even as his older comrade glowered at him.

Korea was shifting on his haunches. For a moment, Chagang thought he looked tense again.

There was a particularly loud artillery barrage from outside, followed by an explosion, and a resounding cheer from down the height. Korea's head darted towards it, staring, eye blown wide like they were under immediate attack.

To distract the soldiers, Chagang mustered the strength to ask the question Kangwon had told him to.

"Have there been any germ incidents lately?"

"None here, Comrade Chagang," one of the men reported. "But we've been keeping an eye out and following procedure."

Good. Most of the incidents at the front had been in the beginning months, before shifting to the rear. The American Command had either decided to reduce the chance of the their own troops getting sick, or wanted to avoid areas where war correspondents were present after attention had been called to their terrorism, while still crippling their supply lines, as had happened in Pupyong earlier this year. Chagang also didn't expect the artillery shells containing insects to be used in an area held by the 'NDA.' They had been proven to be weak and prone to defection in every major offensive carried out. America wouldn't trust them with his army's classified operations. Not when some of the American pilots they had captured hadn't even known what they were dropping.

Kangwon would be relieved. Hopefully the Second Corps wouldn't face any danger from the biological warfare now that they were off the front.

Korea had recovered from his alarm, turning back around.

"Keep up the good work, comrades," he ordered. "I'm sorry we can't stay longer, but we need to visit more of the front today."

"It's enough to see you at all," Sip Il said enthusiastically.

Korea twitched slightly. "I want my soldiers to know that Korea isn't blind to their efforts. I read every single report that comes across my desk. I know how hard you're all fighting to L- keep the north free."

His emotions ballooned out, crushing Chagang into the wall. But his gaze was serious as he strafed the men with it.

"Korea is very proud of you all."

Chagang inhaled, forcing his tongue to move. "Your provinces are, too."

Their soldiers ducked their heads.

The oldest one put his fist over his heart. "I've been fighting for Korea all my life. I'll keep fighting until either we're free, or I'm dead."

Korea should have reassured him they would be free before he perished. Instead he said, "Korea will remember all of its martyrs, Kim Gun-seok."

And since they could only believe in victory, Chagang added, "And we will win."

His Countryhuman gave him a narrow-eyed look he could not decipher. He tried to imagine what colour he would see tinging it, if he could. Yellow-green, maybe.

Kim Gun-seok smiled tremulously, and Han Eun-gol led them from the dug-out to visit their other positions.

They traversed the muddy hill, making their way across it by ducking from foxhole to sandbag barrier, staying out of sight of any scouts from across the desolate no-man's land, meeting with their soldiers.

They were worn and weary. It was clear even without their auras. They huddled in the holes silently, or manned the artillery with locked-jaw determination. Their faces only lifted when they saw Korea. He thought.

He was starting to realize he was worse at parsing facial expressions than he had believed. He couldn't tell if the eyebrows of the man they pulled out of the way of an artillery strike and into a dug-out were crinkled because of what had just happened, or because he had felt how light Korea was when he was on top of him. He couldn't tell if the little smile some of them gave their Countryhuman when he wasn't looking was fond or sad. Or if some of them just had naturally upturned lips. And he had no way to tell if they were lying when they said they knew the war would be over soon.

He had been leaning too heavily on his ability, enough that not using it had become a liability. It put him at a disadvantage when he couldn't tell if someone was shrouded in the ochre guilt or hate of treasonous thoughts, or if morale was low enough that they needed to intervene.

But he couldn't use it again. He had to stop letting the colours get in the way, and become capable of doing those things on his own, without them. He had to strive to be a better soldier for Korea, one that wasn't distracted by the emotions. His country and his Countryhuman needed him to be.

Korea told their comrades that he was proud of them at every position- tucked into dug-outs, firing at the enemy, erecting new defenses, or cooking the dinner rations over a fire. Chagang hoped the praise made their soldiers as violet as when he received it.

The sun had dipped below the horizon when they were done, and finally began the trek back to the Jeep. More of their comrades were waiting for them, a ragged bunch of soldiers hidden by the rocks and rain that had started to slow down, drizzling now instead of pounding.

"We wanted to thank you for coming, Comrade Korea," Han Eun-gol said, doffing his cap. "You can't know how much it means to us."

It was dark. Chagang allowed his eyes to half-slit.

"It's thanks to soldiers like you that we are able to celebrate Liberation Day at all," Korean replied, no trace of the emotions trying to break through his province's shield in his voice. "And it is thanks to you that one day we will be able to celebrate the end of this war."

"Do you really think it will be by next year?" one of the men asked.

Chagang's head throbbed. Even without being able to see Korea's colours, that metallic taste filled his throat.

"One year or a hundred," Korea said firmly. "I know that that the Korean People's Army will keep fighting."

"Yes, Comrade General."

The soldiers saluted, and Chagang had to fight not to duck his head at whatever was trying to push through from them. The air was heavy, either with love or fear. He turned away quickly, before he could crack.

Korea stared long and hard at their comrades, then nodded, getting into the Jeep.

Han Eun-gol caught Chagang before he could join him.

"Comrade." He kept his voice low, covered by the sound of rain playing music on the rocks and leaf litter. "I'm sorry if what I say is overstepping, but..."

His deep brown eyes, the colour of comfort, lingered over Chagang's shoulder.

"Take care of Comrade Korea. He's..." The man's jaw worked for a moment before he finished, "He looked healthier last year. Remind him not to get so wrapped up in worrying about the war that he forgets to eat."

Chagang would, if he thought it would help.

"I will take care of him," he promised.

It was what a province was for. It was his purpose.

"Good." Han Eun-gol gave a tight-lipped smile, clapping him on the broad shoulder, his eyes still fixed on Korea.

There was no need to see olive crackling around him. He was clearly still anxious.

Chagang got in the passenger seat, Kye Byung-cheol hopping in after him, relaxing Kim Chul-sop.

"Two soldiers snuck away," he reported, slinging an arm over the back of the bench. "But they weren't deserting their posts, only moseying down to the creek to scrounge up a fish. We should still head to the next position quick to outrun any intel leaks."

"Did you reprimand them?" Chagang asked.

"Yep, gave them a right tongue-lashing." His comrade shook his fist menacingly.

"So I assume the poor boys are cowering with their tails between their legs now," Kim Chul-sop said dryly.

"You know it, comrade."

Good. Soldiers could not be loose in their discipline. Even if they weren't holding positions, they could not wander away. It could lead to being taken out by a covert enemy squad or sniper, or captured.

Korea started the engine, driving across the rocky terrain for the next point in the line of defense. Chagang was relieved to be away from the press of their soldiers' emotions, even if he knew the relief was only temporary. Their army was only holding the east in force, which meant their tour would stop west of Mundung-ri. But that was still dozens of positions and thousands of comrades to visit.

After some time, Korea asked in a low voice, "What did he say to you?"

Chagang looked at him, blinking.

"What did he say?" he demanded, louder. "When Han Eun-gol pulled you aside, what did he say?"

Korea wouldn't like to hear it. But he had asked directly.

"He told me to take care of you."

Agony. Immediate and intense. His shield splintered and Korea's storm surged through the cracks, stabbed into Chagang's eyes, electrocuting the delicate nerves behind them and tearing into his brain.

He slammed his eyes closed before it could shatter completely, teeth locked together as a high-pitched whine filled his skull. He barely noticed Korea slamming on the break and seizing him by the collar.

"Look at me," he growled. "Look at me."

Chagang's jaw creaked as he bit down, mustering all his mental strength to reinforce his shield, using it to push back the colours. They seeped under his lashes, muddy and terrible, and he didn't want to see them.

Then the night was dark again, and his eyelids could slowly pry open a crack, met with the white of Korea's feverishly glinting eye.

"I do not need 'taking care of,'" he snarled, low and cold. "I am your Countryhuman. It is my job to take care of you."

That thick metal taste clogged the back of Chagang's throat, but he summoned every ounce of willpower he had to say, "Korea, I told you- as your province, I am expendable. It is my duty to make sure you live."

"If it comes down to it, you will give your life for mine," Korea hissed, knuckles tightening in his uniform. "That does not mean I need protecting before then. I protect you. I keep you safe and I do not need taking care of. Do you understand?"

Chagang pressed his hand to his head, braced against his temple like it could help keep the storm out. "I did not say it. Comrade Pak did."

Korea's jaw bulged with the pressure of his biting down as he glared into Chagang's eyes. Then his widened, flicking down.

"Ssi-bal."

His province put his hand over his face, feeling the wet warmth seeping out of his nares.

He agreed. Ssi-bal. It was difficult to get blood out of your nasal passages when you didn't have a nose.

"What is wrong with you?" Korea demanded, shoving him away.

"Headache," Chagang managed, tipping his head back so the blood would pour down his throat instead of block his breathing.

"I thought you weren't having those anymore. Tch, never mind." Korea turned back to the wheel, throttling it instead of his province. "Kangwon gives you a full check-up before you head back to Pyongyang."

"I'll be fine. They are getting better."

His head always hurt now, but it was a steady pain. Instead of spiking when he was blasted with sharp emotions or had to push strong ones back, it maintained a dull ache. There was no relief, but the plateau was more manageable, and wouldn't get in the way. He could enjoy meals with his cousins and help their people without being overwhelmed.

It was just Korea's emotions that did this to him now. They railed at his senses, demanding to be let in, tearing at the edges of his shield as they strove to be seen. Trying to block them out only made them fight harder, driving this bayonet through his head.

It wasn't Korea's fault. He didn't know Chagang had this ability or that his emotional state was doing this to him. He would be mortified if he did. But it also meant he couldn't even attempt to spare him.

That was fine. It was worth it. The blood in his throat and the physical pain were better than having to see those awful colours. It hurt less.

His Countryhuman hunched over the wheel, wordlessly moving the Jeep forward again, simmering with tension. Chagang's guards sat in the back, heads turned opposite ways out the sides, watching for enemies as they drove through the dark hills. Their faces were stoic, but he knew they had heard what Korea said to him.

It was not like him to discuss something like that in front of their people. And it also wasn't like him to become comfortable with their bodyguards and stop monitoring himself. Chagang knew it wasn't that. It worried him.

Because those daggers of colour that had penetrated his shield had just reinforced that he could not handle being swamped by all the dark things his family and people felt anymore, not if he wanted to keep believing what he had to. Among all the fire and smoke of anger and grief that Korea had stabbed into him, there had also been yellow.

Violent, sickly yellow.

Chagang inherited North Pyongan's honesty, but instead of being fine with white lies if they protect people, his form of sparing someone's emotions is just not saying anything. If you ask him directly, he will answer, regardless of how that answer could make you feel. Never ask him if you think the clothes you're wearing make you look fat if you suspect they do.

Hae, wearing make-up: How do ah look?
Chagang: ...You're wearing make-up.
Hae: Ayuh, but does it look good??
Chagang: ...No.

South Pyongan has tried to tell him that it's really okay to lie sometimes (like when he did the dishes for her), but he just looks at her and blinks like he doesn't understand. She's decided he's under some kind of curse.

I found an American anecdote about the war where the soldier was given leave for the day, so he decided to go fishing. While he was, he begged feathers from a civilian with a pheasant to use as a lure, then was shot at by a sniper. He shot back and murdered him. And he said the thump he made as he fell from his perch made him vow to never kill a magpie again. Something very evil about that. Killing someone, and it making you sick, but instead of vowing to never kill another human, just deciding not to take potshots at animals, and then going on to describe it as a nice day. Not to mention he was an American soldier, supplied free rations by his army, choosing to take a Korean fish for fun, and begging for resources from a civilian. Then he just gets to continue his day and have a nice, relaxing fishing break, while someone's son is never going to get to fish again, or go home at all. The American soldier's name gets to live on, but who was the Korean one? If he was behind enemy lines, did his family ever find out what happened to him?

What Will Be

Kangwon spent all day at the Second Corps' field headquarters seeing soldiers for check-ups and minor ailments, freeing up the medics to work on the injuries still healing from their time on the front, or the air strikes. Choe Kang-ok helped him, diligently washing bandages and boiling water, chatting happily about her deployment in between patients.

He was glad to see the war hadn't dulled her spirit, and even more glad she hadn't been killed. And now, barring her artillery division being needed if America tried his luck again, she should be off the front for awhile, maybe even until the war was over. Unless she got sent to coastal defense.

Kangwon remembered the constant deafening blasts and shaking earth of Wonsan, chunks of dirt and flesh going flying as another destroyer found its mark, and hoped she'd be off for good.

Maybe a little selfish, considering someone had to defend the coasts, and she'd be more than happy to. But...

He'd lost Bong-nam. He didn't want to lose his daughter, too.

Eventually a voice Kangwon recognized started calling her name, and the woman jumped off the stool in the medical tent, slamming back the rest of the boiled water in her cup.

"There's muster," she said, wiping her mouth on her sleeve in a familiar cheeky gesture that made his heart squeeze. "I'm off to keep our skies safe."

"You stay safe, too," Kangwon advised. "Make sure you eat all your rations, and never drink unboiled water. And if you ever feel sick at all, tell the medics right away."

She smiled. "You and Comrade Korea worry too much. You're starting to sound like real uncles."

"And make sure you marry into a rich family."

Choe Kang-ok clicked her tongue in mock disapproval. "Encouraging me to marry a landlord? I'm not sure Abeoji would approve."

"You're right," Kangwon conceded. "Make sure you marry into a patriotic family."

The woman turned for the tent flap, then darted back.

"Just in case you're gone by the time we get back," she said, embracing him.

Kangwon's burns throbbed under her grip, but he hugged back, patting her. For a moment, he closed his eyes, remembering that last embrace with Bong-nam, as they clapped each other on the back, and his comrade watched him set off with a broad grin on his freckled face.

"Be safe," he said again as they pulled away.

"I'll try," she said this time, more seriously. "But if it comes down to it, you know I can't do any less than he did."

Kangwon's heart constricted. "I know. Fight hard, comrade."

His friend's daughter saluted, then slid out of the tent as Ryang Myeong-ae called for her again.

The province exhaled, slumping down onto the stool she'd left.

He wished he could tell himself she'd be okay, that she'd survived this long on the front without anything happening that nothing would now that she was in reserve.

But he knew it didn't work like that. Even if she wasn't out on the coast, all it took was one bomb or one rogue bacteria, and being dozens of ri away from combat wouldn't mean anything. Even if she survived the war, there could always be another, and she'd end up like Beom Dong-gil or Son Du-soon, or the countless other comrades that'd survived the war against Japan just to die in this one.

Or like her father, cut down by traitors because he couldn't stand to sit back and stay safe while their country was still in chains.

Kangwon shook his head, running his hand down his bandaged face, then stood.

No point in dwelling on what could be. Choe Kang-ok was alive for now, and hopefully she'd stay that way. The rain was still pouring down outside, so her anti-aircraft duty should be uneventful, at least for today.

And Kangwon still had work to do.

For the next day and a half, he shuttled around the Second Corps, tending to their soldiers and seeing patients from the hills and the nearby villages that were still standing.

This counted for his post-Liberation Day tour of his province, which was why Korea had let him come. Once he was done at the front, Chagang would get sent to Kanggye, and he'd head up to Wonsan again with their Countryhuman.

It was going to be rough, he knew that. But he could take it. He'd been feeling a little better lately, thanks to the germ warfare incidents slowing down. Everyone that could be vaccinated was, and the hygiene measures were well-practiced, so there weren't new cases pouring in the hospital doors, and he didn't have to travel across the country as much. And with almost everyone that'd been infected either recovered or... gone, he was mostly just dealing with the long-term effects from the diseases, like the heart complications that came with rheumatic fever, or the brain damage malaria could cause.

He couldn't cure those. He could only help manage them. But since he wasn't at risk of losing most of those patients, it was a little less emotionally taxing.

A little.

Kangwon had only had one patient with long-term complications in Bong-nam's village. A man named Kim Tu-gil with a case of pneumonia after getting stuck out in the woods during a winter storm. He'd healed quickly, and well, and while Kangwon had felt like every patient he treated back then was at risk of dying, looking back, he'd honestly never been going to. It was mild.

But it had left a cough. Nothing serious, just a little shortness of breath that didn't affect his trapping. But every time Kangwon went near the village, or ran into him in the forest, those hacking gasps hammered into his heart like a nail. He'd been so sure that if he'd done something better, he could've spared the man from it.

He knew now he couldn't've. It was just one of those minor complications that a doctor had no control over. But that almost felt worse, the idea that no matter how good he got, no matter how many courses he took or textbooks he studied, there were some things he'd never be able to fix. It was unfair that he could do his best, and a patient could, too, fighting hard to heal, succeeding, but still being left with a scar. And it wasn't the sort of unfair thing he could make fair.

He was usually pretty good at not letting it bother him. But it got a little harder when he had to find the gentlest way to tell a little boy that hadn't been as lucky as Kim Do-bom that the fog in his brain the malaria had left was likely never going to go away.

It'd felt good to help the International Scientific Commission, at least. They'd arrived in Pyongyang on the 28th of July, and Kangwon had spent until August 5th discussing their findings at meetings while the bombs fell overhead, showing them the broken containers they'd found, and the insect specimens, along with their autopsy reports from Pak Yun-ho and some of the other victims. He'd taken them to talk to the captured airmen in the camps, too, though he hadn't gone in, since Korea didn't want there to be any chances for anyone to accuse him of threatening them. They all knew they'd be accused of it anyway, but he guessed it was better to keep a province out of it.

The Commission had returned to China on the 6th, laden with reports, photographs, and eyewitness testimony, as well as some of their own tests, even though conducting them with the air raids going on was a little difficult.

Would it convince anyone when the report came out sometime in September? Kangwon had to hope it would. He still had to. And those letters on Liberation Day had given him a little more of it.

It'd lifted a weight that had been hanging over him for awhile to hear that Jepp was alive, and thrilled him to hear from him, on top of the news about his wife being pregnant. He'd been hoping he might find a letter from Adolfo, too, but he guessed he was still enlisted, so couldn't exactly do that. Maybe one day when the war was over, he could write him.

But there had been letters from Puerto Rico, and all over the world, from people like Adolfo, that saw a bit of their country in Korea. Oppressed peoples that saw themselves in the Koreans, and ones from the oppressing nations, letting them know that they saw that what was being done to them was wrong.

There were so many people out there that cared about them, believed them when they told them about the horrors and injustices their people had faced. Maybe the report would make them loud enough that their governments had to listen, had to do something about it.

'Maybe.'

Examination done, Kangwon set aside those thoughts and leaned back, removing the strap that held his stethoscope in place. He gently pulled the blouse of the young woman on the cot he was kneeling in front of back down over her stomach, then looked up at her.

"You're right," he said, keeping his voice even. "You're pregnant."

He usually would've given the expecting mother a congratulatory smile. But he kept his expression as neutral as his voice, waiting to see her reaction.

It was a good thing he did. Ri Song-hwa's face fell, her hand taking the stethoscope's place over her slightly rounded stomach.

Kangwon moved to get the next piece of news out so he wouldn't be hitting her again after she'd just recovered.

"And I think it's twins."

Her gaunt face paled, eyes closing. 'Twins,' she mouthed.

Kangwon was confident in his diagnosis, but he still offered, "I can check again, if you want. Or get a female comrade for a second opinion."

"No," she said after a second, trying to keep her voice measured. "I-I knew. I keep having taemong, and it's always two tiger cubs. I just... I guess I wanted to be sure."

Taemong. Conception dreams. Kangwon didn't believe in omens or gifted dreams (because if they were real, that opened up a lot of possibilities about other superstitions that he'd rather not think about), but he did believe that the body usually knew what was going on inside it before the conscious did.

"Was this a planned pregnancy?" he asked, sitting back on his haunches. He already knew the answer.

"We were trying," Ri Song-hwa murmured. "But then the war came... We decided to wait. I was being careful, but before my husband left for the army-"

She looked away, cheeks flushing in embarrassment, even as her eyes stayed dark.

"Accidents happen," Kangwon comforted her. "You can't go back, so focus on how you're going to move forward."

Her bony hands knotted in her lap, her eyes sliding down. She was silent.

After giving her some time, he asked gently, "Do you not want to have children?"

"It's... It's not that," she said quietly. "I've always wanted to be a mother. But... In the taemong, I'm always in the mountains, walking on a narrow path. And I can hear those-" Her hand fluttered up at the peaked canvas roof of the medical tent. "And I'm trying to get away, but then these tiger cubs come bounding down the path, and I'm trapped. And they're just these tiny little things, but they jump on me, and they bite me, and their teeth are so sharp..."

She trailed off, wrapping her arms around her stomach.

Taemong were important to mothers, so Kangwon didn't try telling her that was just her mind expressing her subconscious anxieties.

"I think the dreams are trying to tell you to eat more," he said instead. "You've only been eating for one, and if you kept doing that, then having twins could be like you're being chewed on."

Despite her being several months along, her stomach was almost concave, dipping in under her ribs. The bump in her stomach was more like she'd eaten a good meal, instead of there being a persimmon-sized fetus inside her.

"Either that, or you're going to have a couple little warriors," he added, trying to lighten her a little.

Ri Song-hwa didn't smile, her eyes downcasting to her stomach.

When she didn't say anything, Kangwon quietly added, "But if you're that worried, there are still other options."

Her fingers tented against her shirt, looking away like she was ashamed at the thought even crossing her mind.

"There's nothing wrong with getting an abortion if you really feel like you can't handle being a mother right now." Kangwon remained laidback as he said, "But please consider it carefully."

He didn't like having to do this, but he told her, "If you decide to keep them, the State will support you. You'll get extra rations, a member of the Mobile Medical Corps visiting you at your home, and free medical care."

The bonuses for triplets were even better. A woman who'd given birth to them after having her breasts cut off during the American occupation had a personal doctor assigned to her, and received a commemorative ring and a dagger for self-defense from the Premier. But right now, every care that could be afforded was being given to every mother.

"If you want to raise them, you won't be raising them alone," Kangwon assured Ri Song-hwa. "You'll have support every step of the way."

He tried to keep his tone even, uncoercive. He wasn't trying to coerce her, and he didn't like having to look at things from this more clinical angle, but the truth was that their birth rate had plummeted due to the war, and their population had taken a serious hit, especially the male portion. It would take years to recover, even after the war eventually ended, so he couldn't afford to offer someone who could give birth to twins an abortion with no other alternatives, especially if you subscribed to the superstition that tiger taemong meant sons.

If it was someone in Jin-suk's position, he wouldn't've said anything. But Ri Song-hwa was pregnant with her husband's children, and if it hadn't been for the war, likely would've already had them.

"I just..." Ri Song-hwa shook her head, hazel eyes brimming with tears. "How am I supposed to bring children into this?"

The downpour had ended the first night Kangwon was here. Outside the tent, they could hear bombs falling in the distance, far-away explosions that were still too close.

"It's so hard," she whispered hoarsely. "Every day, even with the dependent rations. There's no power, not enough food, I don't even have a real roof over my head-"

She dashed the back of her hand across her eyes, taking a shaky breath.

"I'm sorry," she said. "I don't mean to complain. I know the Party is doing everything it can-"

"It's alright," Kangwon soothed her. "I'm your doctor right now, not your Provincehuman. And I know the local organs have had trouble getting the mandatory housing set up."

The Central Committee of the Worker's Party could order the ri Party cells and People's Committees to build the houses, but they couldn't make the materials materialize in their hands. They didn't have them.

"It should be fixed before winter."

"It's just so hard," Ri Song-hwa repeated, voice cracking. "Even just taking care of myself. Bring a baby into this, bringing twins- I don't want my children being raised hiding in air raid shelters and caves, and going to sleep hungry. And what if the Yankees come back? What if-?"

She cradled her stomach protectively, likely thinking about the stories of pregnant women having them cut open, or their babies torn from their arms. Things that should've sounded like the horror stories South Pyongan tried to freak Kangwon out with around the campfire, but had very much happened, even in his province, where the Second Corps had kept part of it free.

"The Americans won't come back," Kangwon assured her. "Our army won't let them. They're negotiating with us because they know they have no chance at another ground invasion."

Ri Song-hwa didn't look convinced. He didn't blame her.

"It's just..." Her eyes closed. "They're so tiny. In my dream, they're so small, the cubs. And they're biting me and it hurts, but all I can think about is getting them away before the planes come. But I- I never can."

She looked down at her hands, spreading the thin fingers in her lap.

"What if I keep them, but I can't keep them safe?" she asked hoarsely. "What if I lose them anyway?"

"What if you don't?" Kangwon returned. "What if your husband gets to come home to you and two healthy sons?"

Ri Song-hwa let out a shaky breath, and he climbed to his feet.

"It's up to you," he told her. "It's your choice. But you'll have to make it soon. You said your husband left for the army three months ago, and my examination confirmed you're around thirteen weeks. You're exiting your first trimester, and an abortion will be harder on your body after it."

Some doctors might have a problem performing one at all soon, even Kangwon, though more out of concern for Ri Song-hwa herself. Yun Jin-suk had been a special- and hopefully one-time-case.

The woman stayed quiet, carefully stroking her stomach, and Kangwon turned away, using a small notepad on the flimsy folding table to write a note.

"Here." He held it out to her. "Comrade Korea will be heading back to Pyongyang in a couple days. I'll get him to send someone from the Mobile Medical Corps to see you, either to perform an abortion, or give you a check-up, whatever you decide. But if you do decide to keep them, give this to your local ri Party chairman. It'll let her know to make sure you get taken care of, set up with the extra rations and everything."

Ri Song-hwa hesitated, then reached up to take it, looking down at the short letter, and his lazy signature scrawled at the bottom.

"Thank you," she murmured, accepting the arm her province gave her to help her stand.

"It's no problem," he told her. "No matter what you choose, Kangwon province'll be looking out for you."

He couldn't visit his province as much as his cousins could visit theirs, since he was tied down with medical duties. So he had to help his people where he could.

He stopped the woman before she could leave. "But Comrade Ri- if even a part of you wants to keep these children, wants to try, then I think you should."

Ri Song-hwa looked down at her stomach, the bulge hidden under the loose folds of her white blouse. Her hand ghosted across it, and she gave a small nod.

Kangwon watched her go, and was left alone with a surge of exhaustion. He leaned back, balancing himself against the cot with a hand, breathing out.

That was one of the worst parts, not just about being a doctor. The 'could have beens.' What a boy could've been if the fever hadn't damaged his brain beyond repair, what a soldier could've been if she hadn't lost her limb, then her life, what a father could've been if he hadn't been crippled, what a friend could've been if he hadn't been executed for fighting for his country. He knew if Ri Song-hwa got the abortion, she'd always regret the 'could have been,' like all mothers that lost their children, even if it would be better for her. It would be worse if her husband never made it back.

The war had made her too afraid to choose something that she'd wanted for years before it, just like it had made thousands of others too afraid. And it had cut off millions of 'could have beens.'

Kangwon forcibly stitched that mental wound closed. He couldn't be thinking thoughts like that around their soldiers. He'd save them for venting to North Pyongan over his next blood harvest after Foundation Day.

He tried to focus more on the good things the war had brought. Their relationship with China and his people was going to be coloured by it forever, in a good way, and Korea had made a close personal comrade (he thought; maybe). His cousins were being forced to resolve some of their issues from the pressure (SH and North Hamgyong excepted), and tons of people had made connections they wouldn't have without it- soldiers from Kangwon shedding blood with comrades from Chagang that probably wouldn't've met otherwise, refugees from the south that made family out of the people that took them in, PVA soldiers practically adopted by the villagers they were stationed with. And thinking of his recent check-up with Oh Tae-min and Hyun Han-jin, he was pretty sure some people had been given the chance for things that a normal life never would've allowed.

None of it made up for all the death and destruction it had wrought. But he had to focus on the good things if he wanted to keep himself from breaking down again. The important part wasn't that a doctor couldn't save a patient's limb, but that he had saved their life. And it wasn't whether or not the world would believe the ISC- it was that those scientists had cared enough to investigate in the first place, to risk their lives, and that Kangwon and his comrades had foiled America's plan to use the germs to cut their country further in half.

And it was important that no matter what Ri Song-hwa chose, her province would take care of her.

He put his hand on his shoulder, working it to slightly to loosen the muscle up, wincing as his skin crackled. He could feel the bombs pounding the coast, and the ones being dropped from the planes on their closer ridges. They'd brought the napalm back, trying to wipe out the villages around the Second Corps' suspected location to make sure their people couldn't aid them.

He hoped Korea was feeling... Okay, he knew he wasn't feeling okay. At all. But he hoped his burns weren't infected. He still hadn't let him see them, and Kim Yong-hwan had told him (with a lot of tongue clicking and hissing) that he was refusing to see her, too. He'd have to ask China to sneak a peek the next time he could.

Hey, if his Countryhuman wasn't going to let him give him a check-up after he'd said he wasn't going to cut him off, Kangwon was allowed to resort to unscrupulous methods.

His head jerked over at the sudden commotion outside, and at the words 'air strike,' he burst out of the tent.

The mountain village was bustling, soldiers milling around, guns in hand, no enemy to be seen, but holding on to the weapons anyways, needing some sort of security.

"MOVE!" someone bellowed, and Kangwon's pulse skipped as he realized who it was.

Ryang Myeong-ae muscled through the crowd, hauling a stretcher with Pak Gyuri, beelining for one of the medical tents as fast as they could. The nurses swarmed, taking it from them, faces steely as they disappeared inside with it.

The province's eyes darted around the camp, chest constricting as he couldn't find the person he was looking for.

"Get off of me!" Pak Gyuri screamed, trying to force her way through the medics. "She's my friend, I'm going with her! Comrade Freckles!"

Kangwon's heart sank at the nickname. 'No. No no no.'

He shoved through the crowd, soldiers murmuring as they watched the skies, their alarm dying down as they realized the threat was past. They were used to this.

But his heart only picked up, beating louder as he broke free from the crowd in front of the other tent.

"Who is it?" he demanded, nails itching.

Pak Gyuri swung towards him with a half-crazed look, blood pouring from several cuts on her face, sheeting down from her busted lip, one hand clamped over the bloodstained arm of her uniform.

"I didn't even see her," she babbled, eyes dazed with pain and what looked like a concussion. "I had it, I had the damn shot, but that crazy fucking bitch pushed me down the mountain. Freckles!" she screamed, lunging forward.

Ryang Myeong-ae caught her around the waist, dragging her back. She tried to say something to Kangwon, but he didn't hear it, barging into the medical tent, freezing in dread-filled resignation as he saw what he'd expected to.

Laid out on the cot, grievous burns worse than his spreading up her head, uniform charred and blackened and indistinguishable from the skin it had burned into, was Choe Kang-ok.

The medics swarmed around her, trying to remove her contaminated clothes. But the fibres were crusted into her wounds, her hat melted into her scalp.

"Freckles!" Someone slammed into him from behind, Pak Gyuri seizing hold of his arm with her good one. "Kang-ok!"

"Out!" one of the nurses snapped. "Only medical professionals in the damn tent!"

Medical professional. The words made it through the cotton dressings stuffed in his head.

Kangwon was a medical professional. He had a patient he needed to save.

"Comrade Pak, go get your arm treated," he said calmly, turning to her. It looked like she'd taken a slug from a jet's machine guns.

"That stupid cunt saved me!" the woman cried, eyes flashing with fury and grief. "I'm gonna kill her!"

"I'll take care of her," he promised, giving her a smile. "Okay? Go get stitched up, and she'll be okay."

Pak Gyuri looked past him at her friend's horribly burned body, despair filling her face.

"But-"

"Gyuri." Ryang Myeong-ae entered, taking her gently but firmly by the arm. "Get out of the doctors' way."

The woman sagged like all the fight had gone out of her, and wordlessly left the tent.

Ryang Myeong-ae looked at Kangwon, handsome face grim. "Save her, comrade. I can't lose another girl."

He nodded numbly, still smiling. "I will."

When it was just him and the medics, he took a deep breath.

"Alright," he said, turning. "We need to secure her airway in case her lungs were damaged by the napalm."

"Comrade Baek already went for the tube," one said, quickly working the incinerated hat free, using medical shears to cut through the hair melted into it, revealing more of her badly burned scalp.

"Good." Kangwon inhaled, trying to scan his patient with a doctor's eyes instead of a comrade's. "It looks like she's stopped burning, but we'll still need cold water if we want to reduce tissue damage and get her uniform off."

"We don't have cold water," one of the men stressed. "And if we take the time to sterilize the riverwater-"

"Let's take things one at a time," Kangwon said steadily. "We can't use dirty water on her. Go get some soldiers to boil a big pot."

The man sped off, and he asked, "Blood pressure?"

"Low," a nurse with two fingers to her wrist reported, tense. "Too low. I think she's going into shock. Get that IV in her."

"Comrade, we're going to need skin grafts," another said urgently, securing the intravenous in her non-burned arm.

Kangwon's fist clenched. "We don't have any." He'd checked their stores yesterday.

"Then she needs a real hospital. We'll need to contact Pyongyang. We need-"

Kangwon cut her off. "We can't get her there in time."

The two women exchanged a look that he knew the meaning of all too well. He'd given the same one to his brother and dozens of their nurses over elders with chest colds and soldiers with more shrapnel in their stomachs than organs.

The burns on Choe Kang-ok's face were nothing compared to the ones on her body, he could tell even with her uniform merged with her skin. Raw red patches pulsed through the blackened fabric where her sides struggled to rise, watery blood soaking the cot under her. She was losing too many fluids, fluids that would just keep leaking out no matter how many IVs they gave her, unless her skin was repaired. Even as he watched, her breathing started to grow thinner as she sank into shock.

She was going to die.

"Get out."

The nurses blinked. "What-?"

"Get out," he repeated, more authoritatively. "Send a telegram to every position in the Third Corps, and tell them if Comrade Korea and Comrade Chagang are there, to send them back here right away. And give me your scalpel."

After a moment's hesitation, the two women rose, one of them passing him her aid kit. They left, giving him sorrowful gazes as they did.

Kangwon's heart beat in his ear slits, the cold grip of the scalpel clutched in his palm, frigid compared to the heat inside the tent.

He could still remember the weight of that bleeding boy in his arms as his mother handed him over, entrusting him to him, trusting that he would fix him, and the weight of his hand on his back as he set out from Busan.

'We freed our country, Doc. Now comes the hard part- making it fair.'

Kangwon moved, tearing off the bandages on his arm as he stood over Choe Kang-ok with the scalpel. He lifted his hand, then brought it down, slicing open his wrist, careful to hit the veins and not the artery.

Bright blood welled crimson against russet on his own burned skin, and he quickly pressed it to her lips, forcing her jaw open so it would get in her mouth, squeezing the sides of the wound to pour as much of it as he could into her.

There was no time for a transfusion, not when she was going into shock. And he needed her conscious, at least for a second. He couldn't try the sort of thing he wanted to without asking her first.

His heart leaped as her throat moved, swallowing his blood of her own accord, her pulse picking up just slightly as his own thundered.

He knew Korea would agree with what he wanted. He knew losing Bong-nam had hurt him just as much as it hurt Kangwon, and he couldn't bear the idea of losing their niece now.

'We'll win this war, and I'll help build the country my father always dreamed of.'

Reunifying their homeland, becoming a politician or an artist or a factory worker, living a happy life with his wife and the daughter whose life so much of it he'd been absent for, having enough to eat, enough medicine, enough time, peace. All of Bong-nam's 'could have beens' had died with him.

Kangwon refused to let his daughter's die, too.

Kangwon is about to demonstrate why he never took the Hippocratic Oath. Wish him good fortune.

The woman who was mutilated by American soldiers and later gave birth to triplets is a real person. I seriously can't remember her name, but I watched a short documentary on her. When it was made, her children were still alive. If I find it again, I'll add her name to this because I think she's very cool. I also like the practice of giving a knife to women that have triplets. I think it might have started with her, but don't take that as a fact unless I find the documentary.

Planning to make births free to encourage having children just shows how our government doesn't actually care about people's well-being, just pumping out workers. 'No one needs to avoid having kids just because of the hospital bill.' No one is avoiding having children just because of the hospital bill. It's the food costs, the cram school costs, the school supply costs, the extracurriculars, the price of a respectable high school and university, and the burden of being a parent when both of you have to work full-time in order to live comfortably, and you have no time to even meet someone to be your partner because you're tired and isolated all the time, let alone raise a child. Making childbirth free is good, but it doesn't solve the problem. But capitalist nations refuse to use the solutions that would.

Also if you saw me publish this three times no you did not.

Not Enough

The road blurred in the afternoon sunlight, the red plains stretching out around the Jeep trembling like heat mirages as the hills between it and Pyongyang threatened to collapse onto the road.

North shook his head, hauling himself up in his seat, grimacing as his burns cracked. The back of his head throbbed.

Almost there. A few dozen more ri and he would be back at Jonsung Complex, able to sit in his office and look over more Liberation Day letters from his people to send the complaints to his provinces, instead of driving around the country. His body could finish replenishing what he had given away.

His thoughts tried to wander down that thorny path again, but he dragged them back, trying to find something else to worry at.

Complaints. Sip Il had been so eager to voice his.

North had passed it on after driving Kangwon and Chagang back to Pyongyang, and the mobilization to open the mountain trail would be going ahead. It wasn't a problem solved, but it would help alleviate some of the pressure on their supply lines. The young soldier's older comrade had the wrong attitude- the department that handled the suggestion had been being too bureaucratic, a classic case of an office worker not wanting to bother a superior with what they saw as a minor matter, so they dismissed it instead. And if North hadn't been told, it might have stayed dismissed, leaving their supply lines suboptimal, and fostering misdirected resentment towards Supreme Command.

He needed to hear the complaints, needed to know what their government could do better, what he could do better. He wanted his people to trust that they wouldn't be reprimanded for having criticisms, and that they would be listened to. It was why they held the mass meetings, and why he had public criticism sessions.

But he couldn't stop thinking that the correspondences on the last holiday hadn't been so bold. Had so much really changed in a year? It didn't feel like it. The battle line had barely moved, they were still stuck in a stalemate, mired in negotiations. North hadn't managed to win them victory yet, so his people's trust for him shouldn't have increased. And the only other option was-

He shook his head, skin crackling and vision smearing.

Sip Il had been right to bring it up. He was a good example of a younger soldier being comfortable enough around his Countryhuman that he could openly say not handling the matter would be stupid.

And North had handled it. No matter why the boy had been bold enough to speak, he had either been proven right or reassured.

His entire body throbbed in time with his heartbeat, too fast and light. He could feel it in that deep gash, a painless but unsettling sensation, like something was burrowing in the flesh, and under the bandage on the back of his skull. He shifted uncomfortably, and something in his pocket crinkled, making him grimace.

That stupid little letter he'd been handed by the General after he realized he wasn't going to be able to convince his Countryhuman to stay and rest with their provinces. It had came with the next batch from CCCP, selected personally for him by the Soviet, and was stamped with an axe-wielding lion on a shield, the coat of arms of Norway.

It was in Norwegian, which North couldn't read at all and never wanted to, but CCCP had provided a translation. He had skimmed it, enough to understand the gist.

It was from a man that had been at the airport when Kangwon and Gangwon were captured. He had watched the entire thing happen, the walk of shame Kangwon had described, the altercation, and his brother being pulled away from him, screaming.

He said he considered himself a Socialist, and had been outspoken against the war in Korea, but when he'd been watching Korea's provinces be illegally detained, he had only stood and watched. He said it had been keeping him up at night, and he was petitioning his government to withdraw their token force from Korea, and demand an inquiry into Gangwon's return to the south.

He said he was sorry, and to tell Kangwon that.

North hadn't decided if he would. He knew he shouldn't. His province still had too much faith in foreigners, even if he had finally admitted they couldn't trust them. But he really didn't-

There was nothing safe to think about, and nothing to do but think. North hated driving.

He shifted, unable to get comfortable, sinking his fangs into his lip as pain pulsed up his hips.

The planes were out in force today. He had seen them flying north earlier, and he could feel it now. Yesterday had been the Hwanghae Peninsula and the area around Chorweon. He'd been able to see the former from his place on the front, and the thick black clouds over Sibyon-ri and Yeoncheon to the east.

But this was fresh. He knew it, even if he could no longer tell if his burns were getting worse. They were all third-degree now. When they ate down, they ate into dead skin. And they could no longer grow out. Every single patch of skin below his neck was gone, leaving no trace of the blue of his flag. All he could feel was an unending agony that throbbed in his bones, and all he could see was blood, char, and pus. It was why Chagang had had to get involved in Kangwon's mad experiment.

His hands clutched at the wheel, his boot pressing down harder on the gas.

He had to get back to Pyongyang, back to the hospital. He needed to make sure his provinces were awake, that-

His eye flew open, suddenly realizing there was a figure standing in the road, and he yanked the wheel hard to the side to avoid hitting them, the Jeep jackknifing into the culvert with its tires screeching. The vehicle jerked forward like it was fighting back as he slammed the brake through the floor, choked to a stop before it could crush the namul growing just beyond the highway.

North almost went flying out the windshield, only stopped by his ribs slamming into the unyielding wheel before he was rocketed back into the seat, driving what little breath was left in his lungs out.

He sat for a moment, dazed, as he looked out at the shadowy particles dancing over the red earthen fields, filled with the urge to slump over sideways on the seat and go to sleep. The sun felt nicely warm on his face, an escape from the damp heat that had followed him ever since rainy season began.

Then he managed to get a full breath of air in, and jolted up, throwing himself from the Jeep and taking cover behind the hood, one hand pressed over his torso and the other gripping his pistol.

"Announce yourself!" he barked at the person over on the road.

"You know," a voice replied from too close. "As much as you say I'm a bad driver, that's two close calls I've seen you have now. Makes you think, doesn't it?"

North immediately lurched up, slamming his gun down on the flat hood.

"What the fuck is wrong with you?!" he hissed, incensed.

China arched a brow at him, already perched in the driver's seat. "Me? I'm not the one that just tried to crash their comrade's vehicle."

"Were you trying to kill me?!"

"I could ask the same thing," his comrade replied. "I made sure to step out the moment I was sure it was our Jeep coming, so I wouldn't make you test the braking system again. You were the one that chose not to stop." He sniffed, offended. "You even sped up. If I didn't know better, I would say you were planning on hitting me, but had a last minute change of heart."

North tried to remember what the road had looked like before he spotted him, but couldn't. He'd just appeared there, in a way that wouldn't be possible even for China. He would have had to see him emerge from one of the craters or from behind the old tree stumps that lined the base of the hills, but all he could remember was smears of brown and red, and her face, so familiar and so damaged.

"What was I supposed to do when someone in a mask throws themself in front of me?" he asked gruffly, holstering his Tokarev. "You could have moved when you saw I wasn't going to stop."

"And then you would have breezed right past me, and left me stranded out here all on my lonesome."

"What are you doing here anyway?" North demanded, looking around as he suddenly realized he'd just ran into China on foot over fifty ri outside of Pyongyang.

"I was getting lonely all by myself," the other man said, fauxly forlorn. "Our little butterfly lovers went off as usual, and my Tung'er abandoned me to follow your tall silent one. So I came to wait for you."

North had allowed himself a moment to hope he was concussed, but his head couldn't have came up with an answer as stupid as that. He really had been falling asleep at the wheel.

It was the blood loss, it had to be. It would be fixed after a half-night's sleep, once he returned from the coast again.

He didn't focus on it for now. "Chagang left for Kanggye?" he asked, keeping the urgency out of his voice.

"En," China said, spinning the hard plastic steering wheel with a finger. "Your little doctor is awake, too, waiting for your second attempt at a Wonsan trip, I believe."

He shouldn't have known they were asleep in the first place, but North wasn't surprised. And he was glad to hear his provinces had woken up from the recuperative comas he had ordered them into.

The other question lurked on his tongue, but he didn't ask it. He didn't want to hear the answer from him. He didn't want to hear it at all.

"Interesting that I found you on the southern highway, though," his comrade said idly. "Your army is stationed in the east. I would've thought you'd return on the one you left on."

North looked away. He didn't question how China knew where he'd been. He had met with members of his Mobile Command, and his comrade knew everything they knew. The three days after while he had finished his tour had been enough time for their Countryhuman to hear.

"How are my comrades?" the other country asked.

Exhausted, battered, clinging to the line with their teeth and nails as they were bombarded by artillery and bombs. And he couldn't help but feel like there had been resentment in their eyes as he joined them in their holes, no matter how friendly they acted. Even if they had came here to help... his people, they had to resent that they were still helping.

"Working hard," he bluntly replied.

His jaw ached, waiting for China to bring up the letters he still hadn't read.

But he just nodded, satisfied. "I hope you visited them because you wanted to reward them for their efforts, and not because you were on a self-flagellation tour. You shouldn't be punishing yourself when your birthday is coming up."

"I don't punish myself," North muttered, looking away. "And the Day of the Foundation of the Republic isn't my birthday."

"Mmm."

He almost passed on that he'd told the Chinese soldiers their Countryhuman had written to say he was proud of them, but bit his tongue. The other country didn't need to know that.

"Get out of my seat," he said instead. "I need to get back to Pyongyang."

"I was thinking you could take me down to the front," China said, swivelling in the seat as he came around the side. "Seeing as you snuck off to visit my comrades without me."

"You are going nowhere near the front." North swatted the leg he'd stuck out to stop him. "If America's pattern keeps up, he's going to be back at the table in a few days. I'm not giving him an excuse to stretch the recess out."

"We both know he doesn't need one. What's that, by the way?"

He reached for the Korean's head, who ducked away irritably.

"I thought you were doing a good job keeping your empathetic burns below your collar," the other nation said, even though North had nothing to do with where they spread.

His hand twitched, but he stopped it before it could touch the bandage on the back of his head.

"It isn't a burn," he muttered, hating that some of his people might think it was. He would need to wear his flatcap until it healed.

"Oh?" China smiled. "Slip and bump your head?"

North grimaced at him, but didn't tell him the truth. He'd had Kangwon tell him about the blood, but this... He would tell him if it worked. If it didn't...

His chest tightened, and as China stretched out his long leg to plant his foot on it, trying to keep him away from the Jeep, he angrily smacked it down.

"China, I don't have time for this. Get-"

He stiffened, biting down as a wave of pain rocked his body, burning under the skin. The cords on his neck strained with the force of keeping his jaw locked as he tried to ride it out.

It didn't fade, growing worse, and he jerked around, fisting his hand on his thigh, digging into the bandages under his uniform, trying to draw feeling from the dead nerves to overwhelm that in the live ones.

"Ssi-bal," he growled, fighting to sound angry instead of strained. "When did you leave? Do you know which targets are being hit?"

China didn't answer, and he spun around to see him examining his nails.

"China," he said lowly. "What is being bombed?"

His comrade sighed, looking north. "Pyongyang."

North whirled in the same direction, but couldn't see anything past the Kosan Hills. More blasts burned in his skin.

"How bad?" he demanded.

"Bad enough that I biked all the way here to catch you before you could drive into it."

Ssi-bal. It would have taken almost two hours to bike from there, but the bombing hadn't ended.

North tensed as he thought of all the jets he had seen flying in from the aircraft carriers off the coast, soaring north. He had watched several veer off to strike Hwanghae, so assumed they were hitting multiple targets.

But it looked like another all-out raid on Pyongyang.

"I think it's safe to say his steel production has fully recovered," China said softly.

Of course. Because America could import as many materials as he wanted, his companies stripping them from Peru and the Philippines and a dozen other places, an unending stream of supplies along lines that weren't being bombed, or even harassed. Now that his workers were back on the factory conveyor belts, his weapons production was back to being unlimited.

Even if he had ran out entirely, North knew the Yankee would have been fine. There would have been countries lining up to ship more steel to him so he could use it to keep destroying Korea, content to line their pockets at the expense of his people.

"Move," North ordered, storming the Jeep. "We need to get back there."

China didn't budge from the seat. "I actually came to make sure you'd stay away. I don't think you should be there right now."

North saw a flash of Hae's face as she offered to come to the hospital with him, and heard Chagang repeat those stupid fucking words from Han Eun-gol, and rage surged inside him.

"You do not tell me where I need to be!" he hissed in the foreigner's face. "Pyongyang is my capital and it is being bombed. I need to be there. And I do not need coddling."

China tipped his head at him. "I wouldn't give you the disservice of coddling you. It's more not wanting you to drive directly into an air raid over a plateau with no cover on it."

He knew that was a fucking lie. He wanted him to stay here for the same reason Hae had wanted to come see the injured children with him, because he thought he couldn't handle it, because he thought he would lose it and start fraying like he had back in July as they watched the Rubber Factory burn. He thought North couldn't take it and even if that wasn't the same as if his provinces thought that, it still made him want to hit him.

"Move!" he barked, jumping into the Jeep and shoving China aside bodily.

The other country caught himself before he could fall into the gap between the seats, settling into the passenger side as North threw the vehicle into reverse, gunning it out of the ditch and back onto the road.

"So you won't take me to the front, but you will take me into an active aerial bombardment?" China asked, arching a brow. "Your concern for my well-being seems to come and go."

North hesitated before he could tear down the highway, even though his foot quivered with the force of resisting the urge. "You should stay here," he said stiffly.

"And trust you not to get our Jeep bombed?" he asked. "I don't think so. I have a feeling you would make me foot the bill. Let me get my bicycle, and we can go on your little suicide mission."

"It isn't a suicide mission," North snapped as he leaped lightly from the Jeep. "You made it through."

"A bicycle is a much less tempting target than a military vehicle."

North grit his teeth. He knew it was dangerous, he knew they'd be on a open stretch of highway for over a half hour, a perfect target for any jets sweeping away from Pyongyang to refuel or towards it to destroy.

But he couldn't just sit in the countryside while his city was bombed, not when it looked like this would be another day and night raid. He couldn't listen to the bombs fall in the distance, knowing they were killing his people but unable to do anything about it. He couldn't.

It had been hard enough to let the Chinese soldiers keep him from joining the battle. He'd only been able to because he had told the General he wouldn't go off anymore, and he had to stop letting his emotions get the better of him.

And he couldn't let any more of China's comrades die trying to keep him safe.

China kept himself in front of the Jeep as he fetched his borrowed bicycle from the side of the road, looking back at North as he did, making sure he wasn't about to drive away without him.

He should. He should leave him here, it would be safer.

But he couldn't. He would rather he got bombed at his side than kidnapped by some airdropped enemy guerrilla. At least it would give him an excuse to send him home.

The other country arranged the bike on the back bench, then hopped back in.

"You should let me drive," he offered. "I'm sure I could outrun any Shooting Stars."

North had already hit the gas, the Jeep roaring down the highway. He didn't answer.

He needed to drive. He needed to have his hands around the wheel, feel the engine thrumming through him, or he was either going to pass out or start screaming.

The world blurred worse now, their speed turning it into streaks of red earth and blue sky that streamed by them like banners, then grey and brown as they shot through the pass, bursting from the Kosan Hills like a bullet from the chamber. North's eye zeroed in on the horizon, instantly seeing what had been hidden from him by the hills, the enormous swarm of planes over his capital, dipping and diving like a murder of deranged crows.

The road stretched out, long and exposed, across the flatland that had given Pyongyang its name, the only disruptions to the expanse the small hills to their right, sparse and far from the road, offering no shelter, nowhere to hide if one of those distant specks decided to use its guns on its way back to its carrier.

The burns on the pad of North's foot cracked as he pressed the gas pedal into the floor.

He drove like China, though straight as an arrow instead of veering around like he was considering off-roading, going fast enough to turn a thirty-minute drive into twenty.

They made it without encountering anything more than a reconnaissance plane that tested its guns on them, but didn't pursue after its shots went wide as they swerved.

The earth quaked and tremored, deafening blasts ringing out over Pyongyang as they entered the shadow of the circling murder of jets. As they neared the neighbourhood on the south side of the Taedong, mud splattering from under their tires, a ball of fire bloomed from the city center, smoke pluming up towards the sky, reaching for the swarm of planes.

North's eye flicked between them like he was marking them for a sniper, identifying British craft and those with the insignia of Rhee's air force, Yankee machines bought on loans and slapped with an eagle that could have belonged on their former owner's flag, among the American-owned Skyraiders and Corsairs, and other fighters and light bombers.

"Do you have any idea how you're going to hide the Jeep?" China asked as they shot for the pontoon bridge across the Taedong, thankfully not destroyed yet. When North didn't answer, he said, "You're aware I don't have insurance on this, correct?"

"Shut up."

China sighed. "Ah, and here comes a plane. It was nice having private transportation while it lasted."

"Shut up." North hunched over the wheel, gripping it hard enough to hurt as their wheels slammed down on the wooden planks of the bridge, rattling along the floating rafts, locked on to the far shore, and a Corsair swept in on black wings.

Bullets peppered the bridge, shards of wood filling the air. North took one hand off the wheel, seizing China by the collar and slamming him down onto the floor without taking his eye off their destination, just as they were bombarded by the metallic crunch of rounds meeting their hood. One pinged off the edge of their windshield. The glass didn't break, but more came tearing through the canvas roof and out the back.

As another shot by his head close enough to hear the whine, North briefly regained the clarity of mind to realize that this had been too reckless. He should have left China on the outskirts.

But there was no going back. He could only shove the other man down as he tried to sit back up, and keep his foot on the gas.

The engine whined, the bridge clattered, and artillery blasted along the river, driving off the fighter jet before it could come back around. They hit the bank, the Jeep jumping as they transitioned from wood to mud, North's body screaming as he was slammed down in his seat, sending a wave of agony up his spine.

He didn't stop at the defenders around the bridgehead, not wanting to bring a target right into their midst. He shot through, straight into the maze of rubble, looking for somewhere to stash the vehicle.

An explosion roared nearby and rubble rained down on them, chunks of cement cracking the windshield and bouncing off the canvas. Jets screamed past as a wing of Panthers shot overhead, pumping the anti-aircraft defenders to the north full of bullets, softening them up to clear the way for the bombers on their heels.

"Invaders," China noted, tense, and North almost said 'I noticed' before hearing a sour note emerge from the discordant harmony around them and realizing what he meant.

He shot a brief glance over his shoulder, confirming that two B-26 Invaders had broken off and were sweeping right for them, before fixing his eye on the road, needing to focus to keep them from crashing.

As they reached a side street, he yanked the wheel hard to the right, the Jeep screeching in protest as it made the sharp turn, and the jets went roaring by.

But there was nowhere to hide in the flattened sea of debris, and they were still in full view as the planes wheeled back around, coming in for another pass.

'Ssi-bal, ssi-bal, ssi-bal.'

North took a another sharp turn away from the river, not wanting to pin them between the water and the city. Bullets rained from twelve guns, filling the air with puffs of smoke and clouds of shrapnel as the Invaders went by again, and again, chasing the Jeep as it tore through the ruined streets, over chunks of rubble and through any side streets he could find, following his mental map.

They were toying with them, using their guns when they could just drop their bombs and end them, trying to play cat and mouse in his city. North could almost hear the Yankee pilots joking over their radios, competing to see which would be the one that took the kill, and it filled what blood was left in his veins with fire.

They didn't know it was the Korean and Chinese Countryhumans down here. For all they knew it was one of his people they were terrorizing, watching them like a child watched an ant, just waiting to burn it with a glass. It made him want to-

"They're coming back," China said, twisted in his seat. "Comrade, I think it might be time to ditch the Jeep."

"No." North wasn't going to be the reason his ally lost another vehicle.

"I promise you don't have to pay me back for it."

"I said no!" North snarled, then they rounded another corner and he saw what he had been dreading.

The street was blocked with rubble that hadn't been there when he'd left, stacked cairns of stone and cement from the past raid had tumbled down into the street with the force of the bombings, creating a barricade. The bombers whined from behind them, coming in fast.

"Ssi-bal." He tried to lift his foot, but China's slammed down on it, keeping it on the gas as he seized the wheel from North.

"Get off!" the Korean hissed, trying to wrest it back.

"Take your foot off that pedal and we get blown up," China said, voice tight. "I can get us past this, just trust me. Please, comrade," he added as North hesitated.

He tightened his grip on the wheel, the drone growing louder, vibrating his meat on his bones. Then he tore his hands away.

He was not getting blown up again. Kim Yong-hwan wouldn't let him live it down.

"Keep your foot on the gas." China shifted over, half-standing as he leaned over the wheel, eyes fixed on the blockade they were barreling towards.

As it got rapidly closer, every instinct in North's body screamed at him to slam the brakes or take the wheel back from China, loud enough that he had to sink his nails into his palms and turn away to focus on the planes about to reach them.

Then suddenly China's elbow hit him in the ribs as he wrenched the wheel sideways, there was a mechanical scream as their back end swung around, and the world around him was spinning. The chassis of the Jeep shuddered as it smashed into something, followed by a moment of weightlessness.

North had time to think 'Damn it, China,' before their vehicle slammed back onto the ground, tires squealing with the stench of burned rubber as the other country pulled the wheel hard to the side again.

Then they were moving forward, not stopping as the rounds from the aerial machine guns punched holes in their bumper.

North's eye flew open, incredulous, as he realized they had somehow made it over the blockage and were speeding down the street again, China expertly dodging piles of rubble. He jerked over to see him grinning at him wide enough to expose the yellow spots on his canines.

"How did you do that?" he demanded, glancing back to make sure the barricade hadn't been blown up without him noticing.

"What can I say?" His comrade laughed, eyes glowing. "I'm a good driver. Now where to?"

"We'll try to make it to Moran Hill." North shifted over so China could climb onto his seat to hold the wheel better, sitting half on his lap. "We might be able to hide the Jeep there."

But they didn't make it. For a few streets he used his mental map of the city to send China north, evading the B-26's chasing them, and the bombs that fell nearby, obscuring their sight with rolling clouds of dust that burst through from side streets.

But as they caught sight of Taedongmun towering above the rubble, the bombers grew bored. They were a straight shot for the hill now, but the Invaders came in fast, one veering off to wheel around in front of them, spraying the open ground with rounds and forcing China to drift sideways, away from cover. The other came in from behind, and North's jaw creaked as he watched its black-painted belly point up as it ascended, putting distance between itself and the ground.

"China," he said tightly.

His comrade's hands tightened on the wheel. "Almost there."

"China!"

Screw it. North refused to get blown up again.

He wrapped his arms around China's waist, heaving them both sideways and out of the Jeep. He tried to cushion him, but at the speed they were going when they landed they tumbled. North heard a loud 'snap!' as he hit the mud and had time to hope it was his ribs and not his comrade's before his head was slamming into the ground, making his vision flash white as they rolled away.

There wasn't any time to recover. The moment they stopped moving, he surged up, hissing as pain cramped his chest and the white turned to black, the particles eating up his vision as he staggered, trying to find China but only seeing darkness.

A hand grabbed his, and then he was half running, half being dragged somewhere. He instinctively tried to tear free until China's muted voice shouted, "Comrade, I appreciate the dedication, but I care more about us being blown up than the Jeep!"

That was good, because the Invader had done what he'd known it would, aiming for where they would be instead of where they were,

and even though the vehicle had slowed somewhat without North crushing the gas pedal, it still shot directly into the hundred-pound bomb that dropped from the bomber's underwing, exploding in a burst of fire and thick black smoke.

North didn't see this, too busy being shoved behind the granite base of Taedongmun. His back met the wall as China tried to press him into it, but his head spun, sending him to his knees. His comrade followed him down, trying to wrap his arms around him for some reason. North was trying to thrash free when his vision went again, replaced by a plume of fire as it roared through the tunnel under the gate, followed by choking smoke. It filled his mouth, scorching his throat and sucking the oxygen from his lungs, leaving him unable to breathe. The stone behind them shook, something cracking overhead.

Then everything went still, the only sound the ringing in his head, the only motion the roiling of smoke. He still couldn't breathe, and now his thoughts were melting together like molten steel, dribbling out of his ear slits. Hands grabbed at his body and panic shot through him, before he realized it was still China, a blurry olive shape in the smoke, a flash of red where his scarf had slipped.

He reached out, trying to cover his comrade's face like he had in Seoul, but just ended up slumping over onto the ground.

"Don't touch me," he couldn't hear himself slur, only felt the words rumble in his skull.

The hands obeyed, letting go, only for a spike to stab through his brain a second later.

North lurched up, coughing and choking as he was suddenly able to breathe and think again, spitting smoke-stained saliva on the muddy ground before glaring at China and his little vial of smelling salts.

"Sorry," his comrade said, not sounding it. "But we need to get under the gate before the smoke clears."

North dragged himself over, hiding under the arched tunnel with him as the B-26s circled, waiting to see if they'd eliminated their target. The smoke was thicker in the confines, and the moment he stopped moving, his vision blurred again, only clearing when the smelling salts hit him once more.

"Just a question," China said while he hacked, trying to clear his throat. "But when your provinces were checked into the hospital to recover from their blood loss, were you perhaps also supposed to be there?"

North put his hand over the crook of his arm, protecting the patch that covered his track marks, even though they couldn't be seen past his uniform or the burns.

"And let me guess- you haven't been eating anything to even attempt to replenish yourself?"

"None of your business," the Korean muttered.

He had. He had given in and eaten one full serving of the rice ration a day, trying to recover his blood cells and stop making the edges of his vision go dark every time he stood up or turned his head too fast.

He was starting to realize he hadn't been as successful at that as he had thought.

"So if I understand-" Something in China's smile looked tight. "You have been driving across the country for the six days, touring active combat zones, while suffering from severe blood loss and starvation. Alone."

"No," North said flatly, though that was exactly right.

His comrade stared at him for a long moment, then said, "I wonder if your General ever thinks about throttling you."

"He does not." But his provinces probably did.

"You understand why your denials about being suicidal continue to ring hollow, right?"

"I am not suicidal," North growled irritably.

"Then perhaps you should bring a comrade with you the next time you do something stupid."

"No."

Outside, the drone overhead grew distant as the Invaders finally flew away, off to bomb other parts of the city.

North tipped his head back against the cool stone, feeling his skinned head pulse against it, trying to suck in a breath that was more air than ash, and not succeeding. Then he dragged himself to his feet.

"Maybe you should- And there he goes."

He staggered away from China, trying not to balance himself on the wall or hold his aching ribs. He had allowed his light head to make him stumble. He needed to stop being so weak around the foreigner.

Smoke still eddied outside as he stumbled around the side of Taedongmun, being met with the sight of the burning skeleton of the Willy's MB Jeep lying mangled in a crater, more debt added to the pile of what he already owed China.

He turned on numb feet, looking up at Taedongmun. It was still standing, the detonation too far away to destroy it, but the colourful wood was soot-blackened, and several of the tiles had shattered. The crack he'd heard had been one of the pillars that supported the second story being splintered by the force of the blast, jagged splinters sticking out like broken bones.

North looked up as China came to stand behind him, watching the hundreds of planes circle high above, finding the old gate so they knew where their next target was in the sea of rubble, before soaring off to destroy it. The bombs shuddered through his boots as every bit of debris in his capital was ground down again and again, over and over.

They had already been being hit hard these past two weeks. The 20th had seen thirty-eight Superfortresses swarm the city, and hundreds of tons of bombs, making sure their manufacturing district and supply storages couldn't recover, just like they were today. It had happened again on the 21st, and the 23rd. The rains had stopped them for a day, but on the 25th they were back for more marshalling yards and storage areas, and the few parts of their factories they had managed to rebuild since last month, cutting highways, severing railways, sending their bridges crashing back into the Taedong.

And that was only Pyongyang. It wasn't counting the hundreds of buildings, dozens of villages in Hwanghae, the marshalling yards near the front and in Sinuiju, the Sariwon Cement Factory, the entire village of Namyang-ri, the Hamhung factory that produced most of their grenades, the Kyomipo Steel Mill, the supply lines between Chongjin and Wonsan, the fucking hydroelectric plants at Lake Changjin again, Pukchon, Kansong, Kangdong, all along the front. North had huddled in foxholes with Chinese soldiers as the earth shook around them and their comrades died outside, he had ran into the smoke and fire to drag those comrades back when they couldn't afford to, and watched them mourn, and the bombs had never stopped. There wasn't anything of real worth left in Pyongyang but his people and still the bombs never fucking stopped. If they couldn't find a target then they just invented one. A village could house soldiers, a straw hut could be used to store weapons, a bridge that hadn't been repaired might be soon. It wasn't a successful sortie unless something burned, even if there was nothing left to.

North leaned down, picking up a piece of bomb shrapnel, still hot to the touch.

It wasn't enough to turn his country to bones and rubble. America and his puppets wanted to destroy everything, to leave nothing but ash. And then he would fly in to erase Taedongmun too, when it no longer served a purpose.

And no one would stop him.

"Why aren't they here?"

"Pardon?" China asked.

North turned, still clutching the shrapnel in his hand. "If all the people that wrote those letters care, then why aren't they here?"

"Comrade-"

"Why aren't they rising up against their governments?" North snapped, the words he'd been holding back since reading those letters tearing out. "Why aren't they going on strike and protesting conscription, or refusing to make the weapons that are being used to kill my people? Why aren't they filling the streets and shutting down their production and at least trying to make them listen?"

China stared steadily at him. He knew why.

"My people fought the Occupation," North growled. "They organized, they protested, they fought. They cobbled together weapons by hand and went up against an army that outweighed them in everything except will. And the ones that couldn't take up arms shut down cities and factories, they cut off the Japs' supply and refused to feed their war machine. We fought however we had to, even if it got us imprisoned, even if it killed us, because we cared."

'Your country is an inspiration to all of us.'

The shrapnel cut into his fingers, soaking the bandages with fresh blood.

He didn't want Korea to be an inspiration, he didn't want to be a symbol of resistance or a beacon of hope to foreigners that had never had to resist themselves. He wasn't like China with his grand ambitions of being a red star in the East. He had only ever wanted to be that for his people.

The General had said that they weren't just fighting to Liberate their nation, but for the peace of all the world, that they would defend it to the last. But why should they? Why should North's people have to give their lives for the peace of those that were too weak and cowardly to fight for it themselves, or to do anything more than write letters, like he was a mercenary they couldn't even be bothered to pay with money? Why should they add their banner to their cause, fight for their peace, when they had never fought for Korea's?

"If they care about Korea then why aren't they doing anything?" he demanded, voice raw from the smoke. "Why can America get away with poisoning my people and destroying everything we ever worked for and violating international law without anyone lifting a fucking finger to stop him? Why does he have seventeen armies willing to eradicate my people for him, sixteen damn countries willing to sell him anything he needs and send their soldiers to die while slaughtering mine, and all I have is you?"

China gave him a sorrowed look, killing North's snarl on his face.

"I didn't mean it like- Ssi-bal." He spun in a tight circle, wanting to bash his skull of the granite gate until one of them cracked.

"I appreciate your soldiers," he said, spinning back, even though he didn't want to face him. But the faces of the 63rd Army and all those he'd met down at the front were burning in his mind. "I didn't visit them to punish myself, I visited them because I wanted them to know that Korea- that I am incredibly thankful for everything- they have done for us. I just-"

He snarled in frustration, holding the sharp edge of the metal tighter. He should just say what he wanted to say, but he couldn't.

"I know," China said quietly, stepping closer. "It's alright."

"It isn't!" North hissed as his city shook and his skin burned. "My people are dying, my country is being destroyed, and no one fucking cares!"

No one ever had. The world hadn't changed at all since 1910, when Korea had been annexed and not a single country had done anything more than protest meaninglessly. The majority had supported it, America giving it his approval and making agreements in private even as he paid lip service to disapproving in public. And even the ones that had been against it had came around, making deals with Japan, buying the materials and goods he had worked North's people like slaves to mine and make, moving their companies to his land to pay taxes to the Japanese and strip his resources away just like them, the exact same damn thing they would do if America won.

The world might have CCCP now, but what good was he if he was hobbled by the atom bomb? He could sell him planes and lend him pilots and teach his, he could bring canned goods and fucking letters, and the other Socialists could donate food and take in his orphans and none of it changed anything. None of it changed that they weren't willing to do anything more than hope he would win, because if he didn't there would be one less country for them to trade with. Profit was a good enough lure for the capitalist nations to sacrifice their people for, so care should be enough for Socialists. North loved his people more than anything and would never speak to another foreigner again if he had the choice, but it had been good enough for him. So why-?

"To someone that's used to fighting for what they believe in, not knowing how can look like apathy," China said, not looking away as a bomb roared from a few streets away and the earth under their feet shook.

"If they don't know how to fight, then they should learn!" North cried. "I learned, my people learned, yours learned. And now more of my children are going to have to because no one else will!"

China was quiet for a second, then said, "You're right. There isn't any excuse for inaction. There never has been. But comrade-"

He took another small step forward, North hunching as he looked him in the eyes.

"My people have learned how to fight, and they're choosing to fight for you. I know you don't take that for granted. So please don't deny what they showed you at Chorweon, either." He lowered his voice seriously. "If you still haven't read the letters from our comrades' families, and all of my countrymen, then don't say China's people don't care."

North turned his head, watching a cluster of straw huts across the river disappear in the blaze of an incendiary bomb.

"Even if no one else in the world cares about Korea, they do," China told him. "The Chinese people care about Korea. China cares."

His eyes dipped, then lifted again.

"I care."

North averted his gaze, looking down at the shrapnel in his hand, watching blood well around the distorted, jagged edges, warped beyond repair. Then he dropped it into the mud with a dull impact.

"It's not enough."

China's lips parted, then he dipped his head. "I know," he said quietly.

North walked over to still-smoldering Jeep, reaching into his pocket and pulling out the letter from Norway, tearing it methodically into little pieces, then casting them into the flames, watching them burn.

'I can't think the world is against us. I won't,' Kangwon had said.

But it was. Every capitalist and Imperialist nation in the world, the ones that held the power, was against them, and the majority just did what they were told, content to watch Korea burn so long as the flames never licked them. And the people that weren't were too useless to put the fires out. They would only stand by and watch, and apologize to the ashes after, like that Norwegian, like-

The more his provinces understood that, the safer they would be. He shouldn't have let them read the other letters and allowed them to delude themselves otherwise. China... Their Chinese comrades had written because the Koreans had once helped them, and because this had become another shared fight, even if North despised it. But the other senders had written them to assuage their own guilt, to allow themselves to pretend it was fine that they were doing nothing to stop the extermination of North's people because at least they had paid the price to post a damn letter.

But words weren't enough. They didn't change that their neighbours were the ones holding his in camps, that their countries were Yankee puppets gleefully slaughtering his people, that Pyongyang was shaking around his ear slits like the earth was about to split open and swallow it whole, or that Choe Kang-ok was-

Words didn't change anything. 'Sorry' didn't change anything.

From behind him, China said softly, "We'll keep trying to make it enough, Chaoxian."

Wordlessly, North turned, limping on feet that bled with every footstep off into the streets of his capital, burning like Seoul after his brother had given the order, to do what he always had and evidently no one else could.

Fight.

August 29th, 1952 was the largest air raid during the entire war, with one thousand four hundred and three sorties carried out against Pyongyang alone, a city where already no buildings over a story tall remained whole. I think the reason for this will become clear soon.

Also I think North deserves accolades for finally not misdirecting his rage at China, even when operating on approximately one litre of blood. It's a low bar, but he has managed to clear it.

The Old Silence

A truck painted an olive so drab it was nearly brown enough to blend in with the dying foliage on the hills rolled down the highway towards Pyongyang. Its thick, corrugated wheels crunched against the dirt like they were rolling over a boneyard, the sounds magnified by the quiet that hung over the vehicle.

The silence was familiar to SH. It was that old shroud that tasted like bitter green tea swallowed to wash away worse flavours, and sounded like a clock ticking down. It was the silence that hung over one night a week, as the door opened and blistered, rag-swathed feet stomped in, over the clink of a spoon on porcelain, chopsticks too sharp to be allowed, and filled the pauses after she asked meaningless questions, so much heavier than the total hush when she was alone.

But she was the one not answering now. She'd been so successful at it that North Hamgyong had finally given up even trying to get a reaction out of her months ago, and now they sat in the back of the troop carrier under that heavy silence, as they had all the way from when she had got in at Hamhung.

SH was no longer afraid of speaking the wrong words. There was nothing left to fall apart. North Hamgyong had already lifted the corpse cloth when he had said what he had to her, showing that it was wrapped around something that had long since rotted.

It hurt. She wouldn't pretend it didn't. That was the difference between her and him- she had wanted the body to be fresh, still capable of being revived. He didn't.

'I wish I hadn't missed.'

She couldn't help the way her eyes flicked to him, sitting on the edge of the truck bed with his back to the open road behind them, glaring at the shoes of the model soldiers they were packed in with, looking as dour as ever, worse.

One of his guards noticed, and maybe saw the dark thing stirring behind her eyes, because he shifted slightly, blocking her view with one of his legs.

The soldier next to her cleared his throat. "Looks like we're almost to Pyongyang."

Some of their comrades actually flinched at his voice. It had been since at least Yangdok that anyone had spoken.

Which was not her fault. She'd been chatting with them all the way from her capital, it was just the other province she was ignoring. It was the negative aura he was putting off that had finally killed the conversation.

"Mm." SH turned to smile at Bang Eul-sik. "Are you excited to see the capital?"

Her comrade looked down from where he was peering over the edge of the raised sides of the truck, straining for some sight of the city through the lightening sky.

"For sure," he said excitedly, before his expression sorrowed. "Beng-sung and me always said we'd see it together."

SH stood, her spine aching as it stretched, bones pushing against her crisped skin.

"You'll find her," she assured him, laying a hand on his shoulder, which now wore the broad-banded epaulet of a senior sergeant.

Korea had given her the task, but she still had to hope she wouldn't need to introduce him to Choe Jong-mi. It would be better if she could match her with another good man, and Bang Eul-sik could be reunited with the woman he already loved.

"I hope so," her comrade murmured, staring ahead, eyes brimming with sorrow.

SH heard North Hamgyong make a skeptical noise, and had to stare into the grey, too, painting back the dark with the image of someone falling off the back of the truck as it hit a bump, and cracking his skull open on a convenient rock.

They'd left the thick fogs behind at the coast, turning inland south of Hamhung, but mist still eddied here, swirling around in the awful dawn light like inkbrushed smoke around a dying fire. They'd taken the northern road, heading through the mountains for more security for their precious model soldiers, so all SH could see through the sooty grey pall was the vague suggestion of the Hyongje Mountains, spots where ink that hadn't been diluted enough had dripped on the page.

She shivered, turning pointedly away, facing their soldiers instead.

The six of them all wore the ensign of a model soldier, the little medal pinned to their breasts, awarded for their exemplary political studies and service records. They were the most model of the model, invited to the capital to celebrate tomorrow's Foundation Day to represent their companies. SH had been glad to see that one of them was a woman, passing a smoke back and forth with the man next to her as she idly twirled one of her braids around a finger.

Bang Eul-sik's entire company was a model one, with his platoon in particular standing out. They'd fulfilled the requirements for the designation while on coastal defense, scoring high points on their tactical, shooting, and political training, taking perfect care of the State's equipment, advancing Party education and maintaining strict discipline, and taking good care of their soldiers. They had the right to fly a model company flag now, and had upheld it.

There were too many names SH didn't recognize when Bang Eul-sik had listed them to her, and too few she did. But at least Kim Kwon-chol was still alive (and chain-smoking), along with a few others from her time in Hamhung on the temporary retreat.

"What about you comrades?" she asked the soldiers here, her voice bright and cheery to offset the creeping dawn, and North Hamgyong's gloom. "Are you looking forward to seeing Pyongyang?"

The woman- Jon Yong-hui- brightened. "Sure am! My ma's always wanted to go, but we never had the money fer the trip. I'm hopin' I can git a picture to send back fer her."

"You'll have your picture taken for being model soldiers, so I'm sure you'll be able ter. To," SH corrected, flushing.

The thick accent that dripped from Jon Yong-hui's words, from the northern part of their province, was contagious.

The woman laughed as the others chimed in, each saying what they were looking forward to- the Taedong, Moran Hill, the old city gates.

"Not that there's any of Pyongyang left to see," North Hamgyong muttered.

"The landmarks are all still there," SH said, louder. "If it was spring, you'd even be able to see all of the Eight Views."

Except for monk-spotting at Yongmyong Temple. Some of the Buddhists had survived, but the temple hadn't.

"I'd like to see the moon from Pubyok Pavilion," Bang Eul-sik said wistfully, staring out at the mist. "But I think I'll wait."

"I feel a bit like I'm killing the mood," one of the men said when it was his turn. "But I'm hoping to see if I can find my sister. She's been missing since the American occupation. We were from Chunghwa, so I'm sure she would've either gone to Pyongyang to try and lay low with the crowds, or at least stopped on her way through. I'd like to ask around, put the word out, y'know?"

SH's heart ached, but before she could ask for the woman's name, someone else spoke.

"She's probably dead."

Rage pierced the wall like a bullet, the dark thing thrusting its maw through, as SH's nails sunk into her palms.

North Hamgyong, of course, curling his lip as he finally looked up, like he was disgusted the man could even consider he had a chance of finding his family.

She should've taken more time to try and stop the gap with paint, but the shocked faces of their soldiers didn't give her the time.

"She is not!" she snapped, and their comrades' heads jerked towards her, almost looking more taken aback.

She sucked in a breath, painting the sprays of blood on the rock brighter, splattering across the road and the hole, before pasting a smile on her face.

"Excuse Comrade North Hamgyong," she said to the soldier in a softer voice. "He's just returned from Chongjin, and you know how it is on the coasts. He's not in high spirits right now."

North Hamgyong grimaced, and she did, too, hating that she had to make excuses for him when she knew that's what they were. He was always like this, whether it was coming back from the ship-blasted coast and the rubble of his capital or waking up first thing in the morning on a holiday.

"It's... It's okay," the man managed after a moment. "I know it's- I know it's a long shot. It's been so long..." His eyes dipped to the floor, before he shook his head. "But I have to try. I told her I'd come home some day, and I did. Now it's my job to bring her home. Even if..."

He trailed off, and Jon Yong-hui patted him on the back, offering him her cigarette.

"You'll bring her home," SH said firmly, as he took a shaky drag. "Alive."

The soldier gave her a thankful smile. North Hamgyong's eyes darkened, and he opened his mouth, but one of his bodyguards leaned over, whispering something in his 'ear,' and he shut it, glowering at him.

SH wished their guards had been with them in that alleyway, to stop those words from ever leaving his mouth.

No. It was good that he'd finally said them. It was good she didn't have to waste any more time and energy on someone who wouldn't change, or any compassion and care on a man who had never had any for her. It had allowed her to finally cut herself free from that anchor.

The silence fell back over the truck, even heaver than before, as they crossed the final ri to Pyongyang.

SH simmered, studiously avoiding catching even a glimpse of pine green as she painted the wall over with the same bloody reds and blacks she used on her real paintings.

She'd been doing good at holding back her anger around the male province, refusing to give in and let the thing out when he tried to shove his verbal splinters under her skin. You wanted the people you cared about to be good people that thought good things about you, so it hurt when they didn't. But you expected an awful person to have awful feelings and say awful words, so it was easy to ignore them, to let them shatter off the wall. It was easier than before anyway.

But he had gone too far today.

But for a moment, as they left the hills behind and crossed the bridge over the Taedong's tributary to round Moran Hill, and the mist was burned away by the rising sun, revealing the city across it, the dark thing stilled. Not in peace, but horror.

At her side, Bang Eul-sik sucked in a breath. "Dear god," he whispered.

Pyongyang spread out before them like a vast lake of debris, painted in browns, greys, and blacks, all the colours SH used sparingly in her motivationals. She could see all the way across the city to the plains and western hills, the view only interrupted by the occasional cluster of chosonjips or mud huts, and a few twisted steel towers. Every single smokestack was gone, even the ones that had been hanging on before, leaning or standing over a factory that wasn't there. The south of the city blocked the sight of the Taedong's bend, but not with houses. Instead a jumbled mess of factories and dormitories, a sea of spires and confusing shapes lined the horizon like blobs of paint slapped haphazardly on a canvas. The shell of Moranbong Theatre was entirely crumbled now, chunks of white stone and broken pillars spread out at the base of Moran Hill. Korea would not be giving tomorrow's speech on the steps.

Every time she was sure that no more damage could be inflicted on their cities, that there was nothing left to destroy, she always returned to find that America had managed it. The last time she'd visited Hamhung, it had been a collection of houses encircling the decimated center. When she had arrived three weeks ago, it was nothing but a smoking crater between the hills that were supposed to shelter it, and her people now had to hide in like animals. And Hungnam... She hadn't been supposed to get so close to the coast alone, but she'd climbed the hillside above it, needing to encourage at least some of the defenders keeping her capital free and her safe from South's mind-r- the Commands.

It was a charnel ground. The only things that belonged in it were ruined homes and soon-to-be-dead soldiers, completely at the mercy of those stupid ships floating just out of reach, firing their unending stream of death. Even as SH watched, more blood had soaked her land, filling her with a fury that yearned to be spent, but couldn't be turned to anything more than trying to solve the problems of her people that still lived.

Hungnam was death. It had been ever since the Yanks devastated it on their retreat, tossing it aside once they'd drained all use from it. And every time she came back to Pyongyang, it grew a little closer to looking just like it.

One thousand four hundred and fifty sorties, the largest air assault of the war so far. That was the estimate that had came through with Korea's telegraph. 'Aug 29th sor 1450,' the blunt update that had allowed him to justify 'wasting' paper to tell her and the others that he'd made it through.

But she knew it wouldn't have been unscathed. Even though she had burns on her head where Korea didn't, she knew his were worse than hers overall. And her own body was...

Sometimes when she looked down at it, it didn't feel like hers. Just a chunk of meat that managed to be raw and burnt at the same time, whose nerves wouldn't even respond when she tried to prod pain from them. She had to move her fingers and remaining toes one by one, making sure they obeyed, before the queasy, panicked feeling would release her from its grip, and the dark thing gave her at least a chance to paint it away.

She had to change and bathe even quicker than she usually did now. She wasn't sure how Korea did it at all.

The thing stirred from its stupor as she soaked in the destruction of their city, and she swiftly wielded her brush to paint a fireball spiralling from the sky with burning Yankees in it between her and the dark before it could break free. Rage was the right thing to feel when the Capital of the Revolution was laid out before her like some hideous Western abstract 'art,' but she couldn't let their soldiers see that she was so affected by it.

"I know it looks bad," she said brightly. "But all the important factories are still underground." She painted a pale man taking a grenade to the face as she saw the aftermath of her munitions factory. "And Pubyok Pavilion is still around."

She hoped. She couldn't see it from this side of the hill. For all she knew, it could've gone the way of Yongmyong Temple, and the Rubber Factory and the Paper Mill and the Synthetic Fibres Factory and-

"And like General Kim Il-sung says- 'Mankind is the most precious being in the world. No matter how much the enemy may destroy, it can be restored, so long as there are people.'"

SH tried to paint the quote on the wall to muffle the thing's growling, but it just made it louder, the way Hwang had at Hungnam, as he tried desperately to stop her from giving that Yank man what he deserved.

'We can rebuild again, to even greater heights.'

They could, and they would. But it didn't change the fact that the destruction had happened, was still happening, and that their most precious things, the lives of their people that they had lost, couldn't be rebuilt or restored. And that even for so many that survived, who they'd been before couldn't be either.

Her eyes slid to the side, to North Hamgyong, staring at the city with that useless look on his face, not even bothering to hide what he was feeling from their people.

Some things just couldn't be fixed.

"We still have our people." SH dragged her gaze back to the ones in front of her. "And you'll all have the honour of seeing Pyongyang like this, so what we'll turn it into after we win will shine even brighter."

She smiled at North Hamgyong, daring him to give another pessimistic comment. She'd just love to tell Korea. With his fuse cut even shorter lately, it wouldn't be pretty.

For the male province, anyway. She would love to paint it on the wall.

But he kept his mouth shut, giving her a hateful glare. She smiled tighter.

"Comrade SH is right," Bang Eul-sik said, tearing away from the ruined city. "It's like a fresh start. The Yanks are doing the labour of tearing down all the colonial and feudalist trappings the Japanese and the monarchy left behind for us, so we don't have to waste money on it. All we have to do is build new buildings, ones for the people."

'All' was a simple word when SH knew the rebuilding would take a decade at least. But she would use that the next time South Pyongan was moping over all the architecture they'd lost. Though she'd leave out the part about the feudalist trappings. Some people wanted to erase everything from their unequal past, but Korea had made it clear they were to preserve the good parts of their history. The old palaces were only wicked when grand feasts had been held in their gilded halls every night while the masses starved in chogajips outside the gates, and women had been treated like chattel inside. With the kings and princes gone, they were just beautiful buildings. Ones that raised the hair on SH's arms, like King Taejo's villa in Hamhung did, telling her great suffering had taken place there, but still beautiful. And her cousin was very firmly on the side of 'old buildings cool.' Reminding her about all the ones that had been destroyed wouldn't do any good. But the Japanese buildings? That could lift her spirits.

"Mhm." Jon Yong-hui placed her fist over her heart as she looked away from the destruction. "I'll make sure I get my picture now, so one day I can show my kids what our glorious capital used to look like when they don't believe me."

"It won't be the capital then," one of the others pointed out. "Seoul'll be."

"Pyongyang will always be the Capital of the Revolution," the man whose sister was missing said proudly.

SH beamed as they recovered from their momentary shock and dismay to enthusiastically discuss what their hometowns would look like once they were rebuilt and improved, quickly recovering their morale, as expected of model soldiers.

North Hamgyong, predictably, was grinding his teeth and glowering. But no one cared about him, least of all SH.

They reached the city proper just as the sun's light overpowered the dawn, forcing it to slink away in retreat, and their driver stopped near Moran Hill so SH and North Hamgyong could get out. Korea should be somewhere on the other side, waiting for all the provinces to arrive so they could give their reports on their efforts in their provinces. Barring any air raid-related delays they'd probably be the last ones.

"Thank you for the good company, comrades," she said, the thing behind the wall twitching in anticipation. "Enjoy Foundation Day."

They wished her one back, and she turned to Bang Eul-sik.

"I don't think we'll have the same ride back, but it was good seeing you again, comrade. Tell Comrade Kim Kwon-chol and the others I say hello, and to keep working hard."

Her friend grinned, giving a salute. "They'll be glad to hear it, Comrade SH."

"And we'll try to organize the searching more methodically," she added. "It's just difficult right now with how chaotic everything is."

"I know," Bang Eul-sik said, more soberly. "I don't expect the State to drop everything to focus on it. But I had to write. I had to do something for Beng-sung."

He already looked so different than from when SH had first met him. The freshness was gone from his face, aging him five years when it had 'only' been two, and a thick scar curved across his forehead from a close call with a shell fired from a ship. She wondered if his fiancée would even recognize him.

She hoped he could recognize her. If she was alive, she hoped she could recognize herself.

"You are," SH assured him. "You're keeping our country free so we can go to Busan someday to find her, if she isn't in the north, and so that she'll have a place to come back to."

He dipped his head, swallowing his emotion, and she turned to the man with the missing sister, asking for her name.

"Pyeon Pok-yon," he replied, doffing his cap. "She should be eighteen by now."

SH's stomach roiled at the idea of a woman that young travelling across the country as the Yankee army advanced, alone, but she only nodded confidently.

"I'll ask around with the refugees," she promised him.

"You lucked out with your family name," Bang Eul-sik said with a tight-lipped smile. "Not many Pyeons around, not like 'Kim.' I've already heard about one Kim Beng-sung that isn't mine."

SH had found two in her search over the past year. But she hadn't told him about them after she'd confirmed they weren't his fiancée. It would just be cruel.

"I'll only count myself lucky when I see her again," Pyeon Pok-yon's brother said solemnly.

"You will," SH told him, hoping she was right.

As the truck rolled away, off to find a way to navigate the streets cluttered with debris, SH turned slowly to North Hamgyong.

"Looks like they fucked the damn marshalling yard again," he muttered, glaring across the city. "Tell Korea I'll be at the bunker tonight for my report. He's just going to order me to go fix that shit anyway. Not that there's a point."

"What was that?"

The other province swung his head over to glower at her. "Finally admitting I fucking exist?"

SH glared at him icily. "Why would you say that to Comrade Pyeon?"

He curled his lip. "Because his sister's definitely fucking dead. You know damn well the kind of shit the Yanks and their traitors would do if they caught her. And that's if she didn't freeze to death in that fucking cold-ass winter."

SH had been trying not to think the same thoughts, but him voicing them still made the dark thing growl.

"That's if they caught her," she shot back. "And if she didn't make it to Sinuiju or one of the Liberated zones in the hills."

"If she did, then why the fuck do you think she hasn't reported herself to a People's Committee to get relocated back to Chunghwa?" the man asked, irked.

"There are plenty of reasons someone might not report themselves." They felt safer where they were, they'd been forced to help the enemy and were wary of the offer of voluntary surrender, thinking they might be punished anyway, they didn't want to bother the people that could help them.

"You think a woman on her own wouldn't take advantage of the rations for a dependent?" North Hamgyong demanded. "She's fucking dead, South Hamgyong. "

The dark thing slammed into the wall, scrabbling to get to him, and SH didn't do anything to stop it.

"Even if she is, you don't have to tell him that!" she cried, advancing on him. "You can let him keep him keep believing he'll find her, that there's a hope, at least."

"What's the point?" the man snapped in her face as she bristled up at him. "The longer he holds out thinking he has any chance of saving her, the worse it'll fucking be when he realizes he can't."

The words struck the wall with full force, opening a crack that the thing gleefully dug its talons into.

It was clear now to SH why her brother had been so hopeless all those years she'd been caged, and why it hadn't lifted when they were out. Why he had made that promise.

Because he'd had nothing to fight for. At some point, he had given up on her, given up hoping she could ever be free. And she had to wonder- when? As he'd stood over her on New Year's and promised to kill her, or as the days grew colder in those last weeks, and the time on it ran out?

Or had he given up from the start? Had he made that promise with absolutely no hope in his heart that one day she would be free, only that he would get to put an end to her humiliation with his own hands?

It had taken her over four decades to finally give up on him. She had went through what she had, done what she had, for him, suffered through every single one of those days for the chance that someday they might both be free, and then put up with his cruelty for thirty-three more years because she just couldn’t stop herself from slamming her palms on the chest of that corpse, trying desperately to feel the beat of that organ inside it again, even though she knew she never would.

But had he given up on her since the very beginning?

'Then why couldn't you have just left?'

"For siblings who actually love each other, it's worse to give up." She threw the words at him like knives. "But you wouldn't know that, would you?"

His face contorted, showing his yellowed teeth as darkness flashed across his eyes.

"Neither would you," he hissed. "And you don't have any right to talk about fucking giving up. Who the fuck gave up?"

She bared her teeth up at him with the dark thing, taking a step forward that both he and it eagerly mimicked. She could see the gleam in his eye, wanting to push her to the edge, wanting to finally succeed at hurting her again, like it was the only thing that gave him any bit of satisfaction in the middle of this war, and she was the cruel one for taking it from him.

"Who gave up?" he asked again, hands balled at his sides. "Who gave up since the very first fucking day, since before we even got in there?"

'We,' like he had gone through anything close to what she had, like he couldn't have just left.

"If Korea hadn't came, who would be the reason we were both dead right now?"

"You," SH growled. "Though clearly you can't even do that right if you missed the shot I practically gave you."

His eyes flashed, jaw bulging as the tendons on his hands turned pale green.

"What's wrong?" she taunted him. "I thought that's what you told me- 'I wish I hadn't missed,' right?"

Even now, with the dark thing tearing chunks from the concrete and him looking at her with eyes brimming fury, she couldn't help but give him another chance, even if taking it back wouldn't change that he'd said it. She couldn't help but hold out hope.

But he crushed it, as always.

"You fucking bitch," he snarled, features twisting in satisfaction as he spat the word.

The thing's fangs sank into concrete and SH's teeth sank into her own flesh, filling her mouth with blood. She straightened up, glaring at the male with every ounce of fire and ice in her veins.

"I don't care what Korea says," she said coldly. "I will not be sharing a transport with you ever again. After tomorrow is over, fill out your paperwork and find your own way back to Chongjin. Alone, because I will be telling him you are a liability to have around our soldiers."

"Me?" he snorted. "You're the liability. You're the one that keeps feeding his delusions and letting him think we have a chance. You've fucking seen him lately, he's sprinting full tilt at the edge of the goddamn cliff and you're all just egging him on! What do you think happens when he realizes we don-"

The dark thing tore its upper half free of the wall with a shriek of triumph, and SH lunged forward.

But North Hamgyong's guards had moved first, one of them seizing him under the arms from behind, dragging him back as the other unobtrusively planted himself between the Hamgyongs.

"What the fuck are you doing?!" the province snarled as the man muscled him away.

"Protecting your safety, Comrade General," the man answered, voice tight. "Let's report to the marshalling yards now."

North Hamgyong was dragged away, snapping and whining like a street mutt, and SH was left in the open with her hands fisted, with nowhere for the seething rage inside her to go.

The dark thing howled and thrashed, half caught in the wall, telling her to chase after him and finish planting her fist in his face like she'd been about to.

But she managed to beat it back, smacking her paintbrush over its malformed head until it slunk resentfully behind the concrete again, and she could splatter paint over the crack it had left, turning the immense pleasure she knew she'd feel if she succeeded at striking him into a seal to hold it back.

No, it wouldn't be the hitting him that felt good. It would be teaching him that his words had consequences. He didn't give a damn about her, so her own could never hurt him as deeply as his had used to hurt her. But he could feel the pain as she smashed her fist into his burnt and blistered cheek.

And it wouldn't come anywhere close to that she'd felt when he had missed.

"Comrade SH?" one of her bodyguards, Song Ki-gon, tentatively asked. "Are you alright?"

SH took a deep breath, brushing another thick layer of pine green and crimson across the wall, then turned to smile at him.

"Mm, I'm fine."

"He shouldn't've called you that," her other guard, Du Seon-gun, muttered, glaring after the male province as he was hauled out of sight into the city rubble. "Do you want me to give him what fer if he does it again?"

"No need," SH assured. "I'll tell Korea so he can lecture him."

It would be another arrow in her quiver for re-educating him. Maybe instead of normal classes, she could even convince her Countryhuman to treat him as a criminal and get him re-educated through labour. Calling her that word wasn't enough for it, but damaging their people's morale was near treason.

"And it doesn't hurt me." She smiled. "I expect dogs to bark."

She hadn't been going to hit him because he'd used that slur. It had been to shut him up, before he could say something he shouldn't in front of their guards, or when civilians could be hidden nearby.

It was good she hadn't succeeded, she tried to convince herself. It wouldn't look good if someone had seen one of their Provincehumans going after another, when they didn't know he had it coming.

Her guards exchanged glances that made her tense.

"Comrade SH," Song Ki-gon ventured. "Forgive me if I'm overstepping, but we've noticed some... tension between you and Comrade North Hamgyong lately."

"We're on yer side," Du Seon-gun quickly assured her. "Comrade Don-om says the sitch's prob'ly complicated, but no matter what, we're behind you wholeheartedly."

SH's heart sank a little at that. "Comrade Kim Don-om? He's noticed, too?"

Her guards winced, exchanging another look.

"Yes," Song Ki-gon said after a second. "Everyone at the post has."

"We make sure they keep their mouths shut when we're 'round," Du Seon-gun added. "It ain't right to be gossiping about our Provincehumans."

"But they have definitely noticed."

SH grit her teeth as she imagined their bodyguards all gathered in their guardhouse near the bunker, theorizing about her and the male.

'Stupid North Hamgyong.'

She wasn't shifting blame. There wouldn't be any tension if he hadn't insisted on haranguing her even after she'd made it clear she had no interest in communicating with him for anything but political matters ever again.

There would just be silence.

"Comrade North Hamgyong is just a bit of a pessimist," she told her guards. "And he likes to say things to try and make others pessimists, too. Please don't pay any mind to what he said- he doesn't actually believe it."

And still, she had to make excuses for him, knowing he wouldn't make them for her, and that he did.

"And Comrade Korea is fine," she added, even though she didn't believe that. "He's just under stress."

Her guards nodded, faces giving nothing away.

"Our job is to keep Comrade SH safe," Song Ki-gon said. "Not to think about anything else."

"And you're doing a good job."

She liked her guards. Song Ki-gon had been in the KPRA, and Du Seon-gun had fought in Manchuria, one of the soldiers that had kept fighting on Korea's order until China was liberated. The former was a soldier through and through, and the latter had aspirations of being a musician once the war was over. He played the haegeum beautifully whenever they travelled around her province.

And she liked that Korea hadn't singled her out by doing something like asking if she wanted female guards. Men served better, since Yankees and reactionaries thought women were weak, and even one wouldn't hesitate to go after three of them, like that man in the Kangso hills. They weren't, but the point of having bodyguards wasn't to teach the enemy a point about feminism- it was to keep SH safe. And two tall, burly men made the chance of someone trying to take her on at all even just a smidge more unlikely.

Even though SH would love to teach that point herself.

But it meant a lot that Korea hadn't even brought her guards' gender up when assigning them. He knew she had no reason to be uncomfortable travelling alone with their comrades. He saw that she'd moved on from the cage, that it had no control over her anymore. Unlike North Hamgyong.

Thinking of the cage made a trickle of ice run through her as she realized that both her bodyguards and the other province's had heard what he'd said about 'getting in there' and giving up.

She opened her mouth, then smiled and lightly ordered, "Please don't repeat anything you heard just now, comrades. That was a conversation we should've had in private."

She didn't want to call attention directly to what had been said, and make them ask questions. She should have known North Hamgyong would start something-

'You should know. It's your fault.'

No. She wasn't blaming herself for what he had done, especially not since he did.

The memory of a soft voice she'd give anything to hear again whispered in her mind, 'Why would I blame myself?'

She had been done with it a long time ago.

"Won't speak a word, Comrade SH," Song Ki-gon vowed with a salute, and Du Seon-gun said, "I reckon I ain't even know what yer talking about."

Good. She hoped North Hamgyong's guards would be just as diligent. Though considering they were his-

That was wrong thinking. Their comrades hadn't had any say in where they were assigned. It wasn't their fault they'd been born in the Northern Hamgyong, or that Korea had picked them out. She wasn't going to let her feelings about her- about the other province spill over on to others. Not like North Hamgyong did.

"Thank you," she said, smiling. "Now let's get to the rendezvous point for our orders."

They'd probably be assigned to scavenging duty, since it looked like it was still ongoing. That was good. Hard, rewarding labour that would take all day. She'd be asleep the moment she hit the pillow after her bath, and her mind would be dead until she woke up for last watch, and then to organize her cousins for their ambush. And try to find out why Korea had sent that order out through the Worker's Party a couple weeks ago.

She felt a flicker of worry as they set off into the rubble, so much worse up close, where she had to pick her way around the craters, and could see the rusty stains that splotched some of the debris, soaked too deep into the wood and stone to be washed away by the rains.

'You've fucking seen him lately.'

For all of North Hamgyong's wrong thinking and incorrect attitudes, he was right about Korea. He was almost always sprinting full-tilt at the edge of a cliff. They just usually achieved their goal before he could reach it. SH didn't agree with what the other province had been about to say- they did have a chance. But in the meantime, she knew someone had to stop their Countryhuman, to reach out and hold him back at least enough to slow him down.

But the way to do that wasn't by telling him everything was hopeless. It was by making him eat and drink, and forcing him to get at least one full night of sleep. And by making sure he knew that to them, the Day of the Foundation of the Republic wasn't just the day Korea had finally declared a government for the people.

If they told him there was a chance of anything that wasn't victory, he would just run faster.

But she wouldn't expect the person that had sat across from her at that tiny table for all those years, soaking in bitter tea and refusing to even attempt a smile for her, or tell her it would be okay, to understand that.

There wouldn't be any tension if it wasn't for him. There wouldn't be any anger or this lurking unease he'd managed to plant in her with his persistent grimness, despite all her efforts. There wouldn't be all those nightmares and memories and the eternal uncleanliness that still-

If it hadn't been for him, she would've found South Pyongan or North Chungcheong or someone, and Korea would have found her fresh and plucky, with all her rage reserved for what their people had faced.

He'd had no right to say the way he had turned out was her fault, or that any of what had happened to either of them was.

Because if it wasn't for North Hamgyong, there would never have been a cage at all.

There's a chapter I'm so excited for coming up! A lot of them. I actually feel that way about every chapter I write.

The fun thing about my map app is that it will say 'Seoul to Rason? Of course you can drive from Seoul to Rason. Here's a route! Ignore the existence of the DMZ or the border checkpoints or the fact that the roads are blown out.' But if I ask for Seoul to Busan it says 'Seoul to Busan? The capital city of South Korea to a major shipping port that is also in South Korea? That is clearly connected by a highway? Are you crazy? Are you fucking stupid? There is no way on earth you could EVER drive from SEOUL to BUSAN. LOSER. Fuck you.'

Starving For It

SH crept down the hall, the light of her flashlight landing on Korea's door. She hushed the cousin giggling behind her, then reached for the handle, wrapping her fingers around the thick steel.

They'd agreed that they shouldn't use last year's method this year, since their Countryhuman wasn't... feeling his best. Having him wake up in a panic and lunge into the hallway with a loaded gun might not end well for them this time.

The plan was to wait quietly outside until he emerged, so South Pyongan could restrain him before he could grab his weapon, and the rest of them could launch their attack. SH was only trying the door as a formality. But surprisingly, it opened a crack.

She held up her hand, signalling her cousins to be quiet and move to the sides, since their Countryhuman slept with his pistol. Once they were clear, she held up three fingers, silently counting down with them. As the third curled in, she swung the door open, and they all shouted, "HAPPY BIRTHDAY KOREA!"

Immediately there was a high-pitched feminine cry, sending a bolt of terror and betrayal through SH before she peered wildly in and realized who it was.

"Aiya," China said in his normal voice, arms crossed protectively over his chest. "Look at you all barging in here without even a warning."

"Where is Korea?" SH asked, taking another look around the room to make sure he really was the only one in it. It was too tiny to hide anyone else, but the foreigner had sounded exactly like a woman. Eerily so.

It had been an instinctive, stupid fear. Korea had no interest in women, and even if China would sleep with one of their people or his soldiers, her Countryhuman wouldn't let him bring one back here.

"Not even a single care for my modesty," China sniffed, offended.

South Pyongan stuck her head in over SH's shoulder, raising her eyebrows. "You're literally fully dressed."

"Ah." China looked down at his uniform, uncrossing his arms. "So I am."

SH shook her head, unimpressed. "Korea?"

"He rushed out of here a few minutes ago," the foreigner replied, going back to what he was doing- crouching in the corner and openly rummaging through Korea's bag. "What do you think this is?"

SH's heart squeezed as he held up a rock shaped like one.

'Look what I got Korea for his birthday! Think he's gonna like it?'

She swallowed, and China's eyes flicked to her throat, marking the reaction.

He tilted his head curiously, sounding too excited as he asked, "Something bittersweet tasting?"

"What is it?" Hae asked, trying to see around SH.

She blocked her cousins' line of sight, not wanting to bring their moods down. Marching into the room, she snatched the rock and bag from China's hand, dropping it back inside and pointedly doing the clasp up.

"No fun," he sighed, sitting back on his haunches.

"You should come wish Korea a happy birthday with us," SH said, placing the bag back in the corner, adjusting the painting there as she did.

Korea couldn't have anything too important (government-wise) in there if he was willing to leave it in the same room as China, but she was sure he didn't exactly want him snooping around in his things. Especially if he had anything else like that rock.

"Alright." China didn't move.

SH narrowed her eyes. "Now."

He sighed again, but stood. "How could I say no to a woman as lovely as you? Lead on."

SH turned, catching North Hamgyong glowering at the man from over Hae and North Pyongan's heads.

The nerve made her blood boil. He still thought he had any claim over her after he'd said those horrible things.

She soothed the dark thing by reminding herself Korea was going to give him a piece of his mind once she told him what he'd said to their soldier, and to her. She hadn't last night, and she wouldn't today, since she didn't want to upset him on his birthday, but before she left for her province again, she would make sure of it.

Just to annoy him more (and to make sure China didn't sneak back in to snoop), SH linked arms with the Chinese country, pulling him from the room.

"Okay, comrades," she said cheerily. "Attempt number two."

As she shut the door to Korea's room, she took one last look in the corner, where the painting she'd made him last year, the one with the flower standing tall under the boot, screaming 'RESIST!' was propped.

It sent a little glow of warmth through her. Hopefully he would like this year's enough to display it, too.

Pushing away thoughts of the pencil sketch of Seoul that wasn't there, SH shut the door.

They hurried down the hallway, stopping before the exit. SH clipped her flashlight back on to her belt, leaving the bunker pitch-black for a second.

She hoped Korea was outside, and hadn't taken off for the city without them. She hadn't been able to get him to eat dinner yesterday, and since she'd been gone for almost a month, he likely hadn't been eating much then either. If he didn't eat this morning...

SH grabbed the wheel, whispering, "I'm opening the door now," before turning it.

Grey light crept in through the crack, and SH mustered her strength to shove the heavy steel open. Relief filled her as she spotted Korea standing by the GAZ, arms crossed.

Then she was almost bowled over as Hae shot past her, and she quickly stepped out of the bunker after her, the rest of her cousins following.

"HAPPY BIRTHDAY KOREA!" they cried again, swarming across the clearing to surround him.

He stepped back against the truck, snapping, "Don't touch me!" making Hae screech to a halt with a pout.

"But Korea-"

"It is not my birthday and I do not need a hug."

That was disappointing, but expected. SH stopped a few feet away, North Pyongan instinctively stepping away from her so Korea had a gap to escape their encirclement.

Their Countryhuman's shoulders eased slightly, and he repeated irritably, "This is still not my birthday. It is-"

"'The day our people finally declared a state that belongs to them and them alone,' yadda yadda," South Pyongan interrupted. "Shut it and accept the congrats, Birthday Boy."

"Respect your country," Korea muttered.

"You weren't in your room," SH said, and he gave her a look with a tinch of smugness to it.

"I was told if I wanted to avoid your stupid pranks, I should wake up earlier."

"Ruining our fun," she sighed.

But it was good to see any look that wasn't ice, anger, or the paranoia he'd had when they surrounded him on his face. And it was good it still wasn't burned, even after that major assault.

"Sorry, jiejie," Liaotung said from over at the hearth, where her and Liaoxi had kindled the hearth and were preparing the rations for breakfast. "He snuck out the second you went to get the others."

Liaoxi nodded. "We would've alerted you to your plight-"

"But we were afraid he might bite," her sister interrupted, ignoring the other Chinese woman as she insisted that hadn't been going to be her rhyme.

Korea's head cracked towards her, alarmed. "What did he tell you?"

Liaotung's brow furrowed. "Pardon?"

China laughed, gliding over to them. "It looks like my Little Sister is just intuitive."

SH gave Korea a look. 'Do I want to know what that's about?'

He hunched, avoiding her eye.

She decided that meant, 'Definitely not.'

"Come on, comrades." She turned back to her cousins. "Let's start breakfast so we can head to the city for the General's broadcast."

"You're not making it," South Pyongan said immediately, prompting SH to give her a dirty look.

"I wasn't going to," she sniffed.

"We can cook for our hosts," Liaoxi volunteered. "Since it's your holiday, it's right for us to do the most."

"I will help," North Pyongan added.

That worked. He made good food, and while the Liaos' cooking skills were about the same as the Koreans' ('Not counting me,' SH reluctantly added.), only able to boil rice down into juk, that was all they needed to do.

And Kangwon, who really was the best cook out of the northern provinces, even if he pretended otherwise, was the one cousin not here. He hadn't even been at the rendezvous yesterday, or slept at the bunker. Korea had said he was needed in the hospital full-time, though he'd be at the speech later.

SH looked over at him as North Pyongan went to help the Chinese women cook, finding him thinking about her cousin, too, his head turned towards the city. She frowned.

It wasn't just the usual concern he felt when one of them wasn't in his field of vision she saw in his eye. It was the same thing she caught glimpses of when he heard there was an air strike on the military complex when Jong-il was there, or when he received the casualty reports for a battle at the border- fear.

He looked over, not at her, but at Chagang. SH saw the question in her cousin's eyes, and Korea's answer as he nodded seriously, before the bars closed back over his face, hiding what he felt.

It worried her, but if he hadn't said anything, it wasn't her business. Though she was still suddenly anxious to see Kangwon.

She distracted herself with something that was her business.

"Korea," she said casually. "Why did you send out that order that anyone who wanted to give you a present this year should bring it to their local People's Committee?"

She thought she might have caught him off guard, but he just gave her an unimpressed look, the same one he'd given her when she asked last night.

"You will find out," he replied, giving nothing away.

"Is this going to be one of the times when there's absolutely no reason to hide something from us, but you're doing so regardless?" Hwang asked from where he was reviewing short course information.

"No," Korea said stonily.

"Yes," said China.

Their Countryhuman glared at him. "It isn't necessary information right now."

But it wasn't *un*necessary information. And it wasn't like they were rushing off anywhere- the sky was still painted with shades of soft navy, only starting to pale in the east.

SH exchanged wry looks with her cousins, making sure to exclude a certain other relative that was glowering over by the door.

"You will find out." Korea was still glaring at China. "When it is necessary."

SH puffed her cheeks. She supposed she had a few ideas of what he might be planning. She knew no matter what, none of the options were that he'd finally decided he actually wanted birthday presents, especially not from their people. He hadn't even liked the Liberation Day letters, to her dismay.

"Do you think there's been any leeway on the talks?" Hwang asked, glancing towards the road through the trees, clearly eager to head to Pyongyang.

"Ah ah," SH cut Korea off before he could answer. "No talking work until we're in the city."

"Yeah, you'll cause indigestion," South Pyongan said, watching her brother cut up scallions and late carrots from the garden, waiting like a cat to snatch one. "'Sides, no way the Yanks would ever cave on a holiday. It'd be like giving us a present."

"And they have been consistent with their week on, week off method," North Pyongan added, smacking her wrist lightly with the flat of his knife. "I doubt we'll hear from them again until this one is over."

A hush filled the clearing at his words.

It was September 9th. And even though the hornbeams still wore their coats of emerald, and the air was still warm and muggy, a chill had started to push through the blanket of heat at night, especially up in the northern mountains. As picturesque as it was, to anyone that had used to live in the wild, in mountains and forests, sometimes unable to light a fire for fear of being spotted, autumn wasn't really its own season. It was only a herald, a final warning to finish your final preparations, to trap as many animals as you could for new boots and fur to line your clothes, and to powder the meat, to dry every wild vegetable and fruit you found, and cut up as much wood as possible in the hopes that if you got trapped up on a mountain or snowed in by a blizzard, you would have enough to make it through. SH had just returned from reminding her villagers in higher altitudes to do just that, in case the supply lines got cut by weather.

The provinces, at least, didn't need to fight for survival in the way they'd used to. But that didn't change the instinctive anxiety that seeped into SH's bones when she'd noticed that the preparations for the rice harvest had begun.

Winter was coming. And they still didn't have a ceasefire.

"We're not going to hear from them at all," North Hamgyong grunted from over at the bunker. "They're going to tug us around until the damn snow comes, and then they're going to starve us out."

"They're going to try," Korea said before SH could snap it. "And if they do, we will outlast them again, and they will be forced to sign next spring."

North Hamgyong's face darkened, and the thing behind the wall tensed in anticipation.

But then he just shook his head, turning for the door.

"Come get me when the food's ready," he grunted, the clang of steel slamming behind him echoing in the early morning mist.

SH glared after him, then caught North Pyongan watching her with his brow furrowed.

"Be careful," she said sweetly. "Don't cut yourself."

Her cousin went back to chopping the vegetables, sweeping the carrots into the pot when Liaoxi said it was time.

"We will be fine," Korea said, glaring around at them like he was daring them to challenge it.

None of them did.

"Did everyone have their bath last night?" SH swept in, wanting to shift the topic to something nicer. They shouldn't have to think about anything America-adjacent they didn't have to today.

She made sure all her cousins had washed, and Hwang assured her North Hamgyong had, too. She didn't care if he wanted to wallow in his own filth like he wallowed in everything else, but she did care that he looked presentable for their people.

Korea didn't talk much as they chatted, only occasionally rebuffing Hae for her attempts to hug him, not even softening when she used her big eyes on him. Otherwise he sat as still as a statue, not looking over at the hearth, where the fragrant smell of cooking rice was coming from.

"We'll need to start preparing vegetables for kimchi making," Hwang mused.

"Ah'll plant more turnips before we head out again," Hae chirped. "They'll be a li'l late, but we should have 'em in early December. If Korea takes good care of the garden while ah'm gone." She gave him a hopeful pout.

"I have had people tending it," he said. "They will continue to do so."

"Good." Hae nodded happily. "And we have lots'a dried bracken and scallions, and the wild garlic patch, so ah think we'll be okay. And it doesn't feel like this winter'll be as bad as the first one."

SH was relieved. "That's good. We'll start the first batch of kimchi in late October then."

Hwang looked cautious. "And when you say 'we...?'"

SH sighed. "We will ask Comrade Kim Song-ae if she can make it for us."

"Ura!" South Pyongan cheered, and the others heartily agreed, besides Hae. SH thought she even saw Chagang let out a breath of relief.

But she was tentatively pleased to find that her cousins' joy at her not preparing their food didn't rankle like it had used to. Not as much, anyway.

South Pyongan narrowed her eyes at her a little. 'You better remember what I said.'

SH stuck out her tongue, and her cousin grinned.

Hae chattered about how the newly-organized experimental co-operative farms were coming along, and how she thought the agricultural plan would get fulfilled this year, and they might even have a bumper crop, looking hopefully up at Korea as she said it. He nodded, but didn't say anything.

Soon, the juk was ready. Everyone headed for the buttumak, not looking over at the stump where Korea remained seated.

SH took the ladle from Liaotung, serving all of her cousins up heaping bowls, but making sure there would be enough left for dinner. They'd be too tired to do more than heat something up tonight, so they'd cooked all their day's rations together. Once they all had steaming bowls in their laps, and Chagang had gone to get North Hamgyong, SH set the spoon down and left her own bowl on the hearth. With another one in her hands, she walked across the clearing.

"Korea," she said, stopping in front of him. "You should eat today."

He avoided her eyes, and the bowl of juk.

SH's own stomach had hollowed out at the comforting smell, but she didn't back down. "It's the Day of the Foundation of the Republic." She knew telling him he deserved to eat a good meal on his birthday wouldn't work. "Everyone needs to see us looking our best."

"And you still need to get over your blood loss," China said idly, making Korea whip his head towards him. "Preferably before you make any more questionable decisions."

SH didn't know what he was talking about, but since Korea looked like he wanted their comrade to shut up, she focused on the first part.

"Blood loss?" She scanned his body, eyes lingering on the bandages poking out of his collar and sleeves. And the one on the back of his head that he'd told her wasn't a burn.

"I've been giving donations," he said stoically. "With all of you gone, I had to make up for it."

SH gave him a disapproving look, but knew there wasn't anything she could say that Kangwon wouldn't have already.

"Then you definitely need to eat something," she said firmly, holding the bowl closer to him.

His eye flicked to it, then away.

"Please?" she tried.

Korea's jaw feathered. He didn't agree, he just wordlessly took the bowl and spoon from her. He didn't start eating right away, but SH retreated, taking her spot on the other side of Hae with her own juk, where she could make sure he didn't try and offload his portion in her cousin's bowl.

With breakfast in their Countryhuman's lap, the rest of them started to eat, talking louder again. SH watched North Hamgyong have to serve himself, satisfied.

The juk was thick and hot, the soft chunks of carrot falling apart in her mouth, and the scallions providing a pleasant tangy crunch. It was only slightly seasoned with salt and shoyu, but lately she was feeling like Hae- every meal was the best thing she had ever tasted.

She'd had a few in her province, the times when she felt like the villagers insisting on hosting her would get more from being able to take care of and spend time with their province than from the meager portions she allowed them to talk her into, but mostly she just subsisted on plain rice rations without even any salt. Cooked by Song Ki-gon, not her.

But even though they were all digging into the juk with gusto, Korea was just pushing his around in his bowl, staring out into the trees. Every once and awhile, his eye would stray to the rice slurry before tearing away.

China finished first, standing up from Korea's other side and handing his bowl to Liaotung to place in the washbasin, despite the fact that he was literally already standing.

"I hate to eat and run, comrades," he said. "But I have a package to pick up. And it's going to take some time, considering someone had our poor Jeep put down."

SH groaned internally as he looked at Korea.

"What?" North Hamgyong of course looked more invested in that than he had even wishing Korea a happy birthday. "You told me it was in for repairs."

Korea grimaced. "I told you it was in the shop. It is."

"Being salvaged," China clarified. "Trying to repair it would be quite useless. It was hit almost directly by a bomb."

"Fuck," North Hamgyong grumbled, looking even more sour than usual.

South Pyongan whistled, impressed. "How'd you manage that?" she asked Korea.

"Were you in it?" Hae worried.

"No," Korea said at the same time China said, "We got out a few seconds before."

SH looked at her Countryhuman, alarmed, and he bristled.

"Stop talking about my business!" he snapped at China.

The man arched a delicate brow. "I know I said the Jeep was ours, but I am one half of that. I would say it's my business, too. But it's alright, I don't blame you for its unfortunate demise. I can walk anyway. Unless someone wants to carry me."

He looked hopefully at Korea, who glowered at him.

"A one-time thing then, I see how it is," he sighed. "Anyway, keep an eye on this one if he takes your GAZ anywhere."

Korea shot daggers at him, but SH tipped her head as he glanced at her. But before she could pin down what the look meant, he started to walk away.

Oh, right.

"By the way, Korea," she said, turning to her Countryhuman. "China was looking through your things."

"What?"

"I'm leaving~" China sing-songed, walking faster and disappearing into the trees, not even leaving any rustling undergrowth to track his path.

"Weird fucking bastard," North Hamgyong muttered, glaring after him with Korea. Which was unwarranted- it wasn't his things he'd been snooping in.

"We humbly apologize for our Countryhuman." Liaotung made a small bow. "And when he does it again, we will still be humbly apologetic."

"You didn't tell me the Jeep was destroyed," North Pyongan said to Liaoxi.

"I assumed you knew," she replied. "We thought your Countryhuman would have told you."

Korea looked away.

"We didn't know gege had a hand in its fate though," Liaotung said between bites of juk. As her sister elbowed her she added, "You don't need to take responsibility or anything. It was a British vehicle anyways, so losing it isn't any stress."

"And now China might drive less," Liaoxi murmured hopefully, making North Pyongan chuckle.

SH had thought the Liaos looked unsurprised by the news. They'd probably noticed the Jeep was missing last night, just like her and her cousins. But she'd noticed them glance at Korea in surprise when their Countryhuman implied he had something to do with it. If he hadn't told them last night, but was being a bit confrontational now...

SH was fairly confident she was right about his look from before. And if she was, then that was... nice of him.

She glanced at Korea, still stirring his spoon through his juk, no longer surrounded by wisps of steam.

She would keep an eye on him while she was here, and tell the General to watch out for him while they were gone. Whether it was blood loss or hunger, the idea of Korea driving when he was on his own made her uneasy.

"What transpired?" Hwang asked, pushing his glasses up to keep them out of his food.

"Exactly what he said," Korea clipped, setting the spoon down like he'd been looking for an excuse. "We were caught in the assault on the 29th. I got us out of the Jeep before it was destroyed. That is all."

"Is it?" South Pyongan asked skeptically.

"Yes."

"You better not let that guy borrow the GAZ." North Hamgyong glanced over at the tarp over the vehicle like he was making sure China hadn't made off with it in his sleeves.

"He will not," Korea said with zero shame, even though he had been taking China's vehicle without permission for over a year now.

SH gave the Liaos an apologetic look, humbly apologizing for her Countryhuman with her eyes. They accepted it with bemused smiles.

Hae mumbled something with her cheeks full of the last of her juk.

"Don't speak with your mouth full," SH reminded her. "It's rude and no one can understand what you're saying."

Hae chewed fast and swallowed hard, looking sadly down at her empty bowl before saying, "Ah said 'Korea, you better hurry up an' eat. The sun's almost up, so we've got to get goin' soon so everyone can wish you happy birthday.'" She took a deep breath.

She was practically in Korea's lap, but he didn't look at her. He stared down at his bowl, then stood.

SH's heart sank, but thankfully he just muttered, "I'm going to eat inside."

Hae frowned. "But it's your birthday! You should eat with us."

"It's not-" He sighed. "I'm eating inside. I will be out once I'm ready."

He slunk away, not looking at any of them as he disappeared into the bunker.

Hae pouted, and SH crossed her arms, watching the wheel lock into place.

"At least he is eating," North Pyongan soothed.

"Mm." SH knew he wouldn't waste the juk. 'Waste' was the reason he had trouble eating, after all.

'Even if that isn't what it is.'

She got not wanting to take food from their people. She couldn't help the little twinge of guilt she'd felt dining with hers, no matter how happy they were to urge her to take more banchan or share more of the main dish, and now that the government wasn't taking wheat or barley for the tax in kind, leaving more food for the people who harvested it. She had even been reluctant to have those extra helpings Oh Tae-uk and Pak Jung-ho had given her after her escape from America's camp, even though she knew she'd needed it.

But the rations weren't taking food. They were distributed by Supreme Command for their soldiers, and for Korea and the provinces. They were calculated for him, set aside for him, and even if he refused to take them, so long as every other soldier had collected theirs, no one else could.

And she got the desire to give away what he could stand to, obviously. She had been doing it alongside her cousins before he made them stop. But that was in winter, when the refugees had a harder time foraging, and she'd still eaten half every day. Korea didn't.

Before Liberation Day, she hadn't seen him eat at all since... At least since the Supung Dam was hit. She knew that wouldn't have changed while she was gone.

Even if it was shameful, she would still prefer Korea starved himself over glutting himself, but...

She was really starting to get worried.

—

North sat cross-legged in the middle of the floor, looking down at the bowl in his lap. SH wasn't here to scold him for manners, so he lifted it with one hand almost to his face, then changed his mind and lowered it to his chest, trying to put some distance between his 'nose' and the aroma.

The wholesome, hearty smell of cooked grains made his mouth water and his stomach churn. The broken-down rice glistened in his bowl like a morass of maggots, a thin layer of cloudy liquid lining the edges, and welled where he'd dug his spoon into it. It was a pale, lumpy slurry, almost looking half-digested already, and North knew it would come up the same way.

He took a deep breath, lifting the spoon and scooping a bit of the juk up, avoiding the few chunks of orange and green for now. He had already removed the rock from his mouth, so there was nothing stopping him from opening it, and being immediately disgusted when a trickle of saliva escaped his lips and ran down his chin.

Ssi-bal. This was why he was doing this alone. Part of it anyway.

He didn't put the bowl down to wipe his face, refusing to let himself stall anymore. He'd locked the door to their room, so there wasn't any risk of China or one of the others coming in.

North stared at the lumpy gruel, then carefully moved it past his lips, sliding it off the spoon.

It sat on his tongue, warm and heavy, and he immediately felt his gorge rise. He forced it back, stopping his breathing so the cloying scent wouldn't fill his nasal passages.

He sat there for a second, stomach constricting and esophagus tightening as it tried to refuse to let the interloper into his body. North Pyongan and the Liaos hadn't watered down the juk as much as usual, maybe as some sort of misguided 'birthday' gift. It just made it harder to swallow.

Then, slowly, he tipped his head back and made himself, his throat spasming as he forced it down.

He gasped for breath when it was done, and the rice was sitting inside him like a lead weight. His stomach roiled at the sudden invasion, the first since yesterday afternoon, clenching painfully before it decided to accept it and started screaming for more.

North ignored it, waiting to make sure the nutrients wouldn't be rejected in a minute, keeping his head lifted away from the rest of the rice waiting in his bowl and continuing to wrestle with his nausea.

He could hear South Pyongan calling him dramatic in his head, the way she would if he'd done this out there.

He wasn't. This was necessary.

It was always easier for him to starve than it was to eat. But there reached a point where it became easier for his body, too. And as much as it might crave sustenance, it would start to reject it.

But it hadn't been this bad in... awhile.

North took another inhale, then started to eat the juk with small bites, forcing himself to eat slow and steady, struggling with each mouthful. It hadn't gotten any easier, even after he'd kept up eating one meal a day so he wouldn't collapse at the speech today.

When the bowl was finally, mercifully empty, he set it on his lap, waiting. He didn't have to wait long before more saliva suddenly gushed into his mouth as his stomach surged up behind it.

He hunched over, clamping a hand over his mouth as grainy slurry filled it again, burning with the taste of stomach acid this time.

Splinters under his knees, a foul stench from the bucket as more waste splattered into it, trying to muffle the sounds.

'Don't wake up South, don't wake up South, don't-'

North grit his teeth, willing himself to force the juk back down, refusing to waste any food. Every single meal he had wasted in the prison shack sat even heavier in his stomach than even the ones he'd kept down.

Finally, he managed to swallow the rice slurry for a second time, actually half-digested now. His stomach seized again, but he locked his throat, preventing it from coming back up.

'Disgusting.'

Eventually he was sure his insides had finally accepted the meal, and allowed himself to breathe again, reaching for his canteen and using the lukewarm water to wash away the taste of bile and fill his stomach with something it wouldn't try to turn away.

At least he had as much as he could drink now, and he didn't have to rinse his mouth with the metallic kind in the bucket, usually almost gone by the time he needed it. After they'd stopped being denied water, South had gorged himself on it, drinking like at any moment it might be taken away again, even after it had been months since- By the middle of the night, North would only be left with a few small inches to tip into his mouth and use to desperately try and clean the film off his teeth, and the taste off his tongue. Not enough to get rid of the hot stench on his breath and the evidence of what he'd been doing. Though luckily South had never noticed.

This wasn't as severe as back then. North had never been strong enough to control it.

There had been a part of him that hadn't wanted to.

But he could now. And he did want to. He needed to keep his meals down so he could stay strong for his people and keep giving blood. He needed to save her.

He stood up, then, because he had to, he reached into his bag in the corner, groping around until he felt the fraying edges of the photo paper, and his tension eased.

He had caught China (or China had let him catch him) examining his things more times after their expedition south. But he had been leaving the photograph alone. Or at least putting it back exactly where he had found it.

He felt that yearning in him, even stronger than his stomach's need for food, to look at the picture. To see his brother. It pulled at that cord inside him, tearing at something deeper than his body.

He was strong enough to stop himself from wasting the juk. He was strong enough to stop himself from doing anything he'd regret if he couldn't stomach this.

He inhaled, then took the photograph out.

It was pathetic to admit, but even seeing his brother's face was enough to ease the knot of tension inside him, even if it drew a new one tight. And made that cord pull more painfully than it already was.

'North, we could actually have a photo of us!'

'Why would we need a photo of us?' They wouldn't be 'them' for much longer now.

Gyeong's eyes shone behind his glasses as he cut in. 'Because photographs can keep a moment alive forever!'

He had wanted to keep that moment alive forever. As the sun cast golden rays over their victory and his brother put his arm around him, pressed his side to his and completed him, no less of a relief than it had been hours earlier as they met in that crowd, the smile on his face the brightest North had ever seen.

It had been supposed to be a funerary portrait. The last photo ever taken of North and South, so that Korea could look back on it and remember what Japan had done to them, and celebrate that they were now whole, the way they were supposed to be. And so he could remember what it felt like to be brothers.

South had turned it into a favour, something a husband left with his wife to hold on to while he went off to war, so she could look at it and think of him, yearning to see him again. And by not just dragging him with him when the Yankees had arrived to claim him, North had let him.

He had expected to get mad when he saw his brother's face, smiling so joyfully even after he'd done what he had. But he couldn't. It wasn't the face of a person that would turn a blind eye to Jeju or refuse to stand up against America or Command their provinces or burn Seoul to the ground and kill their people. Or cut out his eye.

It was just his brother.

That feeling of shame welled inside North again, and anger at the idea anyone could look at that smile and think he wanted to hurt anyone. South had never wanted to, not even their Japanese jailors. He hadn't wanted to kill Kang Kyung-nam, he had only been trying to protect North. And he wouldn't have wanted to burn Seoul, he only...

North bared his teeth, having to look at the wall for a moment.

They weren't supposed to be this way. There was never supposed to be two of them.

He couldn't understand the Hwanghaes. They had been so excited to tell the others he'd decided to divide their province, and so had their cousins, like it was something to be happy about. They were meant to be together, meant to be one, but they were rejecting it. Instead of wishing every single day that they could melt into each other and finally be together the way they were supposed to, they wanted to be separated permanently.

Hae had asked if his heart felt lonely, and told him she felt the same way when she wasn't around her brother. But she couldn't. If she did, she would never have asked him to be her own person. Even though North's pain had been made worse by the Division, creating this tether that constantly pulled inside him, even that soft ache from before had been unbearable. And the only thing that could soothe it was Unifying, Reunifying, with his brother. Even if it wasn't for their country, how could he ever think of not?

They couldn't understand what it meant to be missing your other half, somehow not even the ones who were. None of them could.

This wasn't his birthday. It was only another reminder that Korea didn't have a Day of Reunification yet, that North and South were still here, instead of being who they were supposed to be, being together.

North stroked his thumb over the softness of his brother's paper face, still with that tight, uncomfortable feeling that had plagued him since China had told him what he had, but aching aching aching for the real thing. North and South had never been meant to grow up, only Korea. But even so, he wanted to see him as he was now. Even if it was the eyes that had stared in stupid shock after cutting his out, the mouth that hadn't answered after North had asked if he had ever lied to him, and the voice that must have given the order to raze their capital, he would still give almost anything to see him. To get answers from him, yes, to shout at him and call him an idiot. But also just to touch him, to hold him, to be with him.

What would In-su or Oh Ryong-jin or any of those who had lost their homes and families in Seoul say if they knew the first thing their Countryhuman wanted to do when he saw the one responsible for it wasn't reprimand him or drag him off to re-education for his crimes against their people, but embrace him, tell him he'd missed him?

The shame welled stronger, like starchy water in slimy juk, and he made himself tuck the photograph back away.

He should want to tear it, he should have to stop himself from destroying it. And the fact that he didn't sickened him worse than the meal occupying his stomach.

North breathed out, then wiped his face and started to get dressed, shoving aside all those useless thoughts.

When he was Reunified with his brother, he wouldn't feel like this anymore. And South would never do anything else like he had. He would be North, and he would never hurt anyone that didn't deserve it again. Korea could devote himself wholeheartedly to their people, and would never harm them.

They would be Reunified, even if America insisted on forcing them to weather another winter. One year or a thousand, Korea would withstand, and be free.

Even if the thought of being without his brother for that long made his stomach convulse again.

But he wouldn't think about it anymore today. He had to find the words for what he would tell his people tonight that he hadn't been able to so far. He had to be strong, to stand up on that stage and make them believe they would be Liberated, that they could still trust him to do it.

That they always could.

North smoothed his dress uniform down, adjusting his belt, buckled in the new hole he'd poked in it with his tiger knife. He hesitated as he reached for the flatcap, then put it on. The skinned patch on the back of his head should have healed by now, but it hadn't. He would cover it today, then just make sure to block himself so the audience wouldn't see it tonight.

He paused in the doorway, leaning his forehead against the cool steel as his vision went black.

He would have to make sure he avoided Kim Yong-hwan when he visited the hospital later. She was watching over their charge while Kangwon was busy, so it would be easy. North could visit the other patients, then slip out without being seen.

He couldn't go in that room. Not if she wasn't going to wake up.

When the spots cleared from his eye, he pushed off the door, glancing back at that painting propped in the corner, like someone had straightened it up, the little bellflower glowing under the 'Made in USA' boot.

'RESIST!'

North let out a breath, scratching under his eyepatch, then left the room.

Like he had any other choice.

That's right. I have accepted that there will be three parts to this. What use is there in striving against the inevitable when your own brain is the obstacle? Please look forward to when we reach 401 chapters.

Also I'm not intentionally placing all the chapters during American recesses, but it keeps happening. Them taking one week off from the talks every other week is real, and my chapters keep landing on recess dates.

On another note, I feel like I'm the anti-George Martin of food scenes.

In The Embrace

Applause echoed from behind the thick red curtain as the last performance ended. It was only a few seconds before SH was sliding in from onstage in the dress uniform she'd been dancing in, heading straight for North.

He saw the glance she gave Kangwon, asking if he had been able to look at his burns today, and the reply as his other province wordlessly told her he hadn't.

North hid his grimace. He was fine. He had tended to them as best he could, wiping them down with boiled water and bandaging himself thoroughly. Even if his back-

He was fine. He would check tonight. All that mattered right now was that he wouldn't bleed through.

"Head up to the box," he ordered his provinces as an instrumental version of 'Aegukka' filled the underground theatre, accompanying the dancers as they flooded in from the stage, clearing out the back area for him.

"I wanted to check on you first," SH said.

He grit his teeth. "I am fine."

She gave him a look. "I just wanted to see you."

No she didn't. She was doing what Kangwon was- fussing. China had told her he was anemic, so now she was reassuring herself that he wasn't going to keel over on stage in front of an audience of hundreds.

"You know even if she was checking on you, that'd be fine, right?" Kangwon asked, yawning. "We're your provinces, it's normal for us to care about your well-being."

"I don't need you to."

It was his own well-being he should worry about. North had forbidden him from giving more blood, since he needed him ready to deploy to his province, either if his patient recovered or- He wasn't donating like North was, but he was staying up all night. The almost maroon stains under his eyes proved it. And he was swaying on his feet, worse at hiding it than his Countryhuman.

There was also a heavy anxiety in the lines of his face, even if he insisted she was making progress.

"It's not about need, Korea," he gently told him.

"Get up to the box," North ordered again as their anthem reached its midway point.

SH sighed. "Alright. Work hard."

"I don't need you to tell me that."

She gave him a wry smile, supporting Kangwon by his elbow as they headed for the exit on the opposite side of the stage. Before they disappeared, she looked back.

"You know we really look forward to these speeches, Korea."

"Yeah," Kangwon agreed. "They really help. You should see the hospital when they're broadcasted- everyone crowds around the radio. Even the patients that can't walk either ask for one, or to get carried out to listen."

"Why are you telling me this?" North asked, tense.

SH smiled. "Because we appreciate you."

Lying again. They just wouldn't let him forget that he had been cowardly enough to miss that one live speech.

North tried not to look at them, but his eye couldn't help but be drawn to Kangwon, leaning against his cousin.

'By this time next year, you'll be able to operate again.' North had said those words to his brother last year. And now Gangwon was back in the south, locked away like he had been before, possibly hurt in some way his agents couldn't see, like North had told him would never happen again.

Kangwon had been an idiot, going to Norway. Gangwon had been one, too. But North knew no matter how much he blamed his province, it wasn't truly his fault.

It was his. For not being there to stop them. For being so weak he couldn't handle a damn fever and hadn't been there to do the one thing he was good for.

And now both their brothers were gone.

Kangwon smiled down at him, but his eyes asked the same accusatory questions Gangwon's had last year.

The answer was 'no.' Foundation Day had came again. And Gangwon still couldn't operate. They still didn't have everyone back. And the war wasn't over.

North turned away, waiting until he heard their footsteps cross the stage, following the performers. When he was finally alone, he climbed onto it himself, staring at the curtain stretching above him like a waterfall of blood.

He could feel bombs impacting their land, shuddering through his flesh. Fresh blood soaked the bandages under his uniform, blood he couldn't afford to lose.

He exhaled, trying to drive the pain away. He couldn't let a single person in that audience know he was feeling it. He listened as the last strains of 'Aegukka' filtered through the curtain, the lyrics echoing in his mind, even without anyone to sing them.

'Our country built on the will of the people

Infinitely prosperous, oh Korea!

The path forever shines!'

He had never wanted to hear a song in his brother's voice more.

North exhaled, and as the final chords faded, he sank his fingers into the curtain.

—

SH made her way through the rows of seats with Kangwon, smiling and nodding to the people that quietly hailed them. They climbed the stairs at the back, settling into one of the boxes with the rest of their cousins, the General and his household, and Kim Tu-bong and his. Kangwon stayed on his feet, leaning over the back of Hwang's chair.

The General smiled at SH as she took her seat on the opposite side of him from Kim Song-ae. "Is our country in high spirits?"

"He's ready to give his speech," she answered diplomatically.

He nodded, understanding. "Korea is resilient. Our comrade is, too."

SH dipped her head, smiling at Jong-il and Kyong-hui as they greeted her, before turning her attention to the auditorium.

The seats below them were packed to the brim, every single bench occupied by workers, Party members, teachers, soldiers, and peasants. The other boxes were full of Supreme People's Assembly deputies, wearing humble suits and choson-ot. Latecomers were still coming in, a few men and plenty of women from the fields, some of them still dressed in the muddy clothes they'd been working in, too eager to see Korea to change. They bowed in the direction of their provinces, Premier, and Chairman before squeezing into seats or finding a spot along the wall.

SH picked out Song Ki-gon near the doors, and Du Seon-gun standing by the front, near the band that was playing off to the side. The rest of her cousins' bodyguards were scattered around Moranbong Theatre, in this room or the underground halls, standing guard against any enemy terrorist attacks. She could see China, too. He hadn't joined them in the box, but was perched almost directly below, with Song Kum-mi and her mother. He had the girl in his lap so she could see better, and even at this distance, she could tell he was flirting with the woman.

The province puffed out her cheeks in exasperation, but turned her attention to the stage as the final notes of 'Aegukka' drifted around the hall, and the military band lowered their instruments, heads swiveling like all the rest.

As the echoes faded, a deep hush fell over the theatre, not a single person in the crowd of hundreds making a sound. The crimson curtain remained still.

SH had time to exchange concerned glances with Kangwon before it was swept aside, and Korea strode onto the stage.

Without him even saying anything, it was like the sight of him drained the tension in the room. The strained energy that had been hanging in the air even through her and her comrades' singing and dancing dispersed, shifting to something more anticipatory.

His boots echoed on the stage as he crossed to the front, standing under the single spotlight that hadn't been doused, powered by their precious rationed electricity. It shone down on him, illuminating his white dress uniform like sunlight on snow, gleaming off the golden thread of his epaulets. The band on their flag was turned to the rich scarlet of the Taedong at sunset, and the red star on his eyepatch blazed brilliantly.

Gone was the tense, wary man of the past few months who hunched when he was stared at for too long, and had that glint of paranoia in his eye. With his spine straight, shoulders back, and head held high, Korea was the picture of unflinching confidence, and, like the crowd, SH felt the tension she'd been carrying in her own shoulders ease before he even spoke a word.

She resolved to capture the moment in paint when the war was won. She could call it 'Lone Magnolia In The Light.' And if that was too fancy, she would just call it 'General.'

Korea didn't speak immediately, turning his head as he scanned the room from one end to another, taking in every single person gathered in the dark to see him. He lingered on the provinces in their box. SH smiled encouragingly, even though he probably couldn't see her in the shadows, and he looked back at the audience, bracing his hands behind his back.

"Comrades," he began, as he almost always did, making sure their people knew he didn't see them as servants or subjects, but equals. "I am glad to see you here, on our Day of the Foundation of the Republic."

His voice boomed out around the hall, the acoustics carrying it to the ears (or 'ears') of every onlooker without needing a microphone to capture it. SH leaned forward in her seat, so hers could receive it just a second sooner.

"You will have noticed this year that I repealed my order to avoid gifting me anything," he said, making her perk up. "You were told that if you had presents you wanted to gift me or your Provincehumans, you should bring them here, or to the Pyongyang People's Committee, or your local organs for those from the provinces. The vestibule in this theatre alone is currently full of hundreds of pounds of clothing, daily necessities, food, and other supplies."

It'd already been burgeoning when SH got here ahead of time to get ready for the performance, filled with gifts from the theatre workers and Song and Dance Ensemble units- mittens, scarves, and socks for the coming winter, crocks of kimchi, dried namul, homemade bandages and antiseptics, all things someone had thought their Countryhuman or provinces could use.

Korea scanned them again, then delivered, "We will be accepting none of them."

A ripple of disappointment ran through the crowd below.

"Hey, wait, who made that decision?" South Pyongan muttered, then added, "Joking," when SH shot her a look.

"Everything you brought will be distributed to those who have lost their homes, refugees from the south, and our hospitals and orphanages."

That was pretty much what she'd been expecting. She saw North Pyongan bobbing his head from the corner of her eye, mouthing something to himself.

Korea looked seriously at all of them. "I am honoured that so many of you are willing to give what you do not have for your country, and I am proud that my people and our Chinese comrades are the most generous in the world."

SH smiled as he nodded to the Chinese representatives, a few local soldiers and some members of the Mobile Command, including Deng Hua. He'd done well adding their comrades to that. She was sure no one else but her and her cousins had heard the little hesitation in his voice.

"But I am not in need," he continued. "I know many of you see this day as my birthday, and wish to do something to mark it. But this day isn't about me."

Down the row, South Pyongan moved her hand to imitate a mouth, lip-syncing Korea's usual spiel to them. Without looking, North Pyongan took it, pressing it back to her lap.

"The Day of the Foundation of the Republic is to commemorate the first time in history that the Korean people formed a state of their own, not one for the yangban or the monarchs, or ruled by foreigners, but one that belonged to the masses."

SH didn't see why it was so hard for Korea to understand that he was that state, so commemorating it by giving him presents just made sense to a lot of people.

"And if it wasn't for those masses, for you, this day would never have existed. That state would not exist. If it wasn't for our workers that build and produce everything we need, our intellectuals that craft our laws, our artists of every stripe that raise morale, our politicians who guide our development, our peasants who keep all of us fed, and our soldiers, who have fought to Liberate our country and are still fighting to keep it free, none of us would be here right now." Korea marked them with his eye in the crowd, turning that glowing star on them one by one. "I am the representation of what you have all struggled to create, but you are the Creators. As are your kin and neighbours and people you have never met and never will.

"They are who deserve your kindness and generosity. Not me."

SH frowned at his word choice. Hwang did, too.

"I know in this face of this war, it can feel like you aren't doing enough. But I assure you you are. Every weed you pluck is a field kept healthy to feed our soldiers at the front, every bottle of shoyu brewed, every pound of salt or bar of soap or pair of rubber shoes produced is another person whose misery will be lessened, every piece of art you make or song you sing is a heart that will be light enough to keep fighting for our nation."

The military band straightened as his gaze landed on them.

It was hard for some of their comrades to enlist to fight the enemy, only to be handed an instrument and told to play just because they'd been learning music for fun before. But sometimes a horn was just as important as a gun. If SH hadn't known that before, that first August Fifteenth at the Raktong would've proved it.

"You have all learned how to fight in whichever way you can." Korea's voice almost sounded like it darkened for a moment before it evened again. "And every one of those ways is equally important to this war, and to our country. That you know how to fight, that you aren't afraid to, is already the only gift I ever need. That you would give away what you can't afford is special enough. You already give back what you can, and Korea would never ask for more than that."

He lay a hand over his snowy breast. "All I will ever ask for Foundation Day is that you honour those who got us here, and those that guarantee we will see another."

Their people were moved, SH could tell. There were soft murmurs from the crowd, and she could see more than a few wiping their eyes, including Song Kum-mi's mother.

But they weren't entirely swayed.

"That idiot realizes he's one of those, doesn't he?" North Hamgyong muttered from where he was standing by the back of the box.

SH's lips flattened. She hated agreeing with him.

"If you truly can't afford to give away what you brought tonight, then take it back," Korea told them. "But if you are willing to part with something for your Countryhuman, then you should be willing to part with it for your countrymen."

Even if he couldn't convince them that he didn't deserve gifts, SH was sure there would be very few people in here that took theirs back, if any. Maybe they wouldn't have brought them if they'd known they wouldn't be going to him, but they wouldn't take them home now.

"I told you last year that I was proud of you." Korea's voice rose. "And that hasn't changed and never will. Every year, my pride in all of you only increases. Every year you withstand the hardship and injustice being thrust upon us, every year that you prove to the enemy how resilient Korea's people are, every year you keep fighting, I only grow more proud." He put his shoulders back even more. "If I was formed as any other country, I could not be half as such."

SH smiled waveringly, clutching her hands to her chest.

"If we were born anywhere else, we couldn't be either, Comrade Korea!" a factory man shouted from somewhere in the audience, ignoring his wife's embarrassed attempts to shush him.

Korea opened his mouth, then closed it. "Thank you," he said, the words not echoing as much as the others.

He lifted his chin, then lowered it, finding his volume again.

"That is why I know that by next year, we will have won this war."

The dark thing, lulled into silence by his voice, stirred as SH heard a growl from behind her.

"And even if we haven't, I know that we will." Korea's voice grew sharper. "With every year that goes by, America's faith in his people only wanes. He realized a long time ago that his army isn't capable of accomplishing his aims of conquering all of Korea, so he has turned to the tricks of 'voluntary repatriation' to hold our comrades hostage and stretch out the peace talks in an effort to wear us down. He knows his soldiers don't have the courage to fight for another year, let alone ten. He knows that with every month that goes by, his masses at home become more disillusioned with their families and neighbours dying for the interests of their bourgeoisie and Imperialist state."

But never disillusioned with humiliating and murdering their people. SH sank her nails into her palms.

"But with every day that passes, my faith in you only grows," Korea declared. "I know there is no world in which the Korean people ever again accept slavery and unjust rule. I know there is no world in which you abandon our comrades in arms and southern brethren. And there is no world in which Korea's faith in his people ever wanes."

He stopped, almost abruptly, eye moving from one side of the room to the other again, ending on the provinces.

'And there is no world in which the faith of Korea's people ever wanes in Korea,' SH mouthed to herself.

But he didn't say it.

"When I say I know we could fight for a thousand years, I am able to mean it, without exaggeration, without doubt. Because of you." Korea took a step forward, towards the crowd. "Because I know my people are the best in the world, and I believe that no matter what, you will never falter. And neither will I."

His words took on an edge as he balanced on that of the stage, something raw that made SH's breath catch, and almost made her want to turn her head.

"I will not stop until you are free, until our country is Liberated and Reunified. I will not rest until our soldiers are released from the enemy camps, until every single one of our people, north and south, can go home, until every single last invader is driven from our Peninsula forever and we are one."

With every promise, his voice rose. His chest heaved now like he was out of breath, even though he wasn't moving. SH's hands fisted in her uniform skirt, unable to look away from him.

"I will never stop believing in you!" he cried, eye shining with a wild lustre as he teetered on the edge of the spotlight. "Korea will never lose faith in the people who have carried us so far, Liberated us from the Japanese, resisted the Americans, built us our own independent Socialist state, the first of its kind in Asia, and give our nation a reason to exist! To all of you, on this, the fourth anniversary of the Day of the Foundation of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, to our workers and peasants and teachers, to our artists and musicians, to our comrades and brothers and sisters in the south suffering under the enemy, to our Worker's Party and People's Army and People's Committees, to our General Kim Il-sung and Chairman Kim Tu-bong, and to S- to all of our people, north and south and living over mountains and seas-"

Korea inhaled a jagged gasp of air, gasping the last word out at them.

"사랑하오!"

Hae squeaked from somewhere in the box, and SH pressed her fist against her heart as flowers of light bloomed in it, knowing that was the closest they would ever get to hearing Korea say that to them, and treasuring it.

On the stage, their Countryhuman thrust his fist up at the sky beyond the ceiling with such force that SH knew his skin had to have torn, baring his fangs at the audience as he screamed in a raw, bleeding voice,

"LONG LIVE THE KOREAN PEOPLE!"

He roared it at them like a challenge, one that every single person in the hall answered, SH with them, throwing herself at the balcony wall to throw her fist towards the same unseen sun as him, commanding in one voice,

"LONG LIVE KOREA!"

The surge of wild elation filled her throat, burning away the pain and grief and anything else clinging to her like grime, driving the dark thing back into its corner. Her cousins rioted beside her, Kangwon shouting "Manse!" over and over with their people, Hwang making the loudest cry his thin chest could manage, almost matching Hae, and South Pyongan howling like a wolf. North Pyongan held his clasped hands to his chest, white eyes shining, and Chagang stood at attention, transfixed by Korea glowing on the stage. She couldn't see North Hamgyong, but he was the last thing on her mind right now anyway.

Kim Il-sung gripped the arms of his chair. His dark eyes reflected the light like star-filled pools. Jong-il had shoved his way in next to SH, peering over the edge of the box at Korea, his own eyes wide, lips parted in a childish mirror of the General's expression.

SH had always thought the boy looked more like Jong-suk, but right now, utterly in love with Korea, he looked just like his father.

She knew how they felt. In this moment, she knew every single person in this theatre, even if there were enemy spies nestled among the rows, did too. But especially the people in this box.

They were the ones that knew Korea wasn't always the person on the stage, full of confidence and charisma. Sometimes he was the man that snarled at them for asking how he was feeling, slunk away to eat his meals alone, or backed himself into a corner like he thought they were going to try and punish him for something he had no control over. And that just made the moments he stood under the spotlight shine even more brilliantly.

SH could remember following Korea down that mountain, away from Kanggye, and realizing from his stilted answers and refusal to look any of them in the eye that the boy who had strode into her cage and stripped her of her unimportant flesh with his piercing gaze wasn't who he was all the time. He was awkward and standoffish, and didn't know how to hold a conversation. And he didn't know if their goal was possible any more than she did.

But he believed it was. Every time he stood before the provinces to tell them how the world should be, how they would make it be, she could tell he believed it more than anything. Even though he had... She couldn't say he had doubts, then or now, but he had fears and worries. He just didn't turn them into inhibitions, like those that had kept her in her cage.

He wasn't always a beacon of surety. He just had hope. And that meant someone like her could, too.

Against her better judgement, she looked over her shoulder. North Hamgyong still stood against the wall, broad arms crossed tight over his chest, his head turned away from the stage.

He had to turn away, or he might be forced to have it to. And that would ruin his wallowing.

She wasn't sure if Korea fell or jumped, but either way he canted off the stage and onto the theatre floor, landing on his feet, meeting their people as they converged on him in the space between the stage and the seats. They thronged from around the room, younger people making way for their elders so they could greet their country first, mothers carrying their children on their hips so they wouldn't get lost. China had set Kum-mi on the floor, saying something into her ear before gently pushing her forward when she looked back uncertainly. Her mother took her by the hand, leading her down through the rows, a soldier joining them, protecting her flank in case the crowd got too rowdy.

Now that he was out of the spotlight, Korea was just another white shirt in a sea of them. It took SH a moment to colour pick his navy and crimson palette in the shadows, finding him already in the arms of an elderly woman as she held him by the backs of his, and an older man rested his palm on his shoulder. More hands reached in to touch his face or pat his back, a swirl of soft colours as people eddied around their Countryhuman, feeling him.

SH knew objectively that to most people, these post-speech... she couldn't really think of anything better to describe them than as 'touching sessions,' would probably be strange. CCCP and the Soviets had never said anything about them on the anniversaries of Liberation Day during the trusteeship, or that first Foundation Day, but there was no way to know if they did the same thing in their country or if they were just being diplomatic. And the Chinese...

She looked over, finding that the foreign soldiers had all gathered together, watching the huddle down on the floor. China had joined them, throwing an arm over one of their shoulders, but still locked on to Korea with his eyes.

Maybe the idea wouldn't be so strange for them. If they knew their Countryhuman was with them, they might do the same.

But for the majority of the world, SH was sure it would be. Especially if they thought they had any knowledge of Korean culture. They weren't the touchiest people, and SH knew from the Soviets' sensitivity guides that foreigners placed a lot of emphasis on their hierarchies. For people from countries whose Countryhumans would never let their people handle them like this, it would probably be inconceivable that Korea would.

Honestly, sometimes it was almost inconceivable to SH. As much as she loved and trusted their people, she wasn't sure she could be comfortable with letting so many men surround her and touch her the way Korea did. It had been one thing when they were Liberated, and in the spur of the moment a dockworker or farmer would embrace her like a daughter or take her by the hands and spin her around. But every year, when they knew it was coming, could look forward to it... She hated that she had to feel like that, but she did. And Korea disliked being touched even more than her.

But every August Fifteenth and September Ninth, he would let hundreds upon hundreds of thier people surround him like this, many of them he'd never even met, folding him into them and touching him more intimately than even any of the provinces had ever been allowed.

Sometimes she thought it might be strange for the audiences, too.

Social hierarchies did matter, even if they were trying to rework them. But mothers that would usually be aghast by their Countryhuman using hao-che with their children were down there letting them cling to his leg and call him Korea without even a 'comrade,' peasants that would never dream of addressing him with anything other than formal hasipsio-che and office workers that would still feel the hesitation of questioning a superior if they had to ask about something were wrapping their arms around him in a way they might even struggle to do to their own fathers. SH could see Dan Won-sun, a professional, serious man from the Pyongyang Artist's Union that she'd never even seen look anyone in the eyes, take Korea's face in his hands and touch his forehead to his. And Korea let him.

Maybe it was a little strange. But SH couldn't see it that way. She could only be proud that her country was one who saw their people as worthy of embracing him, and that their people saw him as worthy of embracing, so much so that on days like these, the few ones where he allowed them, they let it overflow so that he would know how much they loved him back.

She didn't know if Korea would hold her and her cousins like that if they went down there. None of them had ever tried, not even Hae. Instinctively, they left these moments between their Countryhuman and their masses. And so long as they did, they could pretend he would.

She tried not to resent it, but she knew when it came to South, there would be no question.

Down below, the soldier took Kum-mi from her mother, holding her out so she could reach Korea. The girl rubbed her cheek against his like a cat, and he leaned into it, lighting her up like another tiny spotlight.

SH didn't know how North Hamgyong could even be in the same room as their people celebrating Korea this way, let alone with their Countryhuman's words still ringing in their heads and hearts, and not understand that they would win this war, that there was no other choice, that they couldn't even afford to imagine a world in which they lost days like these.

He was clinging so tightly to the bars of that old cage that there must be rust-filled grooves carved into his callused palms. It would've made her sad, if he couldn't just let go, like she had. He was the one that insisted on holding on, refusing to let anyone pry him free or convince him to even consider that tomorrow would be brighter than today, that the dark past and its filthy fingers didn't have to stain every day to come, that even people like them could be happy.

Not her.

'My body and my past might not have belonged to me. But my mind and my future do.'

South Hamgyong turned to look forward.

She refused to look anywhere else.

—

North had been too desperate, too vulnerable. His people had heard the plea in his voice, 'Please believe me, please trust me, please-' He could see it in their eyes as they surrounded him, asking what Kangwon had, asking how they were supposed to when he had said this war would be over two years ago, that their country would be Liberated and Reunified by the first Liberation Day, when they shouldn't have even had one Foundation Day while its fires still raged, let alone three.

As his face was buried in sweet-smelling hair, he felt the urge to say what he'd wanted to the first time he had done this with his people during that torchlit vigil.

But he couldn't. They needed him strong, needed him unflinching and empty of regrets or doubts, or they would be filled with their own.

'Weak,' the eyes, browns and blacks and hazels, around him accused, and North squeezed his shut, letting a gentle hand trace the bandage on the back of his head.

They weren't saying that. He had reassured them tonight, and the only thing in their eyes was faith. He knew it, even if he could hear a voice in his head saying otherwise.

But he didn't deserve it. They didn't know that South had burnt Seoul, they didn't know that he had known about Jeju, even if he hadn't known the full story, they didn't know that he was the reason North wore this eyepatch and that he forgave all of it.

They wouldn't look at him that way if they did know, wouldn't touch him like this or believe in him the way they needed to.

The worst part was that he knew that was a lie. Here, with the hands caressing his face and the husky murmurs of "사랑하오, 사랑하오" filling him to the brim, spoken in middle courtesy even when the rest of their words were in high, North knew the answer to his question from Kaesong- his people would forgive him. Even if they didn't, most would find some way to justify it to themselves, like In-su, telling themselves his reaction was expected when it came to his brother, excusing him.

He knew they would forgive him. But should they? Should they, when if anyone else had done what South had he would kill them himself, and he was only able to forgive him because he made that same excuse?

No, that wasn't it. It wasn't because he was his brother, it was because he was half of their country, because North- because Korea needed him. They needed him. The Korean people needed Korea, whole and Reunified and the way he was meant to be.

But if they ever found out what South had done, they might start thinking like North Hwanghae, like all of the provinces might, that South wanted to do those things, that he was the enemy, that Korea should be put back together from two halves of the country but only one Countryhuman, and when North made it clear that they should never accept that and he never could accept it, when they Reunified they would never trust Korea because one half had burned their homes to the ground and the other half knew he had done it and forgave him anyway, even though if any other member of Rhee's puppet government or his own had given the order, he would have put a bullet in their skull without hesitation.

His skin felt too tight and too hot, prickling under the burns and splitting open around his bones, and all the touching was soothing it and making it so much worse at the same time. His teeth came down, shearing off part of his cheek as someone hugged him too hard, and the gash on his torso screamed. He refused to make a sound, not wanting any of the hundreds of people around him to realize that if it wasn't for the thick pads of bandages he'd wrapped around every inch of his body, his ribs and shoulder blades would be cutting into them, and his uniform would be dyed scarlet with blood.

He didn't know what called them to embrace him like this, if they felt the same thing he did, or if it was something else- old superstition driving them to rub him like an odd coin in the hopes that good luck or prosperity would cling to them after, or just because they could, because Korea's people were some of the few in the world that held their country in their hands, and wanted to hold their Countryhuman in them, too, to prove to themselves that they were his masters. Or maybe it was always the same as that first night, as the villagers had gathered around and touched him with disbelieving faces, needing to assure themselves that he was real, he was here, that after all those years they had someone to fight for them and someone to believe in.

No matter what it was, North had to stand strong. He needed to be someone they felt like they could draw strength from, needed to prove that Korea was in their hands and always would be, needed them to believe in him so much that they would never waver until this war was won, never feel the same f-

He needed them to trust him enough that they knew they always could, even once he wasn't 'him' anymore.

So whatever it was the people around him were looking for in him, North gave it to them, trying to melt into the crowd like he always did, to feel how little the pain and swirling shame in his chest mattered compared to the people around him, to stop feeling everything in his body and mind for just a few minutes.

A soft cheek pushed against his and he pushed back; arms wrapped around him, a man's voice rasping, "Thank you," and he echoed it; a palm rested against his ribcage, meeting his heartbeat under it, and he focused on feeling the pulse behind it pick up to match his.

Through his half-slitted eye, he saw hundreds of faces, many of them familiar- Bang Eul-sik, Ryu Tae-yong, Pak Sun-do and Kim Su-im, his wife, Pak Chol-jin, Yun Jin-suk and her family, Kim Rak-won and Oh Beng-hwan, the woman older and frailer, tears glimmering in her eyes as she patted him on the cheek and thanked him over and over, and dozens more. The rest were familiar because they were his, even if he had never lain his eye on them before.

He saw North Pyongan's charges through the crowd, Oh Tae-min lifting his hand, then hesitating. Hyun Han-jin took it, reaching out for him, and their Countryhuman stretched through the people between them, not feeling the burns under his arms crack, to intertwine his fingers with both of theirs, letting them know he saw them. Dark eyes and light went wide, and his lid dipped lower as that emotion he still didn't have a name for swelled within him, stealing his breath and making his blood rush even faster than before.

사랑 couldn't capture it. For everything it held, it was still too paltry. There wasn't any word in their language or any lesser that could embody how it felt to be emptied of everything, pain, hunger, rage, grief, and be filled with someone else's being until it felt like you would burst, all their bitters and sweets overwhelming yours, becoming yours, to know the people around you better than you knew yourself, even if you didn't even know their names yet.

But in the absence of a better word, 'love' served.

Careworn hands turned him towards their owner, and a matronly woman in a threadbare choson-ot squeezed him tight.

A hand touched his hip as she murmured in his ear slit, "It's not about 'deserve.'"

His breath hitched in his throat, and the too-much-touching-not-enough battle finally short-circuited his brain. He went limp, only remaining on his feet by muscle memory and the sheer amount of people around him as his mind melted out of his head, body finally surrendering the last bit of resistance it had carried by instinct.

People from every corner of Pyongyang and all across the country surrounded him, clasping his hands and wishing him a happy Foundation Day, happy birthday, thanking him and telling him they loved him, loved him, sweet everythings that made his heart swell.

North didn't want to lose this. This had to be the final year, he had to win by next Liberation Day, he had to Reunify them, he had promised. But he knew when he did, America would tell his people about the order South had given. He would tell them he knew about Jeju and Yeosu and Taejon and Pyongyang. He would tell them he had been the one that took North's eye and no one would understand that the foreigner had made him, one final blow to try and crush their faith in their country. Reunification had been supposed to fix the unlikeable part of him, but now this might be the last time they ever looked at him this way as their tongues sang his name like his brother had used to sing songs to get them through the dark and he didn't want to lose them.

But North wasn't capable of thinking anymore. Korea was empty of everything he had to carry that wasn't his people or his love.

He tilted his head back, surrendering to the hands that ran along his throat as a soft voice worried about his burns, and he assured the man he was fine, that nothing the enemy could do to him would ever hurt more than what they were doing to their kin.

The deep ache he always carried, different than the cord that bound him to their other Countryhuman, grew sharper, greater, pushing against his ribs like it wanted to burst out, and like when Korea had hugged South, it felt like all he had to do was shred the skin-thin barrier between them to merge into the people around him, to be one with them. But no matter how he pushed, it wouldn't tear, and he was left holding those around him as close as he could, wishing they would hold him closer.

He wanted this to be the reason they gathered around him like this, because they could feel it, too. He tried to push his own feelings into them, all of them, every single Korean in the room and beyond, to let them know he loved them more than anything, to let them know he was ashamed he forgave South, but to make them understand how much he also loved him. If they knew how he felt about him, they would understand, they would love him too, and when the time came, they would love Korea for every part of who they were.

More than anything, he tried to push those words he couldn't say into them, to apologize for not being able to hate someone that had hurt them, for not even being able to be truly angry at him the way he should be, for not being good enough as he was to save them.

But he would be. Even if they would never love him like this again, all that mattered was that his people and provinces were free and happy and had nothing to envy in all the world.

It wasn't a thought that would have crossed North's mind. But for a second, Korea wondered if merging with someone that could burn their capital would make him good enough.

Then a woman that smelled like damp earth buried her face in his chest, crying, and he stopped thinking altogether as he told her she would be alright, that everything would be okay.

Her bitter and all of the sweet around them, flowing out of his people and into him, was almost enough to drown out the ache in that cord even Korea was trying so desperately not to pull.

Almost.

I love whatever is wrong with him.

The title is a reference to 'In The Embrace of My Motherland' by Choe Dok-sin. Also if you've seen 사랑하오 spelled 해요 before, that's because it's the Southern verb ending. 하오 is the proper Northern one. 제 고양이를 사랑하오. It means I love (you). If that isn't common knowledge. Also 오다 is conjugated 오오. This has nothing to do with the chapter, I just love saying it because it sounds exactly like my disappointed noise.

If you're curious about what China said to Kum-mi before sending her to North, it was 'Gege has some wounds from the enemy under his clothes, so make sure you only touch his face.'

Like Poetry

Last year's speech had been all fire and brimstone, but the simple light of this year's wasn't outdone by it in any way. A profound passion filled the air of the Moranbong Theatre, pushing against the bones of the high roof and those of the people in it, a wave that carried the theatregoers on its swells, eternally cresting but never reaching its peak.

It was unmatched by any church service, but it was the closest thing North Pyongan could think to compare it to, and the reason why he preferred when Korea gave his speeches inside. There was something sacred about being packed in together with your comrades, your thigh pressed to someone else's on a wooden bench, tasting the breath of those around you instead of having it stolen by the breeze, your cries echoing back at you instead of into the void. It turned the theatre into a cathedral, one where the sermons weren't praising God, but the audience, and the preacher spoke like his voice was about to break under the force of the love behind it. The devotionals were the susurrations rising from below, fervent voices occasionally climbing above the rest to praise him back.

No one wanted to leave, not even the peasants that would have to rise early tomorrow to tend the fields. No one wanted the wave to decay, least of all North Pyongan.

When the doors were opened and they started to trickle out, to walk home to their huts and dug-outs and barracks, the feeling would flow out with them, droplets still soaking their skin and dripping from their lashes, comforting them with its warmth as they went to sleep. But when they rose the next morning from their beds of rice straw or thin cots, it would start to dry, and they would remember again that they were at war, and everything that came with it.

And Korea would dry even quicker than them, leaving him prickly and on edge again. By tonight, he would once more be refusing to eat at all, even alone. That rapturous look on his face as he spoke with their people down below would fade, replaced by sharp edges and weary lines.

But for now the Moranbong Theatre swelled with devotion like North Pyongan's heart as he held his hands to it, feeling the rhythm beat like waves against the shore.

'Arcing high into the sky, burning in the mist,
Bursting like a balsam flower, our courage to resist.
Parting waves to the side, holding back the tide,
Crimson star, your light leads us far,.
The love of those below is deeper than you could ever know.'

It was a good one. But he thought Korea wouldn't enjoy it.

Hae broke first, as usual, scurrying out of the box and down to the floor to talk to those that had finished receiving comfort from Korea, and had made way for others to. North Pyongan wasn't able to stand before South Pyongan was pulling him down with her.

"Come on, comrades," she said cheerily. "I think we deserve some praise, too."

"You mean we should reassure our people of victory and let them know their provinces care for them," he corrected.

"Yeah, sure, that too."

North Pyongan shook his head fondly, looking back. His cousins were all following them, and Kim Song-ae was speaking with Kim Tu-bong and his wife, holding Kyong-hui's hand. But Jong-il was still hooked over the balcony railing, straining to see down below. And though the Premier had stood, his eyes remained fixed on Korea.

The province looked forward, watching his step as they descended the steep stairs, making sure his sister didn't drag him down them.

They were met at the back of the room by a flood of people, wanting to greet their Provincehumans on their holiday, too. They weren't as touchy as they were with Korea, sticking to forearm clasps and taking their hands, though there were also a few embraces, especially for Kangwon as he was thanked for saving someone's son or sister or husband, or for the anti-germ warfare campaign. And as older women fussed over the exhaustion that even the shadows of the theatre couldn't hide, though he only assured them he was making sure not to overwork himself.

North Pyongan was happy to receive the congratulations and praise for all their efforts, letting those who gave it know he was proud of theirs, too. None of their work went unnoticed, as he would let his own people know once he returned to Sinuiju.

They lingered, talking about the difficulty of harvesting crops with the planes overhead, and the struggles of working the factories and mills with the electricity shortage still ongoing. They weren't looking for solutions tonight, just to share their troubles, and to receive the comfort that things would get better. Sometimes that was all someone needed- the assurance that those in charge would listen, and that they cared, even if there was nothing they could do.

But they still had to try to do what they could wherever they could. So North Pyongan tucked every word away, keeping the prayers for later, even if those that gave them weren't aware that was what they were.

He searched the room, finding Liaoxi and Liaotung with China and their soldiers. He ached for them, knowing the masks between the Chinese provinces and their comrades must feel stifling. On their National Day, they could only stand in the corner and watch their soldiers celebrate, instead of joining them and all their people the way the Korean provinces could, and as they should.

'That's why we have to sign peace soon. Please-'

He stopped himself before he could say it. If he didn't believe that he and all the people around him could do it, then it would never happen.

The time flowed like the Taedong on a lazy summer day, so that he barely noticed it passing. It could have been ten minutes or seventy before people gradually started to leave. The first person to muster the will to touch the door was a mother whose young child had started to make low cries, tired of being up and overstimulated by noise. Another woman helped her, opening it and letting the dim glow of the hall lights illuminate the back of the theatre.

The mother glanced back, gaze caressing Korea, then stepped out. A few more people followed, all looking back first, at their Countryhuman or their provinces or neighbours, or their General.

North Pyongan knew the reluctance of leaving a celebration. The melancholy that would settle over his shoulders as the festivities wound down, and he knew the warmth and companionship would be replaced by hundreds of ri of unforgiving wilderness and rough living again. Wanting to be the last ones in the town square, rocking gently to music only you could hear.

It was the kind of sorrow you could only taste if you had known joy. The kind of bitter that made the sweet all the more precious.

"Hyung!"

He turned to see Han-jin and Tae-min making their way up from the floor, the taller boy making sure his friend's cane didn't slip.

"We got to touch Comrade Korea!" he declared, stopping in front of him with a grin. "I'm never washing my hand again."

He held it up, wiggling the fingers.

"If you don't, I'm not letting you back in the house," Tae-min threatened.

But he was holding the hand not on his cane to his chest, looking down at it with a glow in his dark eyes.

North Pyongan was glad to see he had overcame the reluctance to join the crowd Han-jin had mentioned after the Liberation Day speech.

"If you don't let me in, where am I supposed to sleep?" Han-jin demanded.

"Outside. You like rolling around on the ground anyway."

"Aww, look who's getting along now." South Pyongan interrupted their bickering to throw her arm around Han-jin, knuckling him on the head. "Glad to see you aren't being a loser anymore. You can thank me for that, by the way."

Han-jin flushed. "Thank you? Noona totally exposed me!"

South Pyongan nodded smugly. "You're welcome."

North Pyongan smiled to himself as Han-jin protested, and Tae-min yelped as the woman suddenly grabbed him, aggressively knuckling him now, the excitement of the sermon making her rowdy.

"Sister," he chided as she worked the boy into a headlock, making him drop his cane.

"Whoops, sorry." She darted down, placing the magpie-headed aid back in his hand. "Foundation Day, you know how it is."

She vigorously ruffled his short hair, leaving him to hopelessly try and straighten it.

North Pyongan arched a brow at her. 'Is he messy enough that you don't have to hurt him for being pretty now?'

She squinted at Tae-min, then gave a thumbs up.

Her brother shook his head as she swaggered away, off to find soldiers willing to roughhouse with her.

As Han-jin helped Tae-min fix his hair, North Pyongan said, "My apologies for her. But it really does lighten our hearts to see you doing well. Both of you."

Something around the boys had smoothed like the sea after a storm, that tension that had lingered between them ever since they escaped Ganghwa finally gone. They no longer stood rigidly, like they were hyperaware of every inch between them, but leaned into each other more naturally.

North Pyongan still had no idea what that day on the mountain had been about, but if it had helped in some way, then he was glad.

The two exchanged looks, eyes softening.

"Yeah," Han-jin said, ruffling his friend's head. "Me too."

"Stop messing with my hair," Tae-min muttered.

But as he looked away, the edges of his lips curved.

North Pyongan offered to walk them home, but they assured him they were only going to the rest house to tell the women there about the speech, and help them with the extra work that so many coming to the city for the holiday brought.

He watched them go as they climbed the stairs to leave the hall. Every uneven step of Tae-min's made his shoulder bump into Han-jin's, pushing them apart before they drifted back together, like flotsam in a current.

"They helped us get some of the costumes ready for the performance," SH said, coming up behind him. "They're good kids."

North Pyongan felt a little glow of pride at the words. It wasn't like he was their parent, but he thought the families they had lost would agree.

"I know a few women I could introduce them to," his cousin said, and he blinked at her.

"I didn't know you were a matchmaker."

She nodded, keeping her voice too low for the people filtering out of the hall to hear. "Korea wants me to find couples that would work well together."

That was even more surprising. Between that and Korea's unexpected... mostly acceptance of North Pyongan and Liaoxi's courtship, he was beginning to wonder if his Countryhuman had some hidden romantic streak. A very well hidden one.

"And it would be nice for them to have someone to look after them once the war is over," SH continued. "Especially Oh Tae-min. I've seen them at the rest house, and they're both capable enough to take care of a household."

North Pyongan agreed. "I don't think either of them would be unequal in a relationship."

Neither boy liked being dependent on even each other, so he doubted they would be a burden on a woman, even with their disabilities. And with how they had treated Ahn Chun-hui (pray for the bliss of the dead), he knew they would respect their wives.

SH nodded decisively. "I know a few women that would get along well with them, I think. Do you what they would look for in-?"

"No."

The two of them jumped slightly, turning to see Chagang had pushed his way through the crowd from the other side of the aisle.

"No?" North Pyongan asked, surprised. It wasn't like his cousin to insert himself into conversations.

"No," he repeated.

"No what?" SH prompted.

"Do not set them up with women."

"SH isn't saying she'll arrange a marriage," North Pyongan reassured him.

"Never," she agreed vehemently, sounding offended Chagang might think that. "I'll just introduce them so they can see where it goes."

Even if they didn't fall in love, they could at least make some friends their age, instead of spending time with almost exclusively aunties.

"No," Chagang repeated stubbornly.

North Pyongan and SH exchanged glances.

"Chagang," she said kindly. "We've talked about this. You can't just say 'no,' you need to elaborate."

Their cousin bored into them with his eyes for a very long moment. Then finally he said, "They are from Ganghwa Island. They will want to marry Ganghwa women. If you try to set them up with women from here, they will feel like you are saying there is no chance of that."

SH's eyes went wide, and North Pyongan winced.

He hadn't even thought of that.

"He's right," he said to SH, chagrined. "Even if they didn't think that way, if you chose Pyongyang locals for them, the women would have to leave their families behind here."

"I was going to introduce them to people who lost their families," she explained. "Ones who wouldn't mind leaving bad memories behind. But no, Chagang is definitely right. We don't want them thinking- Well."

"I have to get them home," North Pyongan said into the bubble of silence that had formed around the three.

"You will," SH softly promised, and Chagang nodded, then looked at her.

"So you will not matchmake them?"

She shook her head firmly. "No. I'll wait until they can go home. Then if they need me, I'll find some good-quality Ganghwa locals."

Chagang dipped his head. "Good."

With no more words, he disappeared back into the crowd like a ship forging through ice.

"He's been... weird lately," SH said delicately.

North Pyongan nodded. "But he said his headaches have gotten better."

Though he felt strangely... distant in a way he hadn't before. He couldn't put his finger on it.

"That's good." She rubbed her chest, then glanced over. "Oh, Comrade Bang Eul-sik."

A man looked their way, waving as he climbed the stairs to join them. "Comrade SH, nice to run into you again. And Comrade North Pyongan."

He bowed his head, manners starting to creep back into the congregants with distance from Korea.

"Are you heading out?" the female province asked.

"Yep. Me and the other model soldiers have the toast with Premier Kim Il-sung now. I can barely wait." The man bounced on his toes as he looked over his shoulder. "And I can't wait at all to get back to Comrade Kim and the rest of the platoon to tell them about all this. But I don't..." He laughed, half-sheepish and half-wonderingly.

North Pyongan knew what he meant. It was difficult to describe Korea's speeches, even to someone that read the transcript or heard them on the radio. Even his poem had done a poor job. That feeling in the air just couldn't be captured, only experienced.

He looked back down at Korea, only to find that he had finally extricated himself from the knot of remaining people, and was coming their way with purpose. He notified the other two, and they turned to meet him.

"Kor- Comrade Korea." Bang Eul-sik stood at attention.

"Bang Eul-sik."

The way their country said his name made North Pyongan's eyebrows rise. Korea still had that dreamy look in his eye that dulled his tone, but there was an aggressive undercurrent to it.

Bang Eul-sik seemed to hear it, too. "Yes, that's me, Comrade Korea."

"Why did you write me that letter criticizing the South Hamgyong People's Committee's efforts in the search for missing persons?"

SH opened her mouth, but he cut her off with a click.

Bang Eul-sik blinked, looking confused. "Because I think they could be doing better. And I know you'll fix the problem. Comrade General."

Korea pierced into him with his eye, then gave a jerky nod. "I will. Continue to send any more complaints you have. At ease."

He tossed the last part over his shoulder, stalking over to a cluster of people and immersing himself in them.

Their comrade finally lowered his hand from its salute, looking askance at the provinces.

"He's..." SH sighed, giving up. "He's like that. It means he's glad you wrote."

Bang Eul-sik relaxed. "Good. I didn't want it to seem like I was blaming him or Comrade SH, but I figured it was better to be blunt than downplay how I felt."

"If we don't know the full extent of a problem, we can't fix it," North Pyongan agreed.

This was a hard one to fix. With the sheer amount of people missing, and efforts needing to be focused on the war...

But those with missing loved ones needed to vent, and they needed to hear. If something could be made better, then it had to be, even if it was difficult.

"That's what I was thinking." He looked after Korea. "But if you get the chance, could you tell him it wasn't a complaint? It was just criticism."

They promised they would, and the soldier bid farewell, going to find North Hamgyong to say goodbye (something SH didn't look entirely pleased by). She soon followed him. North Pyongan would give her the benefit of the doubt and say it wasn't to eavesdrop.

He took the moment of solitude to stand under the shadow of the balcony and savour the dregs of the atmosphere. The few dozen people that still lingered in the theatre, scattered amongst the pews as they talked enthusiastically with Hwang and Hae, or tried to convince Chagang to take one of the jumeokbap they hadn't left in the vestibule, his cousins, less tense than they had been in months, and himself, the tide of pain from his burns momentarily receded, and his hunger sated, even though he hadn't eaten since breakfast.

And Korea, of course, the look of bliss settled back over his face as he returned to the embrace of their people. Touched by peace for a rare moment, just like the crowd.

North Pyongan searched their faces, the shining eyes and soft expressions as they reached for him, holding on for just a little longer.

There was still awe in them. How could there not be? But it wasn't the kind that followed them from village to village during the Occupation. God hadn't descended from the heavens to feed them- he lived amongst them, and helped them develop the tools to feed themselves.

It was almost contradictory, in a way. Perhaps it was just North Pyongan's bad habit of still looking for religion in everything that made him feel the way he did about Korea's speeches, but he didn't think it was. A cathedral, a sermon, a preacher, he was certain it wasn't only those who attended church that could feel those parallels.

The way Korea's words raised a crowd, got into the blood of the audience and lit it on fire, and the way he and their people embraced each other after, the looks on their faces and the timbre of their voices as they burned together, made it unmistakable that it was something near a religious experience for both sides, and greater than any North Pyongan had ever experienced singing hymns. He knew because he felt the warmth, too. Though Korea would deny it if he said any of that to him, and likely smack him upside the head.

But despite the devotion that filled the room, and the laying of hands that could very well be called worshiping by both sides, it didn't elevate Korea. It didn't set him farther ahead on the path, making the awe between him and those they were guiding grow cold with distance, like the kind that filled the faces in church pews, or felt towards a far-away idol, like Joseon. It only melted it.

North Pyongan had to wonder if there was ever a moment when Jesus Christ had stopped being the son of a carpenter to his people, and became the Son of God. If the eyes that had once met his became fixed respectfully on his feet, and the hands that once reached out in friendship reached out solely in supplication. If he had ever been as scared of straying from the path as Korea was.

He still couldn't believe he would. Not when he was across the room with a woman resting her hand on his arm as casually as if she was his brother, and his brow was bending towards hers like he was fighting the urge to rest it there. But his province would walk beside him anyways, and he would watch. Jesus' miracles had turned him divine. North Pyongan would make sure that, to their people, these sacraments only continued to make Korea more mortal.

Perhaps that was part of why he gave himself over to the crowds, not just to heal them, but to let them feel that he was only flesh and blood. And to remind himself that he was walking with them.

North Pyongan didn't think he could forget. Because while they still felt awe, and Korea's was greater than any of theirs, he knew that was no longer what he saw shining in any of their eyes.

South Pyongan sidled up next to him, holding a finger over her lips as she held up one half of a jumeokbap that had been 'forced' on her. North Pyongan smiled, taking it, turning Korea's charity to mutual aid for him. He rested his head on her shoulder as he chewed, just for a moment. She made a face at him as he pulled back, her cheeks full of rice, and he smiled. Embarrassed, she looked back out at the theatre, at Korea still rocking with their people in the far reaches of the spotlight's pale glow.

Eyes shining like their Countryhumans', the Pyongans bore witness.

—

"It's okay to take just a little."

"I'm alright, really," Kangwon said again to the auntie trying to force tteok wrapped in mugwort leaves on him. "I get enough to eat at the hospital."

Korea had upped his rations again, meaning he got the amount headquartered officers had been receiving before the army economization. And he'd added another hundred grams to help with his blood loss, at least until he wasn't suffering from anemia anymore.

'Without upping his own.'

The woman gave him a skeptical look, from the bags under his eyes to the way he was standing.

Yeah, he looked... rough. He felt rough, like usual. But he was eating enough. Even if nothing could fill the empathetic hole in his stomach, he was recovering steadily. He might even be able to sit down again soon.

"I know they aren't very fancy," the woman fretted. "But I'd like Comrade Kangwon to have them."

"It isn't about how fancy they are." Kangwon gently out his hands over the wrapped tteok, pushing it back towards her. "You need it more than me."

She'd said it was gaetteok, flimsy rice cakes made with namul pounded into paste, glued together with whatever scraps of flour you had. They were a step up from pine bark (not that Kangwon had anything against bark), but still survival food. It wasn't something you brought as a gift for your Country or Provincehuman if you could afford to bring anything else.

"Please," she urged. "I told my son I'd bring you something."

"Your son?"

"Sin O-jong?" She said the name like a question, thinking he might've forgotten it.

He hadn't, and it let him attach her to a name the man mentioned during his time in the hospital- Beom Sun-dol. He'd never met her in person before since she was working during his follow-up visit at their dug-out.

She looked relieved at his nod. "You saved his life and never asked anything for it. We want to pay you back, even if it's just with something like this."

"His treatment was free thanks to the State's care for war victims," Kangwon deflected. "And I didn't save his life. He was always going to make a smooth recovery."

The Rubber Factory worker had been too close to one of the detonations during the big raid back in July. He'd had some bad orbital fractures and globe ruptures, and he'd been trapped under rubble for too long to get the urgent care he needed. His vision had never came back, but he luckily hadn't received any major head trauma or internal bleeding.

"Not... like that." Her eyes dipped. "It's been... hard. Adjusting. Especially when I have to be at the factory so much. But he talks about you a lot, and the things you told him. It makes me think... that maybe he'll be okay."

Kangwon felt one of the hundred tiny knots tied inside him loosen a bit. He'd felt like Sin O-jong was doing okay the last time he saw him, but he'd been too busy with the germ warfare investigation, and then... He hadn't been by lately. It was good to hear a positive diagnosis from someone else.

He couldn't play dumb now. But he could redirect.

"I didn't save him," he said again. "I just healed his body, and tried to help him develop the mindset to save himself."

He'd seen the despondency on his scarred face as he sat in his hospital bed, unable to read or write stories the way he'd used to to pass the time, and the frustration as he groped around blindly for his spoon at mealtime. He'd made sure to put aside time to visit him at City Hospital One at least once a day, even if his body'd rather pass out in the break room, right up until he had to leave to help the foreign scientists, trying to help him realize that losing his eyesight wasn't the end of the world, or his life.

Beom Sun-dol was undeterred. "Either way, you're the reason I'm still able to come home to my son at night. If I could know a meal I made gave you the strength to make sure someone else can come home to theirs, it would lighten this mother's heart."

When she put it like that, Kangwon couldn't refuse anymore.

"Alright," he gave in, and she pressed the wrapped gaetteok into his hands, then went a step farther and pulled him into a hug.

Like every one he'd received tonight, it immediately made his body want to go limp, exhaustion flooding through him. He'd been sleeping even less than before, on the floor in one of the rooms, too afraid to drift off in case he didn't realize the IV was empty, or couldn't hear if the ragged breathing above him had stopped.

'Warm...'

"Thank you," Beom Sun-dol whispered. "Truly."

Reluctantly remembering he was supposed to be the one comforting her, Kangwon rubbed her soothingly on the back, then pulled away a bit.

"It's going to be a constant battle," he told her. "Recovery isn't a straight road. There'll be better days and worse ones."

She nodded tearily, letting him know she'd seen both. Kangwon squeezed her rough hands.

"Let him know you're there for him," he advised, thinking of Sip Tal-sun. "And that he isn't a burden. Don't let him bottle things up- even if he doesn't want to talk, make him."

Hypocritical advice, maybe, when he couldn't make Korea. But Sin O-jong was easier to talk to than their Countryhuman, and hadn't had as many years to internalize suffering in silence like so many men did, like Sip Tal-sun had.

Korea hadn't said anything when he'd told him about his suicide. Just grimly nodded like he'd expected it. It wasn't a reaction Kangwon liked, especially when he put his own body at risk so often, running into combat by himself or apparently almost getting blown up with China's Jeep.

"Let him know he isn't alone."

Beom Sun-dol nodded fervently, squeezing his hand back. "I will. My boy could never be a burden."

"Sometimes even if how you feel about someone is obvious to you, it's less obvious to them."

'It's not about need.'

Or not obvious at all.

Under her watchful eye, he tucked the gaetteok into the pouch on his general's uniform. He could eat one or two to fulfill her wish, then see if Kim Yong-hwan wanted the rest. She'd been working just as hard as him lately, picking up the slack when he was with the ISC or for those few days he was in his province.

And when Korea took him back to Wonsan last week.

His anxiety spiked, the way it had when he'd left for it. His capital was still under siege, and even worse than before. So many faces from the last visit had been gone- Kim Ju-kyu had been one of them, and Heung In-kun, only two days after Kangwon's last visit. He'd led a charge to repulse a reactionary landing party, and been cut down by a destroyer's cannons.

With every nail of grief hammered into his heart, his nerves had only frayed, dreading that he'd get back to Pyongyang just to be met with another. Korea had refused to talk about it, but he knew he'd feared it, too. He'd taken him straight to the military hospital the moment they returned.

They'd been spared then, and every day since. But...

Kangwon needed to get back to the hospital.

He said goodbye to Beom Sun-dol and looked around the theatre, confirming that almost everyone was gone. Even the Premier had said his farewells and left for the toast to the model soldiers, and the few people left were either stagehands, performers, or occupied with Korea or his cousins. It shouldn't be a problem if he got his guards and headed out.

He glanced over as the door to the theatre opened, and someone entered instead of exited.

His heart dropped.

An Il-rae hurried in, stopping at the top of the stairs to frantically scan the hall like she was looking for someone.

Him. He'd told her to come get him if something changed in her condition.

Part of him wanted to hide behind one of the benches. Korea's speech had lifted the weight on him up at least a little, allowing him to breathe. If it came crashing back down now...

His heart couldn't take another nail.

Kangwon inhaled deep, then exhaled.

It would. It had to. He needed to become someone Korea could depend on, so he'd let him take care of him again. He needed to make sure more parents would be able to come home to their children. He had more people to save.

Even if he lost her.

He headed for An Il-rae, trapping his nails in his palms.

"Comrade Kangwon!" she cried when she saw him, scurrying over, and when he saw the look on her face, he almost could've added another tally to the amount of times he'd cried in his life.

A wave of relief washed over him with her words, and he quickly thanked her, jogging across the room. He grabbed Chagang, taking a second to let him know what they'd done had worked. His cousin dipped his head, happy, but Kangwon was already going straight for their Countryhuman. He couldn't wait for the people around him to leave, and maybe if he knew, he'd be able to have a few moments with them with one less worry hanging over him.

"Korea!"

He stiffened as he grabbed his sleeve. "What?"

Kangwon grinned up at him, finally able to say the words he had been waiting twenty days to say.

"Choe Kang-ok is up."

This chapter was finished days ago. But you know how it is. Three days to write a poem. ㅠㅠ

I think modern day North Pyongan believes in Juche like a religion. Not follows it, because he's not dogmatic and they're the ones guiding it, but believes in it. All of the provinces do ideologically, but for him there's still very much a religious flavour to that belief. Because even once he's no longer religious that influence has left an indelible mark on his character and way of thinking and feeling about things. He doesn't go to church anymore, but he does go to Party Central Committee meetings, and that's almost the same thing. Except the god isn't intangible anymore, it's the people behind the walls whose lives they're trying to make better.

The reason Tae-min was hesitant to reach for North in the last chapter (and at other speeches) is because even though he's accepted that he's gay, he still feels that others would be disgusted by it. Like if North knew he liked men, he'd feel violated that he was touching him. He wouldn't (especially not when he's blissed out), but it's obviously an understandable fear, especially considering something that happened to Tae-min in the past.

Hehe, finally I can post him and Han-jin's backstory and future chapter. These will be in the artbook tomorrow.

Skinship

They hurried down the halls of the hospital, Kangwon having to stretch his legs to keep up with Korea, to the point that his burns were sending shocks of pain up into his hips. But there wasn't any getting his Countryhuman to slow down. He'd taken the GAZ instead of walking, leaving the other provinces (and China) stranded at the theatre, and wouldn't even pause for the nurses that wished him a happy Foundation Day as he strode past. After only setting foot in the hospital for his blood donations and refusing to go anywhere near Choe Jong-ok's room, now it was like he couldn't wait another second.

He only halted at the impassable barricade standing in front of the room door with her hands on her hips.

"He appears at last," Kim Yong-won said scathingly. "But not for the first time today, I hear."

"Move," Korea ordered.

"Oh no. I haven't seen to your injuries in months. Months," she emphasized. "And neither has this one."

Kangwon winced as Korea swung his head his way, feeling him scorch him with judgement for 'talking about him behind his back' (discussing a patient's condition with a fellow medical professional).

"Even after those last two big runs." She glared at him. "The city burned for the entire night during that July one. Fires were still smoldering when we finally left the shelter. Even if it wasn't for all the other hell those bastards are raining all over our country, you would need a good exam and disinfecting for that alone. But I bet you haven't even been doing that."

"I am taking care of them."

The nurse scoffed. "And by that you mean you've been splashing water on yourself and slapping reused bandages over them."

"No," Korea said stiffly.

Kim Yong-hwan crossed her arms. "I'm not letting you in this room until you let me have a look at you."

A dangerous move. Though probably the only one that would have a chance of working. Kangwon eyed Korea.

His face had darkened. "You would deny your Countryhuman access to one of his soldiers?"

The woman was unimpressed. "How many times do I have to tell you- pulling rank means nothing when we're in my hospital. The girl has been on the up, which you would know if you ever came by. She's too strong to be kept under anymore, and that means I don't see her backsliding any time soon. She'll still be here in ten minutes. If you've allowed yourself to get gangrenous, you might not be."

She took a step forward, like she was going to grab Korea's sleeve, and his eye flared as he took one back.

"You do not touch your Countryhuman without permission!" he snarled, and the sound of his voice stopped Kim Yong-hwan short, shock flickering across her face. Kangwon's own eyes widened.

Korea's fierce expression faltered for a moment as he took another step away, before he curled his lip again, showing his fangs at their comrade.

"I am going in there now."

His voice was low, and Kangwon recognized the unsteady light in his eye as the same from when he'd attacked him in the Quarantine Hospital after finding out about Hae's condition. Kim Yong-hwan might as well have been holding him at knifepoint instead of just wanting to make sure he was okay.

"It's been a long day." Kangwon kept his voice causal as he put himself between them. "And Comrade Choe is probably still worn out. It'd be better to see her now so she can get some rest, and Korea can come in tomorrow for an exam."

They both knew he wouldn't be doing that. If they let this leverage go, they were letting the chance to treat his wounds go.

But there was only one more step Korea could take before his back would meet the corridor wall.

Kim Yong-hwan's jaw feathered as she looked past him at their Countryhuman. Then she stepped aside.

"Fine. Go."

Her voice was icy, and so was the glare she shot him as he brushed past her into the room. But the look she gave Kangwon was concerned.

She was too professional to take a patient's attitude personally, but she knew Korea, and that he'd just spent the past hour getting manhandled. She knew he shouldn't care about touching right now.

Kangwon made an apologetic blink, and her hand grabbed his shoulder as he walked by. Korea could still hear them, so she couldn't say anything. But she flattened her lips, a look he could read as easily as his cousins'.

'Take care of him.'

He wished he could. Even if he thought he knew now why his Countryhuman hated the idea of letting them tend to him, he still couldn't understand it. All he could do was keep trying to prove he could rely on him.

And hope Korea didn't die of sepsis in the meantime.

Kangwon entered the room, shutting the door behind him, and as he laid eyes on the person in the bed, for a moment, his worries melted away.

"Hey Uncle Kangwon." Choe Kang-ok gave a strained smile as she pushed herself up on the cot.

Her voice was raspy, and the left side of her face didn't move as much as the right. Her eyes were sunken into purple sockets, and he could see the withered, reddened skin where her lesser burns peeked out of the collar of the blue and white striped hospital gown and crossed her scalp.

But she was alive.

Kangwon swallowed the lump in his throat. "Don't move too much," he advised, heading over to adjust the pillow under her and move her cup of water closer by instinct.

Her hand shot out, grabbing his uniform. "Gyuri," she said urgently. "Is she-?"

"She's alright," Kangwon told her. "But she wants to kill you."

The women let out a shaky breath, relaxing. "Of course she does. That dumba- idiot. She wouldn't leave that stupid gun. I should kill her, making me save her like that."

"Try not to talk too loud, your throat is still healing."

"Yeah," she whispered hoarsely, putting a hand to it. "It feels like I'm gargling gravel."

"It should go away," Kangwon assured her. "Your larynx and lungs took damage from the heat, but it wasn't too severe. You might have a little shortness of breath in the future, but it shouldn't be chronic, and your voice should go mostly back to normal."

She nodded. "Comrade Kim Yong-hwan told me. And she... she said I should be able to return to service."

She said it hopefully, looking up at him.

Kangwon followed the line of stitches on her face. Then he nodded.

"Yeah," he managed, even though the idea of her heading out to the front again made his own throat want to swell shut. "It shouldn't affect your ability to serve."

Choe Kang-ok sagged, her head tipping back against the steel frame of her cot as her dark lids fluttered closed in relief for a second, before sliding back open.

"I need to go now," she said, trying to sit up more. "I need to get back to Commander Ryang and Gyuri and- I need to tell them all I'm okay."

She made a noise, sliding back down as Kangwon moved to steady her.

"Careful," he soothed as she gasped in pain. "I'm sure Comrade Kim also told you you shouldn't be asking if you're capable of returning to the field so soon."

She looked down sheepishly. "She called me an idiot."

"I have a better bedside manner than her, so I'll just say you're not in any condition to fight yet. We'll send a telegram to Comrade Ryang and the rest of your unit to let them know you made it."

There were still plenty of things that could go wrong in her recovery. Infection could still set in or the grafts could get rejected after all or there could be some unknown complication from what he'd done or- But she'd made it through the worst of it. So all Kangwon could do was believe she'd made it, and keep working to make sure he was right.

"I don't want to be lounging around in here when we win," Choe Kang-ok whined, and looking at her stubborn pout, her flat nose scrunched up and the one cheek that was still freckled puffed out, Kangwon felt a sharp pang in his heart.

Korea was standing stiffly in the corner, not speaking. But he'd looked away, so the province knew he'd seen the same thing he did.

"You're just like your dad," he said without thinking, and her cheeks flushed. Both of them, part of his mind noted.

Choe Kang-ok's mouth opened, then closed, her bottom lip disappearing under her teeth. "That... That means a lot. Thank you."

There was a beat of silence, then Korea said what Kangwon had been working up to, "Are you aware of what had to be done to save you?"

The woman's hand went to her face, fingertips grazing across the left side. "Yes," she said after a moment. "It's blurry, but I remember Comrade Kangwon waking me up to ask if it was okay."

'Will you let me save you?'

Kangwon tugged at his sleeve, which hid the almost healed incision he'd made in his wrist. He'd managed to hide it from Korea once he'd gotten back to the camp. His dedication to saving Choe Kang-ok had just reinforced his belief that he should never know that drinking their blood worked like the transfusions.

"Have you had the chance to see your face yet?" he asked her.

She nodded. "Comrade An Il-rae made Comrade Kim Yong-hwan bring me a mirror earlier."

Her fingers traced the stitches that separated her normal tanned skin from the patches of russet that cradled her eye, covered her cheek, and ran from her burnt scalp down into her collar. Where Kangwon's skin had been turned red from burns, hers had become the exact shade he'd been before.

None of it had came from his face. You shouldn't do skin grafts from the head, almost couldn't. Unless it was a desperate situation and you weren't the doctor performing the surgery. But he'd still had small patches of normal skin in between his burns, just enough to cut away and piece together. And that stubborn patch on his haunch had come in handy. He hadn't been able to sit down in weeks, but that was a small price to pay.

"I... saw my body, too," she said, subtly eyeing Korea's face.

"We didn't have enough skin," Kangwon said, feeling their Countryhuman staring at him. "I wasn't enough. Comrade Chagang had to chip in."

"I'll have to tell him I say thank you."

"I'm sorry it's so noticeable," he said, feeling weirdly awkward, considering he was talking about a medical procedure. "I couldn't focus on cosmetics."

He'd had time to think while prepping for the surgery and waiting for Korea and Chagang to arrive, feeding her just enough of his blood to keep her heart beating, but not enough to make him woozy. He hadn't been sure if he should try and take skin from other parts of her body to cover his own. Not for aesthetics, but to maybe help the grafts take. But in the end he'd decided it was too risky to cause any more damage to her. He'd stuck with just theirs, working with steady hands and an unwavering will to sew the skin over the worst of her napalm burns, covering bone and muscle back up.

And it had worked. His flesh had integrated with her wound beds. Where the cells on SH's toe had died soon after it was amputated, his own had latched on to Choe Kang-ok's, and been sustained by them. Hwang's throwaway musings in the lab over a year ago had been right- they could use their skin to perform grafts.

He wished he'd know that for Kim Mi-ju. But at least it had worked for Bong-nam's daughter.

"It's okay," she said, still feeling her patchwork face. "Now I've got cool war scars like Abeoji. And bigger, too."

The little cut on his cheek from one of their final battles against the Japanese. He'd been so excited when Kangwon said it would probably scar, like he didn't already have those old marks on his back, stretched out by time.

'Yeah, but people can actually see this one without me taking my shirt off.'

"Am I going to get cool powers to go with it?" his daughter asked. "Will I be able to heal fast like you, or bring people back to life with my blood? Chukjibeop?"

She was joking, but Kangwon could see a nervous flicker in her eyes. Her body had been changed, parts of people that weren't exactly human grafted on in place of hers. And like he'd told her in the medical tent as he asked if she would let him do it, they didn't really know what that could mean for her.

"I don't think so," he said, leaning against the wall. "I've been monitoring the grafts. For the first week, my cells were replicating just a little less than average. But they slowed down after. And for the past few days, they've plateaued and started acting like yours."

Like a normal skin graft, just one that resisted infection better, and had a little bit of boosted regeneration, long enough to heal.

"But keep an eye out," he advised her. "If you notice anything out of the usual with your body, tell a nurse immediately, even if you think it's just the burns."

Choe Kang-ok nodded, her hand dropping. "That will be hard to do if I'm on Paektusan all of a sudden."

"You won't be able to do chukjibeop."

"Never say never."

Korea shifted slightly. Kangwon looked at him, encouraging him to say something. But he stayed quiet.

"That's your blood, isn't it?"

They looked over. Choe Kang-ok was staring at the IV bag feeding into her arm, half-full of red liquid.

"I feel like I could take on a hundred Yankees," she noted. "That's what a comrade who had a transfusion from Comrade Gangwon said it was like."

"Yeah," Kangwon said. "It's Korea's." He ignored the man's glare.

Choe Kang-ok ran a burnt fingertip along the tubing, tracing the blood until it disappeared into her veins. She looked up at them.

"You really did a lot for me, didn't you? I'm... not sure I deserve all of this."

"Don't say that," Korea said sharply before Kangwon could. "It isn't- about 'deserve.'"

"But if I was just a regular soldier-"

"We didn't do this because you are Choe Bong-nam's daughter," he firmly cut her off. "We did it because you are one of our people. The flesh and blood of Korea and his provinces belongs to you as much as any other Korean."

Really glad he hadn't let him find out about the blood drinking thing.

Kangwon nodded. "We might've been even more worried than usual, all things considered. But if I'd had the idea, I would've tried it on you even if I'd never met your father, or you. You gave your body for your comrade- it was only right someone should give theirs for you."

Choe Jong-ok's brown eyes glimmered slightly as her lips pressed together, and Kangwon saw a little boy do the same thing, trying not to cry over the pain from his back.

"Your father would be proud," he said softly, and their comrade ducked her head.

"Thank you," she said, swiping an arm across her eyes. "Thank you, Comrade Kangwon, Comrade Korea."

"We really don't mind 'uncle,'" Kangwon said, ignoring Korea's noise of protest.

Choe Kang-ok smiled tremulously, freckled cheek and russet one both pushing her eyes up into crescents. "Thank you, Uncles."

"Any time," Kangwon assured her. "But maybe try not to get napalmed again until our skin grows back."

She burbled a laugh, holding an arm out. After a second, Kangwon leaned in, bending slightly awkwardly to avoid sitting down as she wrapped him in a half-hug. His cheek rubbed against his own flesh, hers now.

"I hope it's okay to say," she whispered in his ear. "But I think Abeoji would be proud of you, too."

Kangwon's throat swelled shut. He didn't answer, just squeezed her a little tighter.

She winced when he let go.

"Are you okay?" he asked, when he could almost sound normal.

"I don't want to complain when you and Comrade Chagang skinned yourselves for me, but it still hurts," she said. "A lot."

It was why they'd kept her in a medically-induced coma even after her body had came out of the one it put her in. Their blood in her system had kept trying to bring her back to weary half-consciousness, but the shock of the pain would've just put more strain on her. They'd gone through... far too many sedatives doing it, but they'd decided to keep sending her back under until she woke up clear and strong enough to think.

"And I'm itchy." She scratched lightly at her neck. "And starving."

"The stitches will be coming out soon. Did you already eat?" Kangwon asked, eyeing the empty bowl.

She nodded. "But I think calling me a glutton would be unfair when I've probably been living off liquid rice and blood for the past few weeks."

She had been. Rice slurry poured into her mouth and Country and Provincehuman blood constantly pumped into her veins, hoping it might help their skin accept its new host.

"I wasn't going to," he said. "It's normal for you to be hungry. Just... Once you've recovered a little more, and you get to eat enough to be full, tell me if you still aren't."

Choe Kang-ok tipped her head.

He glanced at Korea, then said, "You'll know what I mean. If you never do, then don't worry about it."

He didn't think the empathetic hunger was tied to their skin or blood. It should be about what they were, connected to their being. And it looked like their flesh had started to become more... human anyway.

But he had performed a medical experiment that had possibly never been attempted before in all of history. Or if it had, it had been never been shared, for one reason or another. You couldn't blame him for being on high alert.

"How vague and unsettling," Choe Kang-ok remarked, and he chuckled.

"Sorry," he said, pulling the leaf-wrapped tteok from his pouch. "Here, gaetteok to make up for it."

He couldn't not let her eat all of them. Hopefully the fact that she had so much of his blood still in her system and his skin merged with hers would be enough for Beom Sun-dol. And at least he'd received her feelings.

"Sorry it's not much," he said as she snatched them. "But they were made with love."

"Tastes like it," she mumbled, already shoving one of the floppy green discs in her mouth. "Way better than pine bark and lichen."

"Pine bark and lichen aren't that bad."

"Abeoji said you had a strange thing for it. You know one time I caught Comrade Gangwon eating bark when we had just received rations from some villagers?" She shook her head, then looked up apologetically. "I hope he's okay, by the way."

"Yeah," Kangwon said, her at squeezing. "Me too."

"Here." Korea suddenly thrust something out for Choe Kang-ok. "Take this, too."

"And jumeokbap?" She eagerly took the rice ball with her free hand. "I'll be back on the field in no time."

Kangwon gave Korea a disapproving look, knowing he was giving away something one of their people had given him.

His Countryhuman glared at him. 'Hypocrite.'

Kangwon raised his brows, sending the accusation right back.

"Uncle has been quiet," Choe Kang-ok said, a hand over mouth as she chewed. "Are you feeling alright?"

Korea had tensed at the question, so Kangwon again excused, "It's been a pretty long day. We came here from the Foundation Day speech."

Her eyes widened as she tried to sit up, putting down the gaetteok she'd been gnawing on.

"No one told me it was September Ninth! Happy birthday, Uncle Korea!"

Korea's shoulders hunched. "It isn't my birthday." At Kangwon's look, he muttered, "But thank you."

"How old are you now?"

"Four," Kangwon said.

"Forty-two," Korea corrected acidly.

Choe Kang-ok scrunched her face. "Old men," she teased, taking another bite of tteok.

Kangwon felt a pang as he realized he was older than Bong-nam now. He had been two years ago, though he hadn't known it at the time. His friend at died at forty, while Kangwon kept aging, even if his body stayed the same.

'But you weren't much older than me, were you? Or even my daughter now. You were both just kids, too. You still are.'

Kangwon had been younger, in years. And now he was older. And one day, Choe Bong-nam's daughter would also be older than her father had ever been. Eventually she would age, her hair turning grey and her body failing. And someday she would die, and her years would come to an end while her province's kept climbing, past her and her father's combined, into an amount no actual human he met and loved could ever reach.

But at least Choe Kang-ok would age. She could go on to rejoin the fight, to save more comrades and kill more of the enemy, to Liberate their country and make it better, build the life in it her father had never be able to. Bong-nam would want her to live longer than him, that had been the life he'd been fighting for for her, and all their children. He hadn't lived to see his big brothers grow up, but now one day his daughter could get married and have kids that would call the Kangwons and Korea their great-uncles, and Kangwon could watch them grow, and their children, and their children's children.

And maybe, just maybe, as the rest of Kang-ok's face drooped with age, those russet patches would stay forever young, and give her a few more years than she should have. Because Kangwon had succeeded.

He hadn't lost her.

He sat on the bed, even though it hurt, asking about their anti-aircraft efforts before she'd been wounded, and Korea stood silently in the corner, not saying anything, but not leaving either, his eye tracing the dimpled line between her old flesh and new over and over again, like he was convincing himself it had actually worked.

Kangwon wished he'd let him tell her how much their Countryhuman had really done. Besides giving his permission, and the transfusion loop Kangwon had set up between the two as he performed his surgery, circulating his blood through her system until she had more of it in her veins than he did, and he had more of hers, and all the blood he'd donated after, leaving it with Kangwon so he could keep it in her system, give her just a little more strength to fight. Even with all that, there was more.

But he didn't want her to know, just like he didn't want anyone beyond them, Chagang, and Kim Yong-hwan to know the full story of what they'd done. He probably would've hidden his donations from her, too, if he could. He wanted Kangwon and Chagang to take all the credit.

But they couldn't. And Choe Kang-ok would probably realize that someday, when she was out of the hospital, as she twisted and turned to examine the patches of coloured skin that interrupted her burn-marked brown.

Because Kangwon and Chagang still hadn't been enough. They'd needed just a little bit more skin to patch the worst of the napalm burns.

On the small of her back, taking up a space the size of a fist, was a patch of crimson the colour of the band on their country's flag.

My babyyyyyy I love you Choe Kang-ok. <3 If you read the Softening chapter in Safeway Pyongyang, something about the way her portrait is described will make sense now. Also my skin graft foreshadowing from forever ago. My chapters may multiply, but my ideas have (almostmostly) always been planned.

In this world, the DPRK is the first country to perform a successful limb graft. It's some random worker who got his arm torn off in a factory accident in the late 50s post-war rebuilding period, that Kangwon uses his own tissue to help graft back on. But this is never revealed, for the same reasons that they keep what their blood can do hidden. So the rest of the world still thinks the first successful attempt was in 1962 in America. This really pisses South Pyongan off, (and North, if we're honest), and frustrates Hwang, for different reasons. But North manages to prioritize his desire not to see colonized countries or provinces be used in medical experiments over national pride. It's maybe a little harder than he'd like to admit. South Pyongan can only be talked out of going public about it because SH points out that going 'Actually, you know that limb transplant the US just did? We did that first.' Would definitely be called propaganda and used to mock them, and as usual, America would be believed over them. It's also a little frustrating to Kangwon, not because of bragging rights or wanting to be considered pioneers in the field, but because he thinks more people's limbs could be saved if more countries knew. But at that point, he also doesn't fully believe the other nations would donate parts of themselves like that for the good of civilians, so he lets it go, and focuses on his own practice.

Seething with rage at the peace vigil. 'Ohhhh nuclear weapons are bad and we're so committed to everyone not having nuclear weapons! >< ' (refuses to commit to the non-nuclear principles) What Takaichi really means is 'the DPRK and any of our former victims shouldn't have nuclear weapons but the US should ship them to us immediately so they can use us as a launchpad ^^' No matter where I go I am destined to live in a cucked nation.

Why

[image]

Twisting, turning, each scrape of flesh against coarse fabric only making the pain worse but needing to move, to try and escape it, even if he knew he couldn't when it was part of his body.

North rolled over on the bedroll, sinking his fangs into the pillow to muffle the pathetic sound he could feel building in his throat, grateful for once that Hae kept returning it as agony rolled through him in waves.

He didn't have to worry about China. The other country had never came in from his dinner, probably off annoying someone somewhere. And the steel door was too thick for his sleeping provinces to hear. But he still couldn't let the noise escape. It was weak, and he wasn't weak.

The pain wormed down into the roots of his nerves, finding ones that were still alive to scrape against, gnawing and clawing until they went dead, too, and he was just left with the unceasing burn. And there was that fucking itch, not the prickling, but a real place he needed to scratch, but couldn't unless he wanted an infection to set in for sure. He couldn't see that part of his back, but he knew from the terrible burning itch that it likely already had.

He could feel the strikes increasing, like they had ever since the sun had gone down, targeting the military supply center northeast of Pyongyang, as he had seen before the General insisted he return to the bunker for the night, and in dozens of other places.

They would be especially hard tonight, and for the next couple weeks, as they had been for the last few. They always were on holidays, his and America's. He had seen the photographs in the foreign papers, grinning American infantrymen standing next to 500-pound bombs with 'HAPPY FOURTH OF JULY, MR. AMERICA!' written on them in sloppy streaks of paint. The words would end up as blackened and twisted as the metal that burst over Korea's cities and rained fire down on his people. Celebrating the liberation of their country with the destruction of North's.

Another one hit, blasting through his abdomen, and he gasped unwillingly into the thin fabric, before baring his teeth and pushed himself up on his arms, even though it made his flesh throb worse, a nauseating sensation that struck down into his bones, making him feel like he was going to throw up again. He panted with his mouth closed, eye shut tight as every single inch of his body screamed.

He should be glad China wasn't here to witness this. But right now his annoying chatter and yammering about nothing would be a relief, so long as he kept his mouth shut about... other things.

'China cares. I-'

North sat up, flipping his pillow to hide the saliva stains on it, and the tiny holes where his fangs had torn through. He reached for his bag, hating that it took more than one try to grab it.

It was hard now that he wasn't surrounded by his people, to remember that what he felt was nothing. He needed something, a worse pain, to drown this useless physical one.

His fingers brushed photo paper, but he recoiled.

Not that. He couldn't look at that again. What he felt, what he didn't feel... It was too much when he was like this. Light-headed, shaky, like he was half-unmoored from his own body but still far too much in it. He'd came down too fast from the euphoria of of the theatre, almost the moment Kim Yong-hwan had ambushed him. It had slammed him back into his dead meat and left him worse than before.

The heart-shaped stone, the wooden tiger, the bloody pottery shard, the faded blue cloth, that tteok-dream sketch, the photo of Yao Song and Li Meihua, a dried jindallae, petals crumbling and leeched of colour, that stupid note with that meaningless word on it, all placed on that clumsily-stitched kirogi-po. They all hurt, left him feeling restless and hot, the prickling coming back in force, driving away the itch, at least for a second. His people didn't deserve to feel what the burns on his body represented, but this pain he deserved to feel.

He paused on a small canvas, a new addition, staring at the painting of the Peninsula SH had gifted him before going to her room.

It was an old concept- Korea in the shape of a tiger, one paw down in Mokpo, one curled up on the Hwanghae Peninsula, and the top two pressed up against the border in Chagang and North Hamgyong, like it was holding their neighbouring countries to the north back. Its head was by Paektusan, the great mountain balanced perfectly on its nose. Whoever had first created the myth about the tiger and the bear, cementing both in Korea's mythos, would be smug to know that their modern borders could so easily be seen as the former, an enormous striped cat coiled in the East.

But though the idea was older, this one wasn't done in traditional style, or in the thin lines of that traitor Choe Nam-seon, but in their new style- bright colours, solid strokes, and stark shadows for contrast. Its glaring red eye, stark in the silver fur SH had chosen instead of orange, didn't stare north, but burned into his. And the gaping jaws were bared less aggressively at their comrades, the long white fangs instead protectively cradling a glowing red star.

It was impressive. But all North could see when he looked at it was that tiger sawed in half, butchered like the Japanese had butchered their real ones, intestines trailing in the sea. Jeju Island wasn't a part of the tiger's body, but in this it could have been a splash of blood, despite the pure white SH had painted her in, a bloody pawprint left by the southern half of the beast.

She had seen it in his eye, he was sure. It. was why she hadn't tried to hug him this year, however quickly. She knew he would just reject it.

Not this. Not any of this. It didn't hurt, it ached, the weight of all these let-down hopes. He needed to feel them, he deserved to, but tonight it didn't help him turn the agony in his body back into nothing. It just made him more conscious of each new flare inside him, and how every one destroyed something precious to him.

North shoved the new painting behind the one of the flower and boot, facing the wall so he wouldn't have to look at it, then plunged his hand back into the bag, finding the picture of him holding their flag before Paektusan.

It made him think of that drawing from CCCP's daughter that SH had kept. He wondered again if Belarus would have drawn him smiling if she had met him, or if she would have erased it like Mun Guk had.

He grit his teeth, setting it aside. Again as he reached back in, his fingers brushed a photograph, a different one this time. After a moment, he pulled it out.

The faces of the 63rd Army smiled back at him. His platoon, as the caption claimed.

North's eye traced each of the fifteen Chinese soldiers and their casualty recorder, lingering on Wang Wei, Zhang Guangqiang, He Sengqi, Meng Yuyu, and Hong Hongjun. Yao Song had made it back to his Li Meihua, but none of them had made it home to the families he'd been foolish enough to listen to stories about. They had taken this photo, smiled in the face of death, knowing that they wouldn't. That they would never smile at their brothers or fathers or wives again, and never see theirs. That they were going to die for him.

He exhaled, placing the photo aside. After a long moment, he pulled one last thing out of his bag- a stack of letters, bound together by twine.

He knew he couldn't wait any longer to read these, even if it was just to prove China wrong.

'If you still haven't read the letters from our comrades' families, and all of my countrymen, then don't say-'

He undid the string, holding one up. 'Yao Song and Li Meihua,' the envelope read.

Theirs would be the kindest, so he read it first. He refused to provide a balm for what he would be faced with in the others.

It was greetings, cheers for the war effort, and a congratulations on his Liberation Day and upcoming Foundation Day, at the time it had been written, along with the news that they had been married last year like they'd said they would be. And, to North's bittersweet feeling, the news that Li Meihua was pregnant.

It was all scrawled in an excited hand, slanting like the writer had been rushing to get the words out. But at the bottom was a postscript, written in a more halting way.

'Comrade Korea, I opened the envelope back up to write this while my beautiful wife is sleeping, the one thing I'll hide from her in our hopefully long, abundant years of marriage. If she opens this on her way to mail it, I hope she can forgive me. I don't really know why I did, I just'

The line cut abruptly, continuing below.

'Sometimes it feels unfair. That I made it out and they didn't. I had no family to miss me, and I hadn't even been brave enough to confess to my amazing wife yet. I wouldn't have been missed the way Comrade Zhang's father probably misses him, or Comrade He's grandmother must miss him.
I'm grateful, always grateful, that you and Comrade Mao saved me, and gave me the chance to be with the woman I love. That should be all I feel, shouldn't it? But sometimes when I've just set the table for my darling wife, when she comes in from the fields all sweaty and beautiful, and I get to hold her in my arms, it feels so unfair. Is it really okay to look forward to the birth of my daughter when Comrade Hong died without seeing his? Is it really okay to write poetry about the joys of the land reform when none of our comrades will ever get to experience it? Why did I survive and not them? Why do I get to be happy? Do I really deserve this?
I don't know why I'm writing this. You have more important things to worry about, I know. I just Does it ever get hard for you, too?'

More than even he would ever know.

'I'm afraid to tell my lovely wife. I know she should understand- she was the only one that made it away from the Kuomintang prison she was in. But she's always such a force, like nothing can ever faze her. And I don't know how to tell her that I'm not, and that as happy as I am to be her husband, as excited as I am to be a father, I somehow feel like I shouldn't ever be happy again. I can't find the words, and it's not something you can write a poem about, is it?

I'm sorry. I hope I'm not depressing you on your Liberation Day. I hope you don't feel the same way I do. But if you do, then I hope maybe this helps you to hear, the way it might help me- I understand.
Happy Liberation Day again, comrade. Keep avenging our 63rd Army.'

Yao Song's slightly shaky writing ended there, but there was another note under it, in a less refined, but steadier hand.

'I opened the letter. And I suppose I can find it in my heart to forgive him, at least for using our candle up writing last night. Less so for the rest of this crap he's written. Does he think it's been easy for me to be 'such a force,' or that I don't already know how he feels? What a blind man I married. Even so, I want you to know that Li Meihua will always be grateful to Korea for saving him, no matter what he feels about it. I would have missed him as much as any wife would miss her husband. How couldn't I when I waited for him for so many years, and it was the poems he wrote for me when we were little that were the only reason I held on long enough to make it out of that prison?
Don't worry about my foolish husband. I'll make him see sense. If I was able to be happy again, so will he. And I am very happy. Comrade Korea, if you ever do feel the same way as my idiot husband that I love, just know that the people you came home to don't. For every person that mourns someone that didn't make it back to them, there is one that will be forever grateful that someone else did.
Thank you for bringing my Song back to me.'

North lowered the letter, chest squeezing.

It might be comforting to say. But it wasn't true. Far more of the 63rd Army hadn't made it home than those that had.

He did understand how Yao Song felt. But there was no use in writing back. Even if he understood, their situations were different. North had to make it out, he had to survive, even if every single other soldier on the line gave their life, he wasn't allowed to- he was the Korean Countryhuman. Yao Song was only human. There was no solace in being able to say he had survived because of what he was when he had been no different than any of his comrades. The only thing that had spared his life was luck, something that didn't even exist.

Li Meihua would take care of her husband, offer him the understanding he was looking for. And no one could answer the question he really wanted an answer to. Even North had never been able to.

'Why me?'

He set the letter aside, turning to the others now, picking up the one with the feminine Mandarin written on it, and that familiar family name.

He couldn't put this off any longer. It was unfair to hide from their judgement when they couldn't hide from the pain he had caused them.

He slit the envelope with his silver-hilted dagger, and pulled out the letter, unfolding the creased paper.

'Comrade Korea, my name is Hong Mingzhu. You don't know me, but I received a letter sometime back, from my Countryhuman of all people, that says you knew my father. Hong Hongjun. It feels all sorts of weird to write that when I grew up thinking of him by his given name, which isn't even close to 'Hongjun.' But I like it. It feels like him.
Comrade China told me everything that was in the letter you sent him, how you were both in the Chorweon Blocking Battle, how you fought beside him. How he died.'

North had never mentioned that battle in any of his fake letters, besides in clinical terms of casualties and results, like he hadn't even been there. China must have sent out personal letters of condolences after, and used him as an excuse for why he knew what had happened so intimately.

'When I heard about the Letters to Korea campaign, I knew I had to write you something, but I didn't know what. I honestly still don't. I grew up my entire life thinking my father had given his life in the cause of Liberating our country. Mother never stopped hoping, and I hoped for so long, too, that I had a father out there, that the hole in my life was only temporary. Even when I grew up, and I tried to accept that I would never see him coming up the road, the triumphant hero returning, I could never really crush that sense of loss, or the hope that I would.

Comrade China said my father told you all about me, so I guess you know how mother found him, and sent him a letter. Did he tell you he sent one back? It was so strange, to suddenly know there was really someone out there that could fit into that hole. That all those years of hoping hadn't been for nothing. I had a father, one who loved me. And so scary to hear that he was heading off to fight for a foreign country just when we'd finally found him.'

North grit his teeth, bracing himself before reading on. He deserved to feel this. If he had succeeded on their Fifth Phase Offensive, Hong Hongjun wouldn't have died at Chorweon. If he had just won that first year, not one single Chinese soldier would have died in Korea.

'I thought 'Is this really my father? Would he really go off to risk his life for strangers before ever seeing his own daughter?' I think part of me wanted to be mad at him. Me and mother spent so long holding on to him, waiting for him to come home, and he was willing to make us wait longer for the sake of some foreigners.
But then I realized what I really felt- pride.'

North blinked down at the letter.

'Mother always told me father was a hero, that he'd gone off to fight for our country. But it was always so hard to believe her. I didn't know what sort of man he was, how hard he'd tried to find her after the Kuomintang attack, if he'd even tried at all. If he was really fighting for China, or if he'd joined one of the warlords or was running around like a brigand or died in his first engagement. Or if he had just moved to Beijing or Jiangxi or somewhere else to start a new life.
But he didn't. He fought for our country. He was on the Long March with Comrade China and Chairman Mao. He helped fight the Japanese and ran the Kuomintang off. He Liberated our country. And when he had the chance to come home to us, to finally experience the peace he fought for, he went to go Liberate someone else's.

Mother was right- he was a hero.'

The paper creaked under North's grip. He was nearing the end of this page, but there was an entire other side. The hammer was coming.

'I think that's why I'm writing. I wanted to say thank you. Thank you for letting me know my father is a hero. That he was always someone worth waiting for. And thank you for being at his side in the end.
And I have a request, if it's okay. Once you've freed your country and avenged my father against the Yankees, could I please visit? Comrade China said you couldn't recover his body, but I'd still like to see the place he died, and hear about him from the person he fought with. I think mother might ask for the same thing in her portion of the letter. It would really mean a lot to us. Now please imagine me saying this next part in a very impressive way.
Happy Liberation Day, Comrade Korea! Love live Sino-Korean friendship, and long live our heroes!

-Hong Mingzhu, daughter of Hong Hongjun'

North stared blankly at the letter, then skimmed through it again, then again, looking for the words he'd missed, the accusation that he had let her father die and hadn't even been able to send her a corpse back, the judgement for being so weak that he'd needed him there in the first place.

He didn't find it. He didn't find it on the other side, either, in between her mother's heartfelt plea to not give in to the men that had killed her husband and her thanks for speaking so highly to China of him, and fighting beside him. He didn't find it in any of the letters, not from He Sengqi's grandmother, getting her daughter to scribe for her, not from the mother herself, not from Feng Jiahao's brother or Zhao Qiaolan's wife or Xiao Xiaodong's parents or that Shancheng Village address, Zhang Guangqiang's pa, telling him he was glad his son had went out doing what was right, and inviting North over for salted fish and soju so he could tell him how it had happened. He didn't find it anywhere.

His hands trembled from the bombs and the bombs alone as he opened the last envelope. It was from a Wang. He knew who it had to be- Wang Wei's father, who had taken the death of his mother so hard. He had to have harsh words for him.

The penmanship was practiced, plain, someone that had just learned how to do it.

'Comrade Korea, I'll keep this short. Comrade China told me what you said happened at Chorweon. Thanks for not taking my boy for granted. I'll never be able to celebrate it. But I am for damn sure proud.'

North stared numbly at the letter quivering in his hands, and all the ones in his lap, and lying scattered around him like plucked feathers.

They were lying, they had to be. Or at least just hiding their resentment. Even if the Chinese soldiers had made the choice to fight for him, wanted to defend his country and people for whatever reasons they had, those they'd left at home had to resent that they had died for someone else, for someone as weak and useless as him that hadn't even been able to save his own platoon.

He read through the letters again, trying to find some Chinese character he'd misread, a place where the pencil or brush had pressed too hard, a sign that the writer had been fighting to keep the anger they felt from flowing onto the paper.

He didn't.

North bared his fangs at the letters, wanting to tear them apart to get rid of the tightness in his chest, the way the walls of the room felt like they were closing in on him. He held Wang Wei's father's letter in his burnt hands, shaking.

Their families were dead, their blood soaking his soil, soaking him. They weren't soldiers, they didn't understand sacrifice and giving their lives for the greater good. How couldn't they blame him?

The door behind him creaked open, and panic shot through him. By reflex he tossed the letters away from him, papers spiralling around the room like snow.

"Getting some reading done?" China asked before he could grab his gun.

North stiffened, staying seated on the floor, not turning to face him right away.

There was a rustle as the other country picked up one of the letters, and a brief silence as he read it.

"Having trouble finding what you're looking for?" he asked when he was done.

"Did you tell them to write what they did?" North demanded, twisting to look at him.

"No. And I know you won't believe me, but I didn't even ask most of them to write at all. They were already planning to once they heard about my call for your Liberation Day letters."

When he didn't respond, China asked in a light tone, "What were you thinking? That these would be full of slander and criticism?"

The Korean hunched, irritated and embarrassed that he'd guessed it so easily.

"Aiya, even after fighting with us, you really think my people would blame someone being attacked for their grief, and not the one attacking us both?" The other country sighed dramatically. "I'd say I was offended, if I didn't think you used that brush to paint people even closer to home."

A stack of letters was held over his shoulder, China smiling down at him. After a second, North took them.

His throat worked before he inanely managed, "...Li Meihua is pregnant."

"Ah, that's good news," China said happily. "I'll need to send them a gift basket with some provisions in it. Health food and the like, since from our comrade's descriptors, I'm certain she'll be the type to ignore her first-month sitting period."

"Comrade Yao Song says she thinks it's going to be a girl."

"It looks like Comrade Hong's apology will be needed after all." He bent, plucking the letter from the man's daughter off the floor. "Though if you ask me, Hongjun is a perfectly acceptable name for either sex. The Red Army and its successor are for everyone, after all."

"You told their families that I wrote to you about Chorweon."

"En," China admitted. "I thought they deserved to know what happened, and I couldn't exactly explain why I knew in such detail otherwise. There were also some things I thought you might have difficulty saying."

North knew he should be mad that China had been putting words in his mouth. It was something he usually despised. But he also knew that from the way Wang Wei's father had ended his letter, his comrade had relayed his son's words about wanting to die in a way he could be proud of.

He couldn't have said that to him. It would feel too much like he was trying to justify it. 'Your son didn't come home because he wanted to die for me.'

"But I didn't tell them everything." China handed the last letter back. "It's good our Comrade Hong's daughter will be paying you a visit once this war is won."

North knew what that meant. He had told Hong Mingzhu about how her father had lived and died, maybe told her how he had said if he was martyred without ever meeting her, then at least he had died making sure another father could one day meet his child. But he was leaving it to him to tell her about his last words.

'Tell her I would've made it home if I could've.'

"I'm not trying to torture you, comrade," China said softly as he looked down. "I just want my people to know that neither of us see their loved ones as tools."

"I know," North forced out. "I will invite Hong Mingzhu to... tell her about her father."

But the place he had died was below the front.

"Thank you."

North looked down, tapping the letters on his thigh. He wanted to get their edges all strictly aligned, but they resisted. The papers were too swollen by touch, refusing to stay flat with each other.

He kept trying. "If you didn't tell them to write me, then why would they?"

"You know why."

He did. Like he had known why China took him to Chorweon what felt like years ago.

"I wasn't the one to tell them about how their comrades died," he said, not looking up. "I didn't ask you to do that. They are thanking me for nothing."

He hadn't let Hong Mingzhu know her father was a hero- her own Countryhuman had.

"Isn't that what all those details in your report to my Comrade Peng were?" China asked. "And if I hadn't been here, could you truthfully tell me that you wouldn't have still ended up at Chorweon or somewhere else, and written to me about my comrades' sacrifices after?"

North looked away.

"Exactly. And even if they knew it wasn't you that wrote, you still did something much more important."

China squatted next to him, reaching into his collection of aches to pull out the photograph of the platoon, smiling back at their dead comrades.

"You stayed. You fought for us. You showed my soldiers that someone cared. That's what their families are really thanking you for."

North turned his head away from him.

"Is it really so hard for you to accept that we care as much about Korea as Korea cares about us?"

"I don't-" He bit down, trying to strangle his instinctive urge to deny it.

North's people had fought with the Chinese for decades, and he had fought at their side in his country for almost two years now, seen their lives get cut short by enemy bullets, and watched them work side by side with his soldiers to fix what America had destroyed. When the war was over, Korea's flowers would bloom bright because they had been watered with their blood, and he could never slander the 63rd Army's name, or the names of any of those from the People's Volunteer Army he had fought with, by pretending that he didn't care.

...Or that they didn't.

China's people shouldn't care enough about Korea to give their lives. Their families shouldn't care enough to forgive it. He didn't want them to.

China shouldn't care about his country enough to risk his own either, just like North shouldn't care about his. But the other Countryhuman was here. Still here, for another cursed Foundation Day. And...

North had already eaten his h- mind long ago. If America released Korea just to sink his bloody talons into China, the moment he could say their country was stable enough, the Korean People's Army would cross the Amnok to defend their comrades, to give their lives to Liberate their homeland, the way they had after Liberation, the way the Chinese had at Chorweon, and still were.

He did care. He cared about Hong Hongjun and Meng Yuyu and the rest of their fallen platoon, division, and Army, and he cared about Yao Song and Li Meihua, and all of those that would never be able to go home, and their loved ones that would mourn them, and all the Chinese that had written their letters, even if he wished they hadn't, and wouldn't read the rest.

He cared about his comrades. And he knew China did too, about North's people, about... Korea. Even if he despised that they did.

He shouldn't have told China it wasn't enough. If the other country had said that to him after Liberation, when his own Volunteers were risking their lives for him and his people, dying without ever being able to see their homeland Liberated after fighting for it for so long, he would have torn him open.

But he didn't know how to apologize for it. It wasn't enough and neither was he and both of their people were still dying because of it. It weighed his tongue down, made it even harder to force out the words that didn't come easily to him even when he didn't feel like this.

He didn't finish his sentence, and China didn't ask him to. He just stood up.

"Come with me," he said. "I have a surprise."

North swallowed his discomfort, trying to sound wary as he asked, "What is it?"

His words still came out too raspy.

"You might not understand the concept of a birthday gift, but I know you know what a surprise is. I remember you told me you hate them."

"I also remember telling you I wanted no more of them."

China smiled. "This is a good surprise."

"Is it the one you mentioned last year?"

His comrade arched a brow. "You're still thinking about that? You really are paranoid."

"I am not," North muttered. "I just don't like there being something in my country I don't know about."

"You will," China said mischievously. "When the time comes. But that time isn't today, I'm afraid. This is a different one."

North should have put up more of a fight. But he knew he couldn't sleep, not with the throbbing inside him. And the General would have someone watching to make sure he couldn't sneak back into Jonsung Complex to work.

And he wanted out, away from the letters and photos and stifling smell of charred meat. He hadn't found the pain he'd been looking for in the foreign words, only a deepening ache. He needed a distraction, even if it was just one of China's schemes.

"Fine," he said.

China smiled, giving one last long look at the photo in his hand before turning it over. North took it, tucking it carefully back into his bag with all those other hopes.

But as he went to follow the other country to the door, he halted.

He didn't want to do this, but... Ssi-bal. The itching was still there.

"Wait."

China turned, and so did North, starting to unbutton his shirt.

"This is the kind of surprise you can keep your clothes on for," his comrade said mildly.

North ignored him, removing his undershirt, taking it all the way off for once instead of maneuvering it over his head, so he could unwind the bandages around his torso until his back was exposed. He held them over the gash in his side, not looking at China.

"On the small of my back," he said. "The burns there. Are they infected?"

China padded closer, making him tense.

"Don't touch me," he said sharply.

"I wasn't going to."

The other country stopped a few inches away from him, examining the burns that covered every inch of his back. North kept his eye on him, head twisted over his shoulder.

He was silent for a little while. The Korean knew it was because his skin made it hard to see. There wasn't a burn on his body that hadn't been torn open tonight.

But China didn't say anything about it, or tell him he should go to the hospital. It gave North the resolve not to immediately put his shirt back on, though his muscles quivered with the urge to.

"You know," the other man remarked as he made his examination. "I'm surprised you would ask me to check you, when you won't even let your little doctor do it. Or your nurses, if the mean one is to be believed."

North couldn't say it was because Kangwon wasn't here. Now that Choe Kang-ok had woken up, Kim Yong-hwan had practically booted him out of the hospital, and told him if she found out he slept at the Quarantine or civilian one, she was going to report him to the Ministry of Public Health for jeopardizing patients by overworking. He was sleeping down the hall, hopefully deeply.

"That's a little out of character for you, isn't it?" China asked when he didn't respond. "I think it might put your province out to know you trust a foreign country over him."

"I don't," North denied irritably.

"Oh? Then why am I the one here right now?"

China lifted his eyes, and even though it made him bristle to have him behind him with no supervision, North averted his, keeping it on the small bloodstain on the undershirt pressed to his stomach.

It wasn't about Kim Yong-hwan or Kangwon, as he kept trying to get through to his province.

Well... it was. But not because he didn't trust them.

Kim Yong-hwan didn't talk about her past often. North only knew about it because An Il-rae had told SH and Sang while they did laundry, and he had been watching from across the stream to make sure they stayed safe.

She had lost her parents at a young age. They'd been evicted from their farm over rent, and her father had killed himself out of shame, leaving her and her mother to wander the countryside, until the woman had decided rebuilding her life would be easier without a child, and abandoned her in the North Pyongan mountains. She had practically raised herself, until a wealthy Japanese doctor took her in. Not out of kindness, but for free labour. She hadn't learned her medical skills from him, but from teaching herself to read the texts she was made to organize and dust, and practicing with the supplies he discarded. And when she had been arrested for being part of a leftist organization, he hadn't had any problem leaving her with no place to come back to after being released. Nowhere but the Korean People's Revolutionary Army.

Kim Yong-hwan wasn't 'mean.' She was stern and could be harsh, because she had never been able to rely on anyone but herself. Even once she had taken up arms with them, it was her their guerrillas had relied on to put them back together after engagements, and it was her their soldiers depended on now. Even if life had been kinder to the rest of their doctors and nurses, which it hadn't always, that was true for all of them. If their railways and railway workers were the veins of their country, their hospitals and the healthcare workers in them were the cells, responsible for repairing the rest of their organs, their factory workers, soldiers, mothers, children, politicians. There wasn't a single person in their country that would never have to rely on them, whether it was for themselves or a comrade.

But who could they rely on? With so many lives resting on their shoulders, whose shoulders were they supposed to rest on?

North's provinces were the same way. For nine years to a decade or more, he hadn't been there for them. They had been alone, enslaved by the Japanese or kept as pets or servants by their own bourgeois, or roaming the wilderness, with no one to depend on because he had let South-

Korea's provinces hadn't had anyone to rely on but themselves. And Kangwon had had the worst of it, when it came to that. He hadn't just had himself and a sibling to take care of, but an entire village, alone. North could still see the reluctance on his face as he chewed his nails across the fire from him, not scared to fight, but scared to leave the people who were his responsibility. All of their lives had rested on him. He had carried that burden alone for nine years. And like all of their healthcare workers, far more lives rested on him now.

He and all of his provinces, all of their doctors and nurses, all of their people needed someone to rely on, someone whose responsibility they were, someone whose shoulder they could rest on when they were crumbling under the weight of all the lives on theirs.

They needed Korea. They needed to know that if there was ever something they couldn't take, he could. He could take all of it. And they wouldn't feel that way if they had to take care of him.

It had been one thing to let someone sew his wounds shut after a battle during the Occupation, or dab antiseptic on one of the small patches left by the occasional Japanese firebombing of their camps. It was another when he looked like this, when he was charred black and red from chin to footpad, and every single inch of the damage would make the person whose job it was to clean it think of what the Yankees were doing to them, what they had done, what they could do.

Kim Yong-hwan was tough enough to carry her responsibilities without breaking. But she couldn't help but bend. North knew she was exhausted, that she worked herself to the bone every day to take care of their soldiers. He'd seen it in her eyes, and in how she hadn't snapped back at him after they had left Choe Kang-ok's room. She had to deal with the weight of their patients- she shouldn't have to deal with the weight of her country, too. None of their nurses should. If they saw the burns on his shoulders, they wouldn't trust that they could lean on them. If they saw that disgusting gash, they would question how he was still standing.

If they thought he was weak, however misguided, they wouldn't believe that he could take it. And if they thought he couldn't take it, they wouldn't believe that he could win, that he could save them.

They would be afraid.

And Kangwon had seen him at his worst. He had seen him half-dead, calling out for him, a memory that still burned shamefully, as bleary as it was. He had seen every part of him, wiped the blood and grime off his mangled body, cleaned his wounds every day, spoon-fed him while he slept, massaging his throat to make him swallow, cooked for him and supported him while he used the latrine in those first days after he woke up. North's life had been entirely in his hands, back before those hands could even stitch up a boy's cut without trembling. Just one more patient, one whose loss would have crushed his province.

North knew that was what he thought of every time he gave him a check-up. When he saw the imprint of his ribs, he saw them jutting out like blades about to pierce filthy white skin. When he saw his burns, he thought about stitching him up with trembling fingers and fearing he would lose him. And when he saw that old scar, he saw his Countryhuman sliding to the ground on legs that couldn't stand anymore, and rasping out in a pathetic voice, 'I need you.'

Like all his provinces, all his people, Kangwon deserved to feel safe, protected, unafraid. He deserved to be certain that if he ever staggered under the burden of the germ warfare, the shelling, and all the lives in his hands, that he wouldn't fall, because North would catch him. He needed to feel like if there was ever anything he couldn't take, his Countryhuman could. And he couldn't, if every time he looked at North, he saw that small, bleeding, broken boy, who hadn't even been able to protect himself.

It was about Kangwon, the reason North wouldn't let him tend to his wounds anymore. But not because he had lied about Hae's condition or taken Gangwon to Norway, and never because he couldn't trust his skills. It was because he couldn't trust himself. He couldn't trust that he was strong enough for his province to only see him as he was now.

How could he, when he had failed both their brothers?

It wasn't like he wanted to let China look at his burns. He always tried to change as quickly as possible, leaving his undershirt and boxer shorts on, and his skin was prickling now, telling him someone was within striking distance and he had to defend himself. But he was different. He was... still North's responsibility. He was in his country, and cared for... his people. So North was responsible for him.

But as a foreign country, he didn't need to be strong in the same way around him. He needed to be formidable, in case he ever became his enemy, but the Chinese country should be able to see by now that North and his people would be able to stand against whatever force he brought against them. He may have seen him more... vulnerable than he would like, but he had also seen him withstand everything America was doing to his land and people. If anything, letting China see his burns, see that the gruesome wounds didn't stop him from leading his country, should be a determent to him.

And he needed to be unflinching. He knew if he allowed his spine to bend, if he broke under the weight of this war, he would lose China's support. No matter how much he might care for his people, no one wanted to sink resources into an ally who couldn't stand on his own two feet, or believe in his own victory.

So he did still have to be strong around the other Countryhuman. But he didn't have to be strong for him. If he was afraid, if he had doubts about his army and leadership, that was his problem. So long as he had none about North being capable of taking this.

He didn't answer China, keeping his head turned to the side, just enough to make sure he could see that his hands were empty, and keep the urge to get away from him down.

The other country smiled to himself, then leaned forward slightly, making North tense. But he only sniffed delicately at his skin, then straightened, stepping away and letting him breath again.

"It's hard to tell with all the scabs and unpleasant fluids," he began. "But I would say you have a minor infection. Not that I'm the doctor in this bunker."

'Ssi-bal.' He knew it.

"I could have some burn cream shipped in," China suggested. "Since I know you won't want to take from your own stores."

Like he wanted to take from the Chinese's any more.

"I'm fine," North clipped, fastening the bandages back around his torso, making sure the gash stayed hidden.

"Going the antibacterial pill route?" China hummed knowingly.

He should get his General to look at it. But...

He would just make sure to keep his supply of boiled water in the Jonsung office fresh, and clean it more often.

"I do have a little bit of antiseptic up my sleeves," the Chinese man said. "I could clean your back for you."

It sounded more genuine than his offers to wash his back when he went off to bathe. A shiver still ran down North's spine, raising his hackles.

"Freak," he deadpanned.

"Some people are nicer on their birthdays. Not you, evidently."

"Maybe because it isn't my birthday."

The Korean buttoned up his shirt to his chin, quietly exhaling as he adjusted to the extra pressure against his throat again, the white collar pressing against the pad of bandages. He'd kept the extra layers on, even if it felt like he was suffocating. He was bleeding too much not to.

"Your audience really tore you open, didn't they?" China remarked, making him stiffen.

North knew he had seen the thick mess of flesh and blood clinging to his bandages. He had hoped he would continue not mentioning it.

"I'm fine," he said again. "They didn't do it on purpose."

No one had been rougher with him than a few desperate embraces or firm pats on the back. It was just that even a simple caress would tear his skin open, when there were so many hands doing it.

"Do you ever think maybe when your skin has the consistency of overdone pork belly, perhaps you shouldn't let yourself be manhandled by hundreds of people?"

"Keep your mouth out of our celebrations," North muttered, putting his boots on. He didn't bother with his uniform jacket.

"I wasn't trying to stick it out," China assured him (unconvincingly). "I just have to wonder why you'd let them do this on every holiday when it leaves you looking like this. Especially when I was under the impression you didn't enjoy being touched."

North hunched at the lilt in his voice.

He didn't know if China would understand that feeling that enveloped him earlier. Even if he would, he didn't want to talk about it. It felt... private. The sort of thing he could only share with...

"I don't," he told him, finishing tucking his pants into his boots. "But it raises morale. And I owe it to them."

"Oh?" China audibly arched a brow. "And here I thought you didn't believe in debts."

He didn't.

"It isn't a debt," he replied. "I don't owe my people for anything they've done for me. I owe them because I am their Countryhuman."

Just like they didn't owe him for anything he did for them. No matter what he gave them, where he lead them, it could never compare to that one simple fact- North would not exist without them. Korea could not exist without its people.

North still had to make up for those first nine years. He always would. But his people had nothing to make up for. Even if they had, they wouldn't have had to. He existed for them.

He turned, and was met by China standing too close to him again, his head tilted in that predatory manner he sometimes had, with that unnerving glint in his slender eyes.

"Aiya," he laughed as North took an instinctive step back. "Don't look at me like that. I'm just interested in your point of view."

"Be interested from farther away," North ordered, marching by him for the door. "Now do you have something to show me or not?"

"Who delayed us by suddenly stripping?" China padded after him, smiling at the harsh shushing noise the Korean made as they stepped into the hall.

North led the way outside, even though he had no idea where the surprise was going to be. But as soon as he stepped foot into the night air, he froze, the smell hitting him like a wall, thick, fragrant, making his mouth water and his stomach churn like this morning.

Ssi-bal.

"Was someone cooking?" he demanded of Chagang, standing on watch next to the door. He had to quickly turn his head, wiping the liquid that tried to escape the corner of his lips away.

His province nodded, but before North could say anything else, China grabbed his sleeve.

"Come along," he chirped. "My gift is time sensitive."

"Don't touch me." North swatted at his hand, shooting a look over his shoulder at Chagang.

'If I don't come back, kill China.'

His province solemnly saluted.

Satisfied that if he was going to be murdered tonight, he would at least be avenged, North followed the other country into the trees.

I got to meet some interesting people these last few days. I love people <3

North: I don't like being touched.

being pet like a cat by hundreds of people and clearly enjoying it

North: This is just part of my job, I don't actually like this.

A note- 'eating (his) mind' is a Korean way to say 'made his mind up.' 마음을 먹다. Except 마음 has a many-sided meaning, which is why North changes the one thought he has in the first half of the chapter. Not elaborating more. Ehe.

Also to show that the part about Americans dedicating their bombs is true:

This one isn't on the bomb itself , but there are pictures where it is (common practice in war; only look up Israeli bombs to Palestine if you want to feel bloodlust; also Makuya cultists must die). According to the website I got this from, it was also this man's birthday, which is why he's the one posing. Does it feel good to celebrate your birth with the death of thousands? Does it feel good to mark the day your country won freedom from a colonizer by subjugating another? Sickening. I genuinely cannot express how furious this picture makes me.

To Be Human

The air under the canopy was cool enough for North to feel. He could use the excuse that he'd left his jacket behind because he didn't need to be in full uniform out here, but really he just hadn't wanted the extra choking layer. The slight breeze rustling the leaves offered a bit of relief for the way he was sweltering under the bandages, even if it just reminded him that the trees would soon start to turn orange.

China was silent now, forging ahead with purpose, a swift shadow in the dark. North, slightly hobbled by fighting his body's urge to limp, found himself staring at his back, that stupid thought that had been lingering in his mind since Liberation Day creeping back in.

China always spoke politely with him, even when he definitely wasn't being polite. Mandarin didn't have speech levels the same way Korean did, but North always heard his words in hao-che, unless they were around someone who didn't know who he really was. Then they would come through in high courtesy, the proper level of respect a 'Chinese political officer' should have for the foreign Countryhuman he was shadowing. Even if it was spoiled by the sardonic lilt he almost always had. When he did speak Korean, it was usually around others, so he also used hasipsio-che. The only time he really spoke it when they were alone had been early on, when he'd been teasing North for forgetting he could speak it, and so knew its nuances. He had used hao-che then, as he should (even if North would have preferred he matched his high courtesy, which he had been trying to use). And when he was singing didn't count. He shouldn't know North was-

Anyway, that was to say... He didn't use hae-che with North. Even though North was using hae-che with him, when they weren't around anyone but his provinces.

He didn't like that.

It wasn't like he wanted China to use it. He just... didn't like that he wasn't when he was. It made it feel like North was being overly familiar when the other country was the one that had a boundaries problem. And it made it feel like they were on unequal footing.

He couldn't dismiss it as a language barrier problem. He'd heard Chinese soldiers talking with each other in Mandarin, and sometimes their words came through as hae-che. He Sengqi had spoken with their platoonmates almost exclusively in it. And since he knew the Chinese country could hear things in Korean, he didn't think he was getting lost in translation.

Did China not want him to use in- that low of a speech level with him? He hadn't said anything about it, but he also hadn't said anything about the brusque haera-che North had used for so long. Nothing about wanting him to stop anyway.

The idea irritated him, and he glared at China's back as they navigated through the undergrowth.

He could be as annoyingly touchy and invasive as he wanted, pushing North past his limit more than once while refusing to leave, going through his stuff whenever he wanted, and using his name the way he did, but he drew his line at hae-che?

It made North prickle with embarrassment to know that his provinces could hear that their speech levels didn't match. Like he was the one following China around, clinging to his uniform, and not the other way around. He was just using it for convenience, but he couldn't make that clear to them because he knew South Pyongan would have some smartass comment. 'Suuuure you are.' And then he'd have to acknowledge he had started using hae-che with them, too, which he was never going to do.

He should just switch back to middle courtesy for him, like he used for the Chinese provinces. If China hadn't said anything about him using it in the first place, surely he wouldn't say anything about him-

North hissed as the arch of his foot came down on a root, a bolt of pain shooting up his leg as the burns along it split. He shot another glare at China, only to find him looking back at him.

"Aiya, am I the one that tripped you?" he asked. "You are death-glaring me right now, yes?"

"I didn't trip," North snapped, not denying the glaring.

"Mmm*hmmm."*

North waited until he wasn't looking to set his foot down again, making sure the throb of pain in the blistered sole didn't make him stumble. Gritting his teeth, he walked stiffly on, boring a hole into China's back.

What did he care if the other country didn't like him using hae-che? They were his words and it was his language- he was allowed to use whichever speech level he wanted. If it made China uncomfortable, then good, it wasn't like he didn't do that to North on an almost daily basis. He wasn't surrendering. China could speak to him exclusively in high courtesy, and he would be getting hae-che right back.

It was stupid to be thinking about it anyway. It wasn't like he- He didn't-

Heat rushed down his arm as something somewhere exploded.

They were just words. He had more important things to think about. He shouldn't be obsessing over speech levels when he could hear bombs falling over the mountains.

They grew farther and farther from the bunker, China telling him it was 'just a few more minutes' every time he demanded to know if they were going to be walking until dawn.

"Not much farther now," his comrade said as they neared the eastern point of Jangsan.

"Are we walking all the way to the Amnok?" North griped, carefully stepping over a gnarled root. "Is the surprise you finally leaving my country?"

When China didn't give a comeback, he looked up, finding the woods ahead of him empty.

"China?" North demanded, alarm shooting through him. "China?"

Ssi-bal, was it an ambush?

North drew his TT-33, jogging towards the bushes the man had been heading for, heart pounding unsteadily.

He couldn't let anything happen to him, he was his-

As he burst from the bushes, a sudden light flared, a warm orange glow illuminating the woods. North flinched back, about to dive for cover, before he realized China was standing under the trees, arms stretched wide.

"Qiangqiang," he sang, shaking a match out. "Your surprise."

North blinked, taking in what was before him.

A small table was set up between the trunks, the undergrowth cleared away from it. The lantern casting the light was set on top, fire flickering behind the glass cage. Two floor cushions had been set on opposite sides. And on top of it was a large, upside-down bowl.

"What is this?" he asked warily.

"Your surprise, like I said," China responded. "You also have two seconds to put your pistol down before I add it to the tally."

North quickly shoved it back in its holster, eyeing the bowl with suspicion.

"What is under there?" he asked, even thought he thought he already knew. His words were getting wet again.

China smiled, leaning down and lifting the bowl up.

Immediately the same smell that had been outside the bunker flooded the woods with full force, making North's saliva glands twinge with the sudden gush that came from them.

Another bowl was revealed, rightside-up and full of noodles, thin and glistening, topped with chips of garlic, stir-fried mushrooms, and what looked like slices of bitter melon. A lumpy brown sauce glistened over it, bright green scallions scattered across like jewels. Wisps of steam reached up to dance before the fireglow.

"Ah, that's good," China said happily. "It's still hot. I was worried your stripping might've given it time to cool."

North was too tense to snap at him. "What is that for?"

"You," his comrade said, taking off his uniform jacket and settling onto the nearest cushion. "It's your birthday dinner."

"No."

"A materialist should know that denying something's state of being doesn't make it not be that," China chided.

"No." North took a step back, throat tight, trying to look anywhere but the bowl of noodles sitting on the table like a grenade.

His comrade sighed, a sound that raised his hackles. "Comrade, there isn't any harm in having a full meal tonight. Your provinces ate the other half of your rations for dinner, so it isn't like you'll be taking more than your fair share."

"I don't want it," North said tightly.

"I had all the ingredients shipped from my country," China told him. "So you won't be depriving your people of anything."

"I don't want to deprive your people of anything, either," the Korean snapped without thinking, hating how his words came out slurred. He should have brought his rock.

"Well, the noodle is already here and made. So unless you want it to go to waste..."

"Give them to someone else," North ordered. "My provinces or yours, or the bodyguards."

"Ah ah," China wagged his finger, looking smug. "This is my gift to give, and it will go to who I want it to."

North drew himself up, glaring down at him. "You are under my command, and that was an order."

"Korea has the authority to command China to give away his resources?" The other country shook his head. "Red Imperialism strikes again."

North bared his teeth at him. "I don't want it," he repeated. "You eat it."

"Unfortunately, the only options are you eat this, or it goes to waste." China unfolded his legs, climbing back to his feet. He leaned down, plucking the bowl up. "So if you really don't want it, I suppose I'll just have to dump it out."

North narrowed his eye. "You won't."

China's lips stretched. "I think you'll find there's very few things I won't do."

His hands tilted, the bowl sliding out of them.

North was already moving, his body refusing to try and call his bluff. He caught it before it could tip sideways, thrusting it back up into China's hands, so they were both holding the warm metal with their palms.

"Are you crazy?!" he hissed.

He tried to shove the bowl more firmly into the other man's grasp, but China kept his wrists limp, letting it tilt right back out, forcing North to snatch it from him, cradling it protectively as he shot a dagger at him with his eye.

"Oh good, you've accepted it." China smiled, sitting back down. "Time to eat then. By the way, I'm not above taking it back if you try to run."

North grit his teeth, *'thunk'*ing the bowl back down on the table with force. "You really want me to eat so badly that you would waste food?"

"Don't you waste food yourself?"

"Never," North said vehemently. Not since that final year in the prison shack.

"Mm, I don't know." The other country idly drummed his nails on the table. "I think some of your people might consider it a waste every time you skip a meal. The farmers that grow the rice with the expectation that their Countryhuman will have some of it, the rations distributors that hand it to you."

"It isn't a waste," North growled. "It goes to people who need it more."

China raised a brow, openly looking him up and down. "I'm sure there are some who need it more. But it isn't as if you don't need it."

North fought the urge to cross his arms over his chest. He shouldn't have taken his shirt off earlier.

"Just one bowl of noodle, comrade." China waved the long, white sleeve of his undershirt at them. "It won't kill you. It will actually do the opposite."

It wouldn't kill him. But one meal could be the difference between life and death for countless people in his country right now.

But reluctantly, North sat, folding his legs stiffly under him across from China. His comrade was insane, and if he wasted an entire bowl of noodles, he would have to kill him.

He was grateful for the seat being a cushion and not a stool. It made slightly less pain pulse in his haunches.

He stared next to the bowl of noodles, at the chopsticks on the table, a long, silver pair elevated by a plain rest. That 'package' China had received this morning evidently included tableware, too.

The smell was even more unbearable now. Saliva pooled in his mouth.

China's gaze weighed on him, pinning his hand to his lap, making it even more difficult to think about lifting the chopsticks. His eye lifted slightly, and he found his comrade watching him like a hawk, leaning over the table.

Maybe he realized it was making North uncomfortable, but more likely he didn't, because instead of staring harder, he leaned back, reaching out to spin the oil lamp with a finger. The orange light rippled across the greenery around them, making the deep shadows dance around the pockets of impenetrable darkness between the trunks.

"So," China started conversationally. "Where did you and your little doctor run off to earlier?"

"Stop calling him that," North said, glad for the opportunity to stall. "And I'm sure you already asked him."

His comrade smiled. "I'm glad someone dear to you managed to pull through."

So was he. He kept finding his mind wanting to skirt away from Choe Kang-ok even now, still seeing her the way he had when he'd burst into the medical tent to find Kangwon preparing to carve his own skin off.

But she was okay. Mangled, burnt, and in severe pain, but alive. Thanks to Kangwon.

He knew he wouldn't have told China about what they had done to save her, since he had told him not to. And he wasn't sure if the other country had been snooping around in the hospital to find out.

No one else could know about their experimental procedure. Choe Kang-ok would tell anyone who asked that the napalm had charred her skin that rich russet, and have permission to change away from her fellow soldiers once she returned to action, hiding the more unnatural colours on her body. One day she might have to tell a husband, but North was certain SH would make sure she ended up with someone who could be trusted with that knowledge. Until then, it was best that no one else knew. They had never been able to hide the blood transfusions, even if they had told barely anyone directly what they did. But they could try and hide this, for the sake of Provincehumans or Countryhumans who weren't as free as them. It wasn't information just anyone should know.

But China wasn't just anyone.

In a neutral voice, he informed his comrade, "Our skin can be used for grafts."

He couldn't tell if the news actually surprised him. He just arched a brow.

"More efficiently than human?"

"We think so." North wasn't sure if it had been the skin or the copious amount of blood they had pumped into Choe Kang-ok that got her through the shock of the napalm trauma, but Kangwon seemed to think that their cell regeneration had helped, at least slightly.

"Interesting. I'll keep that in mind."

He hoped he wouldn't keep the bandage on the back of his head with it.

"And thank you for telling me." Lamplight played over China's face as he smiled at him.

North looked down at the table. "China is an ally. What benefits your country benefits mine."

He clenched his teeth after the words left. Why did he always have to do that?

Before the silence could stretch too long, the other country effortlessly carried on the dropped conversation, talking about his people's land reform efforts back home, taking much longer to accomplish than the north of Korea's with all his land mass.

As he went on, North tried to avoid looking at the bowl sitting before him. But after his eye had flicked down enough times, he noticed something.

His brow furrowed as he finally made himself examine it directly, ignoring the toppings to look at the pale wheat noodles, and after a second, he pulled them closer, lifting his chopsticks.

He dug the blunt tips (annoying Chinese-style) into the bowl, not mixing it, but picking up a single strand of noodle. lifting it up. And up. And up.

When his hand was over his head, the noodle was still connected to the bowl.

He looked over at China, who had stopped talking, and was watching him with a small smile and that too-innocent look on his face.

"Is this...?" North couldn't hide the bafflement in his voice. "Is this all one noodle?"

China's smile grew wider. "I told you- it's just one bowl of noodle."

North stared at the bowl in disbelief. The thick coil he'd thought were many noodles piled together was actually just one very long, very thin one.

"There's a tradition in my country that you need to eat long noodles on your birthday." China's tone sounded educational, but North could hear the amusement bubbling under it. "The longer they are, the more years of life you'll have. I also figured since you're so against 'wasting' food that you would appreciate if I made one extra-long noodle instead of several."

North looked between him and the noodle, still held between his chopsticks like a snake. "...If you didn't change the recipe, then isn't this just the same amount of ingredients as a bowl of noodl*es* would be?"

China paused, like he hadn't thought of that. "...Ah."

"What do you mean 'Ah?'"

"Anyway, I hear your cooperative farm plans are beginning to come to fruition."

North huffed, but accepted the change of topic, spooling the obscenely long noodle back into the bowl, his comrade following it down with his eyes. "Yes."

They had started to organize them in spring. They were starting small, about thirty families each, leaving it mostly up to the local peasants to organize with some Party direction. They had already been essentially cooperative farming for some time now, setting up ox-sharing teams and labour-aid amongst their villages to work the fields.

"Mine are coming along as well," China said. "Our draft resolution is being tested on a few hundred small cooperatives. In another year or so, we might make it an official one."

North had been keeping an eye on his progress ever since he'd told him about the draft resolution back in December. Even with everything else, they needed to develop new techniques, learning through their experiences and those of other countries to see if any of theirs could be adapted for Korea. And the food situation would be the major problem to resolve if the ceasefire finally got signed.

"We've also already seen increased production in Wonhwa-ri and a few other areas," he told China, somewhat competitively. "It looks promising."

The village was poor, doing worse off for food than many places, though the situation should improve with the tax cuts they'd made. But after the General's visit with peasants from the area back in May, their increased cooperation had already seen gains.

Thinking about the upcoming harvest still tightened North's chest to the point of finding it hard to breathe, but Hae had been right this morning- it did look like it might be possible for most locales to fulfill the agricultural plan. If nothing disastrous happened.

Thinking of the Supung Dam and all the others in the north, especially around their bread basket in Hwanghae, North grit his teeth, swirling the chopsticks through the bowl of noodle, mixing it with the thick sauce. It caused a squelching sound that made his stomach turn.

"We'll have to be careful," China mused. "It will be difficult to avoid the same problems our Soviet comrade is facing. We'll essentially be turning our revolutionary peasant class into large landowners."

Which would change their class interests, alongside giving them more bargaining power. North had listened especially attentively to CCCP whenever he spoke about his cooperative farms after Liberation, paying careful consideration to whether a similar model could work for Korea.

"The benefits are too advantageous to ignore." He kept swirling his chopsticks, not looking down, but feeling the resistance of the noodle as it wrapped around the silver. "Especially with how short my country is on materiel."

With the Americans targeting their draught animals, plows, and tractors, sharing resources had become more important than ever, just like it would be once the war was... done. And they were still behind technologically. As they discovered new ways to farm efficiently and increase yields, it would be easier to have a few good cores in each cooperative farm to educate en masse, instead of sending Party members out from their own farms to teach their neighbours individually, or at meetings.

He had discussed all those things with China last year as they spoke in their room. The other country nodded like he remembered.

"I suppose we'll just have to create more checks and balances, as they say," he hummed, still spinning the oil lamp, though the glass should be painful to the touch by now. "What will you do if it doesn't work?"

"Find a way to make it to," North said, and the other country laughed.

"Good answer."

"What will you do?" the Korean returned.

"Throw myself onto a sofa-bed and weep dramatically," China replied. "And then find a way to make it to."

North snorted, then ducked his head, glaring recalcitrantly at the noodle.

"My Chairman says we need to have faith that the lower and middle peasants want to walk the Socialist road," the other country said. "And that the Party is capable of leading them there."

North looked up at his tone, narrowing his eye. "And do you not believe that?"

"I do," China said with no deliberation. "As Communists, I think it's necessary to believe our people are capable of anything. I just think in order to be successful, you also need to have absolutely no faith in that at all."

"That doesn't make any sense."

"Doesn't it?" China asked. "Look at our comrade to the north. He had unwavering faith that his kulaks would support the path of betterment. And instead they helped plunge his western regions into a famine. Too much faith is never a bad thing, but it can be if it's not tempered with skepticism."

North shook his head. "If we don't wholeheartedly believe in the path we're walking, then how are our people supposed to believe?"

"We do wholeheartedly believe in it," China said patiently. "But if you walk a road believing the destination is assured, then any side paths might seem like they'd serve just as well to get where you're going, and any setbacks will feel like someone just detonated a bomb on the highway. And it's never a good thing for the person at the front of the pack to be unable to see past a roadblock. "

"That wouldn't happen to me," North defended, not liking his implication.

"I didn't say it would. Just general advice." China ran his finger over the open rim of the oil lamp. "For certain other Socialists, perhaps."

"Why would your people believe in their path if their country doesn't?" North demanded. "You can't truly believe if you have any doubts for any reason. And if they sense those doubts from you, then they won't have faith in the Socialist road."

China smiled, rubbing the soot on his finger with his thumb. "Then it's a good thing I'm a good actor. You should eat your noodle before it gets cold, by the way."

North shook his head again. Sometimes he thought China got him into these semi-philosophical discussions just to mess with his mind. To try to.

You couldn't both believe in something wholeheartedly and not at all. That wasn't how it worked. And if the people that were counting on you to guide you down your road sensed any hesitation, they would be too hesitant to move forward.

The noodle loomed on the table, waiting, made with Chinese ingredients shipped from China, when they could have gone into the stomach of one of his own people, or North's, if he truly cared. At least they would have appreciated it.

Even now, he was no closer to understanding him.

"I've been meaning to ask," China began in the same conversational tone. "Are you going to encourage competition amongst your farms?"

"Yes," North said immediately.

America liked to spread the idea that there would be no competition under Socialism, and society would stagnate because of it. It was one of his blatant lies that capitalists around the world were happy to parrot. He'd dealt with enough of the petit-bourgeois during the Occupation that were concerned that without competition, there would be no innovation, as if there had truly been innovation when any advancements that would make life better for the average Korean were discarded in favour of continued exploitation and misery.

They didn't need competition to innovate, so long as they had a government that was actually invested in progressing society in a real way, instead of a dozen companies competing to see who could produce the most useless items and convince the masses they needed them, charge the most for basic amenities, and price their competitors out of business. If people knew that their creative efforts were going towards their country and themselves, and not just towards putting more won in someone else's pockets, they would be more motivated to create, and be given the chance.

But competition did help production. The drive to be recognized as a model worker, soldier, or peasant drove his people to come up with new inventions and methods of production, as they had done with vinalon, to grow more crops and fight harder. It was just important to balance individual competition with collective competition. He didn't want peasants willing to hoard good seeds or efficient techniques just to fill their quota more than their neighbours, or for factory workers to be willing to sabotage each other to get ahead, like they did under capitalism. If it wasn't every peasant against every peasant or worker against worker, but rather cooperative against cooperative, they would be fostering healthy competition within cooperation, all while everyone strove to produce as much as they could for the good of their country.

China nodded, satisfied. "Me too. I like to watch people compete to please me. Want to hear some of my ideas?"

Without letting North answer (or challenge that first statement), he launched into some of his plans for fostering healthy competition, one of which included the cooperative farm that overfilled their plan the most winning him as a prize. As usual, North didn't know what that meant, didn't know if he was joking, and didn't want to know.

He was used to listening to China ramble by now, and it was easy to focus on his words and tune everything else out, like the throbbing in his gash as he tried to avoid hunching from the pain, which would just make it worse, and the way his saliva glands and stomach were aching.

Actually... It was too easy.

The part of North's brain that stayed on constant alert for threats noted that aside from nearby chirps from nightbirds, and the gentle rustling of beech leaves in the breeze, there was no other sound but China talking. He couldn't hear the convoys passing on the highway or the more distant bird calls that had sounded in the woods as they walked. And even though he could still feel the echoes of bombs falling, he couldn't hear them.

He glanced over his shoulder at the mountainside rising behind his back. The ridge of Jangsan's spine was lower here, but the outcrop above projected a metre or so, almost causing the rock to have a curved shape, like a wave. Maybe it was trapping the sound.

It made North twitch slightly, not liking that he might not hear someone approaching, though knowing China, he probably still could. But it did make it easier to keep his focus on the other country's words when he couldn't hear that infernal drone.

He kept his eye on him, along with most of his attention, using a small part of it to slide his chopsticks into the noddle and lift a section.

China's eyes flickered down, his mouth opening, then closing. Before North could fully lift the tangle of noodle, he interrupted himself to say, "Don't eat from the middle section."

North shifted, irked that he'd acknowledged what he was doing. "So not only are you forcing me to eat, you're trying to tell me how to do it?"

"Just a suggestion," his comrade said. "It's a superstition that you're not supposed to cut the noodles. You need to eat them from the end."

"I thought you didn't believe in superstition."

"I don't."

The Korean glowered at him, but set the noodle down, finding the end again and winding it around his chopsticks.

"Happy?"

"Very." China settled, launching back into talking about his country, somehow transitioning seamlessly from encouraging competition to stock breeding.

North tried to keep his attention on him, and managed it long enough to get his chopsticks close to his mouth. But he found it shifting to the food, harder to ignore when its smell was wafting right into his 'nose.'

It was thick and heavy, and his jaw ached from how hard his mouth was watering, that stupid physiological response, even though he had no interest in what was in front of him. His stomach clenched, making his burns twinge.

It wasn't hard. It was just a noodle with a few vegetables and some kind of black bean sauce. He had eaten jjajangmyeon before. And China couldn't judge him for eating when his people weren't when he was the one insisting he ate in the first place. He could tell from the silver bowl and chopsticks still gleaming brightly that it wasn't poisoned, at least not with something like arsenic. And the other country wouldn't poison him now, not so brazenly.

Unless he had doubts about the path they were walking down in this war, too. Unless he thought North was too weak to win and he wanted to-

He sank his teeth into the side of his cheek before his hand could drop the chopsticks.

China... cared about his country and his people. Even if it wasn't enough, it was enough that he wouldn't sabotage the war effort. Even if he thought North was weak and useless and incapable of- He wouldn't cripple his country that way.

It was just a noodle. He had eaten earlier, so his stomach should be better prepared for it. He wouldn't gag in front of the other country, let alone throw up. It was just a noodle, and he couldn't free his country if he couldn't make himself eat one damn noodle.

It sat coiled around the silver chopsticks like a long, white worm.

His hand refused to move. It was childish, but as North sucked back his saliva, he had to close his eye and lean forward to be able to make himself take the bite.

His fangs closed awkwardly around the chopsticks. It had been so long since he'd had noodles that weren't fried as rations that his muscle memory didn't kick in for a moment. The silver felt solid under his teeth, something more substantial than rice or juk, and as it did when the rock scraped against them, North had to fight the urge in his jaw to bite down and grind the metal between them.

Then he remembered how to eat, and released the utensils from his fangs, closing his lips around them instead. He kept them angled up, his tongue reluctant to let the food touch it, even as his stomach felt like it was climbing up his throat for it. After a long second, he managed to slide the noodle off, biting down properly, prepared to fight his urge to vomit.

Instead his eye flew open.

The taste burst on his tongue, full of flavour. The noodle wasn't steaming anymore, but it was still warm, and had had time to absorb the sauce. He could taste the tangy garlic, bitter melon, and earthy mushrooms in it, even without having any of them in the bite, and... something else. It was rich and savoury, and even though his throat flexed, instinctively trying to reject it the way it had rejected the juk this morning, it actually tasted...

"Is it good?"

North startled, swallowing in his surprise as he realized China had moved without him noticing. And was now seated to his left, his face a few inches away from his.

He turned away, schooling his expression as he made sure the noodle wasn't going to come back up.

"Is there meat in this?" he bluntly asked once he was sure it wouldn't.

China clicked his tongue. "Aiya, I thought it was too blended into the sauce for you to notice."

Like North could not. He couldn't remember the last time he'd had meat. After small meals of salted jumeokbap and plain juk, it had hit his tastebuds like a bomb.

He looked down at the thick sauce, and the texture hidden amongst the black beans. The mouthful he'd taken sat heavier in his stomach.

"It's only ground rabbit, wild-caught," China told him. "Someone was paid enough to buy several chickens to catch it."

It didn't change that someone else could have caught it to eat.

"Do you like it?"

China was still leaning far too close to him, staring expectantly. Without blinking.

North had to keep his eye on the bowl, swirling the noodle around his chopsticks again. "Did you make it?"

China finally blinked at him, slightly owlishly. After a second he said, "No, I'm afraid I'm a terrible cook. I just sent for the ingredients and set the menu. My Little Sisters did all the real work. So if you have any complaints, please kindly criticize them."

North didn't know if that settled his stomach or not. "...It's fine," he muttered, taking another bite.

China leaned back, his teeth flashing. "Good," he said simply. "Happy birthday, Chaoxian."

'Mrr.' "Not my birthday."

His comrade smiled, reaching under the table, pulling out their dented brass kettle and tin cups. "This I did make."

Ginseng tea. North was familiar with the pale golden colour that came from the spout.

He accepted the cup China poured, squinting into the depths.

"It's not poisoned," the other country assured.

North wanted to deny that was what he'd been checking for, but couldn't. Ssi-bal, he could never just be appreciative, could he?

Not that China deserved appreciation. He hadn't asked him to do this for him. If he had, North would have told him not to. And then been even more annoyed when he did it anyway.

"Here." China took a sip from his cup, visibly swallowing. "Does that help?" he asked, wiping the rim with his sleeve.

"I don't want to drink out of something you did," North muttered.

"Well, since you watched me pour these, I suppose the taste-testing still proves it's good." China swapped their cups.

North picked his new one up, staring into it again. After a moment, he forced himself to drink, tossing his head back to make sure it would go down, hearing SH telling him it was tea, not soju in his head.

"Unless I predicted you would do that and poisoned that cup ahead of time," China said as soon as he'd swallowed, then smiled as North shot him a glare.

"If I die, I'm taking you down with me before I go."

"I would expect nothing less. I assume you'll use the teapot to bash my skull in?"

"I wouldn't waste tea," North said flatly. "I'll just use the last gift you forced on me to cut your throat."

China's eyes squinched, flicking to the tiger blade North had strapped to his hip before they left. "I think we both know you're not the sort of person that accepts people forcing things on you."

North looked away, taking another bite of noodles. Noodle. It was hair-thin, so delicate it must have taken a great deal of skill to make. Its fineness helped it go down, barely letting his tongue experience the texture, only the flavours it had absorbed.

He would have to thank the Liaos. Even if it was annoying, and he hadn't had anything to do with their Countryhuman forcing them to make this for him.

After a moment of hesitation, he picked up a slice of bitter melon, trying it. It lived up to its name, flooding his mouth with a strong, dry bitterness and providing his teeth with the texture they craved, giving them something to sink into. Combined with the taste of the meat sauce, it was...

Fine. It was fine. It was food, and would give him the boost of nutrients he... could use. It should be enough that he could give all of tomorrow's rations away.

He took another bite of bitter melon, and China said, "I'm glad you approve of my topping choice. I thought you would."

North ground the fruit between his teeth.

None of his provinces liked the taste of bitter melon, so it hadn't been seen in the chosonjip often. He only had it in the banchan Kim Jong-suk would make specially for him at meals, even when he told her not to do the extra labour, seasoned simply with sesame seeds and garlic. He hadn't had it since she died. Its extreme bitterness wasn't a taste most people enjoyed. Part of him wanted to say that China had gone to the trouble of selecting it for the noodle in the hope North would have to suffer through eating it more than he already was. But...

China was observant. He knew he'd noticed the way he had eaten the bitter namul they foraged on their mission to the Raktong without flinching. He'd remarked on it, even though North hadn't answered him. And he had caught him examining his tooth paste pot that time, surely realizing that all of the herbs in it were bitter, with nothing to cut the taste. And been asked if he intentionally added ginseng.

His comrade had chosen this bitter fruit that barely anyone liked because he knew North- could tolerate it.

When there was nothing left to chew on, he swallowed, turning another piece over with his chopsticks. Not looking at China, he asked, "Why did you have this made for me?"

"I would have asked for millet. But I thought you might like this better."

There was a knowing tinge to China's voice. After a moment, North realized what he was referring to.

Still not meeting his eyes, he said, "You know that isn't what I meant."

China's lips curved. "I got you a present last year, didn't I?" he asked innocently. "I couldn't be outcompeted by my past self like that."

"You already got me something this year."

The Chinese country knew what he was talking about. "So you did notice my refill."

The first night after they came back from Kaesong. North had opened the pot he kept his teeth-cleaning herbs in to find that what he had been running low on had been restocked, before he could start stockpiling for the winter.

"That wasn't a gift," China said flippantly. "We sleep two feet away from each other- it's in my best interest to keep your breath fresh."

It hadn't been the banga leaf or any of the other more easily found plants that had been added to. Only the ginseng.

"The dagger was useful," North said, resting his hand on the curved hilt. "This isn't."

"'I would call making sure my ally doesn't pass out from anemia or malnutrition useful, wouldn't you?'" China took a drink of tea, smiling at him over the rim. "Is that something like what you want me to say? Not this year. I had this made for you because I wanted you to have a good meal."

North opened his mouth then swiftly looked away, stabbing his chopsticks into the noodle with force, aggressively taking another bite of bitter melon.

He should really learn to stop asking China questions when he always hated the answers.

"By the way, I've been singing at your theatre lately," his comrade said conversationally, making North stiffen.

"So?" he challenged.

"I was wondering if you wanted to come by to listen. I could give you a post-birthday performance in exchange for the show you put on earlier."

North relaxed. Good. He hadn't noticed.

"I don't have any interest in listening to you sing," he said, finding the end of the noodle again.

China smiled. "Is that so? Well, I'll be there tomorrow night anyway, if you change your mind."

"I won't."

He would be on alert. North would have to be even more careful than usual.

China nattered on about useless things, thankfully no longer watching North so closely while he chipped away at his noodle bit by bit. As... acceptable as it was, he still had to eat slowly, taking breaks when he felt his stomach churn. The ginseng tea helped.

He was halfway done, and on another break when there was finally a lull in China's chatter, allowing him to hear the soft murmuring of leaves again. He watched as the Korean nudged the noodle with his chopsticks, pretending he was considering another bite and not forcing his body to keep the meal down. And that he didn't feel the weight of the gaze on him.

The lamplight flickered, fire licking at the glass walls around it with the quiet fluttering of moth wings.

"I'm interested," his comrade finally said, propping his chin on his hand.

North regarded him warily. "...In what?"

"What your exact reasoning is behind giving away so many of your rations."

Tensing, the Korean looked down at the noodle. "I don't give away that much."

"You do," China said. "At least half every time I've seen. And usually more. I have a suspicion you would have yourself on an office worker's amount instead of a soldier's, if that didn't mean you would have less to hand out."

"I don't hand anything out," North muttered. "It's mutual aid."

China ignored him. "Is it a desire to be seen as selfless and noble, I wonder?" He smiled as North's jaw feathered.

"There's nothing noble about it," he snapped.

He knew it was stupid for him to give away so many of his rations, especially when he was on the frontline. His provinces were right- the rations were calculated to be exactly the amount a soldier needed to keep going. By depriving himself of even a quarter, he was missing out on nutrients and energy that he needed.

But he could keep going even without those. His people couldn't. If he kept his government salary when he received it, he could buy supplies privately (once he was finished paying off that cow for Completely Reasonable Prices Kim). Some of his people couldn't work, either from injury or because their workplace had been destroyed. They had no money to buy food, and even with all their measures, it wasn't enough- the State couldn't summon meat or vegetables from nothing. It was why his people needed his rations and his salary.

It had always been this way. When South would scarf down his stale grain and leave his bowl empty, how could North finish his while his brother's stomach was still growling? He had managed to eat what Kangwon had given him, knowing he had to heal as fast as possible to go save his people, even when the gush of juices from the rabbit meat had hit his tongue for the first time in his life and all he could think about was how much South would have liked it.

But after, when they had North and South Pyongan, and they had to forage and catch more and more to eat with each province they recruited, how could he eat when Hae was trying not to stare longingly at his bowl, or Sang was swirling a rock around in her mouth? How could he eat at the Secret Camp when the villagers stretched themselves thin to make sure the guerrillas had enough, or when the General had pulled half their rice from their packs and buried it under an old campfire in the hopes that the missing unit on their tail would find it before they starved to death? How could he eat after the Division when even when they had solved the food problem in the north, his people in the south were still forced to give up their harvest while their stomachs sank in?

There had been a day, International Workers' Day, when the Premier had practically kicked him out of Party Headquarters, telling him to go enjoy the fruits of their labour instead of working for once, sending him with a full dosirak from Comrade Kim Jong-suk. North had made himself eat the entire thing, because he didn't want her efforts to be wasted, and because he knew she would have directed SH to make sure he did. But he still ended up feeling like her efforts were wasted, because as he had sat in the warm spring sunshine by the riverbank, listening to his people celebrate across the city and his provinces splash in the Taedong, all he could think about was his brother.

Was he safe? He wouldn't be allowed to celebrate a workers' holiday, but was he at least able to see the flowers blooming in Seoul? Could he see the new growth on the trees that grew on Bukhan Mountain? Was he eating? Or was he locked up in the darkness again, eating weevilled millet or nothing at all while North feasted, like it had been when he had been in the cave with Kangwon? The idea had made the food in his mouth taste like ashes, and nausea swirl in his stomach.

"If you don't think it's noble, then why do you do it?" China asked.

North observed the thin noodle trapped between his chopsticks, the oil on it glistening in the light of the lamp.

The worst thing about being starved wasn't the way you would start to shake after a few days, or the lethargy. Those could be fought off. The hunger was the worst of it. The empty howling in your stomach that stopped you from working or sleeping or even getting out of bed in the morning, stealing your thoughts and replacing them with a ravenous need.

And North couldn't feel hunger.

He could remember it from when they had first been formed. It had grasped at his insides with sharp claws, hollowing him out as he paced the floor of the shack, stomach aching, stopping him from thinking with its insistence that he pay attention to it, not his head or escaping or his brother, only momentarily relieved by the small bowls of rice three times a day.

But somewhere in those days after their rations had been cut for the first time, or maybe the tenth or eleventh, when they had received nothing at all, North had known he couldn't afford to give in to the feeling. If he fell prey to the urge to stay on the thin futon or curl up in a ball to clutch his stomach uselessly, then he and his brother would die. Someone needed to make sure they cleaned their teeth. Someone needed to make sure they exercised. Someone needed to make sure they drank, at least until the bucket had started to be taken, too. Someone needed to make sure his brother kept singing. Someone had to make sure they kept trying.

And South couldn't. He wasn't strong enough. North was. He still was.

His body would still complain. It would flood his mouth with saliva every time he even set his eye on food, it could make his stomach moan when he took the rock out of his mouth, and start to shut down if he deprived it for long enough. He still had to shove down the lethargy and quell the tremors. He had to right now to keep his hand steady on the chopsticks. But he no longer heard that howl.

Hunger had become familiar. There was nothing for it to grasp at now. He was always hungry, and so he never felt it. Like the aching hip that China had slipped back into place.

His comrade couldn't slip this back into place. No one could. Not even the General.

North didn't starve himself because he was selfless or noble. It was the opposite. It was selfish and self-indulgent. He had the privilege to choose to go hungry, the privilege of having food to give away.

No one appreciated it, and no one ever would. His provinces didn't, his General didn't, none of his comrades in any of their armies ever had. Even the mothers whose children would finally sleep without complaining of an empty belly wouldn't, if they knew that he was giving up his rations. Their gratitude would be tainted by the knowledge that their gain was his loss. Instead of aid, it would become a debt.

But if he could spare someone from that gripping emptiness that he could no longer even feel, then why shouldn't he? He took no pleasure in eating, anyways. Even the noodle, as admittedly delicious as it really was, quickly turned to paste in his mouth as he chewed. A bit of shaking was worth it to make sure one more person wouldn't ever get used to hunger.

"I need to," North said, his voice low as he dropped the noodle. "I can't eat knowing my people are going hungry."

"Someone will always be hungry, somewhere," China said. North could tell he wasn't trying to argue or sway him. It was just one of those comments he made, unjudgmental and observatory.

"And I would rather it was me than one of them."

China examined him for a long moment. "I'm sure I would have more friends if I were the type of person that felt any compulsion to sway you from that mindset. But I've been told I have an awful personality, so I won't be doing that."

"Whoever told you that was right," North agreed.

China's laugh was as low as the flame was burning, his glowing eyes staring at North from across the edge of the small table. The corners of his lips lowered the slightest bit, making the Korean tense.

"But I will say this," his comrade said quietly. "We're called Countryhumans for a reason. We have two halves to balance- country and human. They're both important. A Countryhuman that forgets he's a country is dangerous to the world. But a Countryhuman that forgets he's a human is dangerous to himself."

"I am Korea," North replied stiffly.

"En." China wasn't smiling at all now, his voice soft as he said, "But don't forget that you're human, too, Chaoxian."

North looked down, turning the bowl of noodle with chopsticks that shook slightly in his hand.

"And finish your noodle," China said in his regular voice, signalling that it was safe now.

North still didn't look up. "Don't tell me what to do."

"Please finish your noodle, comrade, I beg of you." China's smile didn't match his genuinely pleading tone.

North huffed in irritation and embarrassment, but brought the stupid noodle back to his mouth. Paste or not, it wasn't like he could give it away now. And... he didn't want his comrade's efforts to go to waste, either, even if he hadn't been the one to make it.

There was silence filled with the occasional small slurp as North tried to eat the ridiculously long, thin noodle as silently and gracefully as possible. China watched it slowly get sucked into his mouth, lips twitching.

"This is so ridiculous," North said around it, despairingly, after several minutes.

China opened his mouth, then his smile contorted as his composure finally broke, teeth flashing before he buried his head in his arms, shaking as he silently snickered, undeterred by the smack on his head.

The two men stayed in the forest even after North had finished his birthday noodle, talking quietly as the lamp burned low. They stayed until it flickered out.

Happy Liberation Day! I've been saving this chapter to post for it. ^^

Heheheh I've been waiting to publish this chapter forever. I think about it every time I have a noodle dish. Also the keen-eyed will notice certain intentional inconsistencies ehe.

This is a really specific thing, but part of the reason I initially conceived Hae as a very friendly, outgoing person is because of the concept of hae-che. They're different words in Korean (Hae is a word for 'sea') but since they're both hae out loud , I liked the idea of the person with the same sounding name as the very intimate, casual speech level being a very intimate, casual person. Friend speech! Hae is a friend! ^^

Also North doesn't question 'bowl of noodle' at first because neither Korean nor Mandarin need plurals. They're both saying 국수 (Well, China is saying miàn tiáo, and North is hearing it as guksu.) But to him China is just saying noodle because it's obvious what he's referring to. But that is Not The Case. Noodle, singular. Intentional.

Celestial Burdening

"You can't be fucking serious."

Korea didn't look back, still striding away, expecting North Hamgyong to follow.

"Dead serious," he said coldly. "As I have told you every other day. So long as I can't trust you to watch your tongue around our people, you will be remaining here in Pyongyang for deskwork."

North Hamgyong balled his fists. Part of him wanted to stand his ground at the muster point and refuse to move. But he knew if he did, Korea would just go to Moran Hill without him, and if he wasn't with him to blindfold him, he'd probably have him locked out or some shit, then get on his ass if he went to do something actually useful, just to prove a point.

So he broke, storming after him.

"I have shit to do," he stressed, stomping towards the river with him.

Fixing the railways that would've gotten fucked again last night, finishing dealing with the holiday complaints, going around to the mountain villages to make sure they were ready for winter, like they wouldn't just freeze and starve anyway no matter what they did. And he had that damn response to bring Jung from Jo. And while he didn't care about whatever the fuck was going on between them, he did care that the vindictive Worker's Party woman would probably lodge a compliant against him for 'not holding to his provincial duties' or some shit if he didn't.

There was too much to do in his province, as fucking always, to sit on his ass and do paperwork here for the fourth day in a row.

"And if I could trust that you would do it well, you would have left two days ago with the others," Korea shot back.

North Hamgyong bristled, anger churning in his chest. "I don't know what she fucking said to you-"

Korea whirled around, almost making him smash into him. He had his stone-cold bastard face on, like the wide-eyed, open look from Foundation Day had never even existed, like he would for another year. If they even survived that long.

"South Hamgyong said that you told a comrade in our army that his missing sister was likely dead," he accused. "Do you deny it?"

He could, but he knew Korea would just hunt the Pyeon guy down to find out the truth. He probably already had. He grimaced instead.

His Countryhuman's eye narrowed. "Then as far as I am concerned, you don't have a leg to stand on when it comes to arguing that you can be trusted."

Korea shifted on his, visibly stiff and irritated, like he'd been ever since Foundation Day. Ssi-bal, like he'd been for over two fucking years. It just got worse every time he let the crowd grope him. North Hamgyong bet they'd done a number on him under those bandages. And it wouldn't heal because the burns wouldn't until their land wasn't being bombed anymore and it wasn't going to stop being bombed any-fucking-time soon. But he'd still let them do it, gathering around him with that look on their faces, young, old, worker, soldier, peasant, like everything was going to be okay, like one speech had convinced them they could win by Liberation Day again, just like South Hamgyong, sitting on the edge of her seat with parted lips and a light in her eyes he'd never been able to put there.

'What an idiot.'

"How the fuck can I not be trusted?" he demanded. "I've been doing my damn job, I've been doing everything you tell me to. I say one fucking thing and now you're back to doubting me?"

"You told one of our soldiers his sibling was dead!" Korea snapped, then glanced around at the foggy dawn around the river. When the only people he saw were North Hamgyong's guards standing far enough away to pretend they couldn't hear, his jaw feathered, and he turned his glare back on him.

"Pyeon Nam-yon's unit is on coastal defense in your province. What if the only thing keeping him there was the hope that his sister was still alive, and that by keeping the Yankees from our shores, he was keeping her safe?"

"Then we'd need to do a better job selecting model soldiers," North Hamgyong retorted. "If one person is the difference between him be willing to die for our country or fucking off and deserting, then we wouldn't need his ass in the first place."

He knew he'd got Korea there, because he curled his lip, his glower cutting deeper. Because obviously it wasn't really about morale or keeping an already model soldier loyal or any-fucking-thing like that- he was pissed because if North Hamgyong had ever said anything like that to him about the Southern bastard after they saw that picture in the paper, he would've killed him.

He hadn't even meant to say that shit. He wouldn't have if he hadn't been able to feel South Hamgyong shooting him those venomous little glares every damn second, daring him to. He should've just kept keeping his dumbass mouth shut, story of his miserable fucking life.

Korea's eye slitted, and he put his shoulders back. Though North Hamgyong had enough back problems of his own to notice his spine didn't straighten without a fight.

"And what is your excuse for calling South Hamgyong what you did?" he asked, cold like a dead engine.

North Hamgyong's jaw feathered. He could still see the shadow that flickered in her eyes when he'd called her a bitch, acting like she was solely angry instead of anything else. She hadn't even pretended to be hurt.

'Should have just kept your mouth fucking shut.'

And still, because he didn't have an excuse and he never learned his damn lesson, he muttered, "I bet she didn't tell you everything we said."

Korea's voice went tight. "What is that supposed to mean?"

Already regretting it, the province said, "Nothing."

"Don't fucking tell me 'nothing.'"

Korea's arm shot out and, before he could stop him, he was grabbing North Hamgyong by the collar, yanking him towards him, demanding in his face, "What were you talking about? What did you say?"

His guards had came rushing in to haul him away from South Hamgyong like he was a damn five-year old tugging at a Jap officer's coat, even when he knew he could put her down, but of course they didn't step in now. Korea was the one person they wouldn't defend him from. He bet their backs were even fucking turned.

"What were you saying about me?!" Korea snarled, flecks of spittle hitting North Hamgyong's cheek.

His eye was wide, blown open, and as much as North Hamgyong's tongue itched to tell him about their talk of cliff's edges, to fucking make Korea see and stop him from barreling off it, he still wasn't a total fucking moron.

"It wasn't about you." He tried to sound annoyed enough that he'd think he was being honest, attempting to bat his hands off of him and only getting his breathing restricted as his collar tightened around his neck. "South Hamgyong brought up me shooting her in front of our fucking bodyguards."

It wasn't a lie, and if she was happy to throw him under the trolley, then he had no problem with making sure she ended up on the tracks with him.

Korea's eye bored into his, like he was trying to shaft mine the truth from him. He didn't let go, but he let North Hamgyong swat his hands away the next time he tried, stepping back.

"I will speak to her about that," he said coolly, like he hadn't just been spraying spit in his province's face. "But that is nowhere near the same level of misdemeanour as degrading a member of our government. What if a female Party member had overheard, or one of our civilians? Do you think they would be comfortable working with you on projects or coming to you for help?"

North Hamgyong's heart was still beating hard, his neck stinging where his uniform had cut into the burns on it.

"You just tried to fucking choke me out over thinking we were gossiping about you," he snapped. "What do you think our civilians would think about that?"

Korea's face didn't flicker, that icy expression firmly drawn back over it. "If I wanted to choke you, you would be choked. Now answer the question- do you think any of our women would trust you fighting for them if they heard that you have zero respect for them?"

"Just because I called South Hamgyong a bitch doesn't mean I don't respect women," he said, irritated.

Why the fuck did everyone always act like he was some kind of raging misogynist? She was the only woman he had a problem with. And it wasn't because she was a woman, it was because she unfortunately used to be his dumbass sister.

"They don't know that," Korea returned. "They don't know about you two and your idiotic spat. All someone would see was you calling one of the most influential women in our country a slur. And if you were willing to treat a fellow Provincehuman that way, there is no reason for them to believe you wouldn't treat them that way, and see them as even less."

"Okay, I fucking get it!" North Hamgyong snapped. "You already lectured me about this, and I told you I understand. Can you just go back to nagging me about Pyeon? Or better yet, let me go back to my fucking province."

"You are not going anywhere until you can show that you haven't forgotten one of the first core tenets I ever laid out for you," Korea said. "'Do not use anti-people language' is one of the simplest ones, but apparently you no longer know how to follow it."

That list of words Korea had laid out for them after South Chungcheong had called South Hamgyong a whore, and forbidden them from using. Byeongsin, ssangnom, ssangnyeon, chonnom (though that hadn't ever stopped South Chungcheong in private), michin-saekki, anything that could be used against the female Hamgyong or the Jeollas. Gaenyeon. It was basically the same words South Hamgyong had always scolded him for using, or would have if he did, just more relaxed. Korea didn't care if they said shit or damn, and he said ssi-bal enough. And they could use bastard or dog's son when talking about Japs or traitors. But it had been made clear that anything that mocked class, cripples, or women would get them forced to do more than their share of chores for a month.

North Hamgyong had known South Hamgyong would go crying to Korea about him calling her one of their bad words. And he'd still said it because he was a fucking byeongsin.

But even now when he was getting nagged and grounded like he was a child, and right after, when he'd wanted to hammer on his head with his fists until it cracked, it didn't entirely remove the satisfaction of watching her face twist, seeing her get a little closer to admitting the truth about how she felt about him to herself.

It made his stomach churn.

"I do," he spat at Korea. "I wouldn't go around calling any woman that, and I wouldn't have said it if there were other people around!"

"There were. Your bodyguards."

North Hamgyong shot a look over his shoulder, finding that the two men were back at the muster point, you guessed it-conspicuously facing the either way, like a Yankee truck was going to come down the highway from Anju with its guns blazing.

He knew they'd heard everything South Hamgyong and him had growled at each other. They'd been walking on eggshells around him ever since. It pissed him off almost as much as being manhandled had.

"They have opinions and beliefs like any other person," Korea growled, like North Hamgyong hadn't spent the past year with them, and heard all about their lives, even when he didn't fucking want to. "I don't want them to waver in their duty of protecting you because you've said something that makes them question whether you are worth protecting. "

North Hamgyong bit his tongue on repeating that he should choose better guards if he was worried about that. They'd just end up talking in fucking circles.

"Fine," he surrendered, throwing his hands up. "I'm sorry, I shouldn't have fucking said it and I won't say it again, same with the shit I said to Pyeon. Happy?"

"No, I am not," Korea growled. "Not when I know that if you lose your temper, you'll just say something stupid again."

North Hamgyong snorted. "Like you've never lost your temper."

Once again, he had just tried to fucking choke him out.

The other man's eye flashed. "I lose my temper when one of you is being an idiot, not because I am a child that can't stop squabbling with my sister for five minutes."

'No, when you can't we just end up at war.'

Stupid fucking thought. They were at war because of the Yanks, not issues between Korea and his cowardly brother. He might be a spineless, pathetic traitor, but Korea liked him, for whatever fucking reason. He didn't feel the same way about his brother the Hamgyongs felt about each other, and that was the fucking problem.

And neither of them had any control over this. Even if Korea had came back from the south with the Southern bastard in April, they'd still be here now, caught up in Yankee stalling at the peace talks. America would still be fucking bombing them. Even if there was only one Korea, he still would be.

He'd never stop.

"I am not your parent," Korea said when he only glowered. "I'm not going to make you apologize to South Hamgyong like you're children. But if you aren't going to take my advice and treat each other the way siblings, comrades should, then I am going to have to intervene when the war is over."

Ssi-bal. Was South Hamgyong actually going to get her re-education wish? If so, he bet she hadn't thought she'd be dragged into it. It would've made him smug, if he didn't want to get stuck in fucking book club with her and whatever tactics Korea wanted to use to 'fix' them.

It wouldn't work anyways. There wasn't fixing something if one person didn't want to admit it was broken.

And when neither of them wanted to. This fan belt had worn out a long time ago, forced to keep working even when the leather was a few fibres away from snapping. Now it had, months ago, thanks to him and his fucking mouth. You couldn't repair something like that, only trash it.

"I thought you didn't care about our personal drama," North Hamgyong said bitterly, cracked nails digging into his palms.

"I don't. Unless it starts affecting your duties." Korea glared at him. "And it is if you are going around telling our soldiers that they are never going to see their families again."

"That had nothing to do with South Hamgyong," the province argued. "I told Pyeon his sister was probably dead because she is, and it doesn't do any good for him to get his damn hopes up."

He couldn't help the way he lowered his brows, silently communicating to Korea.

"No," he said coldly. "You told him that to piss off South Hamgyong. You willingly hurt and discouraged one of our people to get back at your own sister."

North Hamgyong bared his teeth. "What does it matter? It's still true."

"You don't know that!" Korea snapped, a flicker of heat coming back into his voice before it smoothed out again. "And even if it is, you do not say it. Your job is to protect our people's hopes, not destroy them."

North Hamgyong's teeth ground together. Korea would ignore his silent warning, then parrot almost the same exact damn thing South Hamgyong had said a few days ago. Maybe her and their Countryhuman really did have a psychic connection, or at least more of one than he'd ever had with her.

What did he care? He had never asked to be her brother. She had found him, made him take care of her. And then when he couldn't, she'd locked herself up and chained him to the assembly line. He'd never asked for the job, never wanted it. But while he had escaped from the factory years ago, he couldn't escape from that one, even if South Hamgyong was pretending he could. It wasn't that fucking easy.

Nothing ever was.

"'Hope' won't make his sister any more alive," he said stubbornly. "It'll just make it worse when he can't delude himself anymore."

Why couldn't they see that? Yes, South Hamgyong pretending everything was fine had encouraged him to say that shit to Pyeon without thinking, but he still would've said it anyways. He was trying to help. It didn't do any good for the man to make finding his sister the one thing that was getting him through shit. Because she was dead, and once he accepted that, he'd have nothing. And then he'd off himself or some shit.

Korea stared at him for a long moment, jaw working. On the highway behind them, trucks piled high with supplies from the Chinese rolled into the city, moving while there were no planes visible in the sky.

"Do you know why you have four stars on your epaulets?" he asked eventually, less aggressively.

Annoyed at the stupid question, and sensing another lecture, North Hamgyong replied, "Because I'm a general in the Korean People's Army."

"And do you know why our generals have stars on their epaulets?"

Fuck. Was he about to get demoted?

"Why?" he asked warily.

"Because each star weighs a billion tons," Korea said, gazing at him steadily.

North Hamgyong glanced down at the golden stars pinned to his gold thread-embroidered epaulets, two on each side. He lowered an eyebrow at his Countryhuman, encouraging him to start making sense.

"Four billion tons." Korea reached out, slapping his hands down on the boards, firm enough to make North Hamgyong flinch. He pressed hard, bearing down on him, crushing them into the burnt skin underneath. "That is how much weight you carry on your shoulders. That is how much the responsibility of an officer weighs. And that isn't even half of what the hopes of our people weigh."

North Hamgyong almost buckled under the pressure he was putting on him, spine aching as it bent. He was pretty sure the bastard was trying to force him to his knees. He tried to resist, even if it made his back scream.

Korea stared unflinchingly into his face. "And you are more than a general- you are a Korean Provincehuman. It is your job to carry their hopes, to carry them. And you cannot do that if you can't even bear your own."

North Hamgyong grit his teeth as he was forced eye level with him.

"It does not matter what your opinion on hope is," Korea said. "Our people need it. Without hope, there is no morale, there is no drive to fight, and there is no future."

What had the General said when he said hope didn't win wars? 'No. But it gives our people the drive to fight it.'

The three of them were all fucking psychically connected.

"You said you knew there was no other third choice, and you would rather die screaming than on your knees." Korea pressed harder, still trying to send him there. "Because you are a stubborn, nationalistic bastard. But not everyone is like that. We have worked hard to show our people that we are a country worth fighting for, that the future we want to guide them towards is one worth dying for. They are willing to put up with the bombing, face the enemy bullets, and die screaming because they have hope. Hope that we will win, that their deaths won't mean nothing, and that they will be able to build happy lives and reunite with their families."

His eye flickered, and pain lanced through North Hamgyong's shoulder as he forced him below his eye.

"Your job is to foster that hope, to nurture it, to show them that they aren't wrong for believing in us, and that giving their lives for even the chance of that being possible is worth it. Because without that chance, there are millions of people who would fall to their knees in despair and never get back up."

"Then they're cowards," North Hamgyong grunted, neck straining, and was rewarded with more pressure.

"No, they are human," Korea said heatedly. "Our people are braver and more spirited than any others. I know you believe that."

Of course he did. Their people were the best in the world, traitorous bastards excepted.

"So why do you think they tolerated thirty-six years of Japanese oppression?" his Countryhuman demanded, and before he could say anything, answered, "Because they had never had anything to hope for. The emperor and kings and yangban, the old provinces and Joseon, taught them that there was nothing to hope for, that all they had to live for was serving their monarchs and worshiping their country, and that they would see rewards for it after they died.

"They only stood up when they saw that wasn't true. The Donghak Peasant Revolution failed, but it showed that fighting back was possible, the Bolshevik Revolution demonstrated that it was possible to win, and the March First Movement proved that we could come together and make an impact." His jaw feathered. "It showed us that we had to stand up and fight."

"The March First Movement failed."

North Hamgyong hadn't left work for it. He couldn't. But plenty of the other men had, along with those from the timber processing factory and distillery, heading off into the Kanggye town square to wave their homemade flags and protest. Only to come crawling back when it didn't work, either getting their asses beat by the Japs at the plant, or worse- fired, put out of a fucking job in a two-bit town, doomed to either die when winter came or on their way through the mountains to somewhere else. Plenty hadn't come back at all, like he'd known would happen.

They'd been so damn excited, chattering about it in hushed voices on their breaks for a month in advance, so fucking convinced it would work, that all they had to do was wave some shitty scraps of fabric and shout their lungs out, and the Japs would run away with their tails between their legs. One man had been especially loud, even quitting the day before, certain that he wouldn't need to slave away processing ore in a couple days.

He'd come back three months later, when the protests had started to peter out, quiet and sullen, missing an ear, forced to grovel and beg for his job back. He'd offed himself the next day, hung himself in the manager's office.

Not North Hamgyong. Any childish naïveté had been long gone by then. March First hadn't meant anything to him, other than that they had ten months left. The other men had been crushed under the weight of their 'hopes' crashing down on them. But he'd just kept working.

"But we succeeded," Korea stressed. "And the March First Movement showed us that we could try. All of those things gave us hope. Even all those little useless acts of adventurism against the Japanese in the early years proved that they were mortal, that they could be fought against, and the leftist literature that made it into our country taught people that taking the chance to fight was worth it, that they didn't have to just go back to suffering under different oppressors."

"But they are," North Hamgyong forced out, thighs trembling, the ache from his spine invading his tailbone. "We fought for so fucking long, and we're still being colonized."

People were still living like slaves under the Yanks in the south, their men starving and homeless and their women getting violated. They were living in the ground, surrounded by a sea of ashes and twisted metal. The Yanks had slaughtered almost as many Koreans in seven years as the Japs had in three decades, and fucked up their infrastructure far more because they'd actually had shit to fuck up.

"Because we are not done fighting," Korea hissed, nails sinking into his epaulets. "And if we don't have hope then we never will be."

"How?" North Hamgyong demanded, the agony radiating down through his back from his shoulders letting the word slip out. "How the fuck can you still believe we can win this?"

He had seen Korea almost lose it after the Supung Dam was bombed, he had been watching him degrade for the past year and two months, ever since their final chance to Liberate the south had slipped away, wearing at the joints like a motor that refused to be maintenanced or stop running.

And the worst part was that he didn't think it was bullshit when he told him he didn't believe they were fucked. Somehow, some-fucking-way, he really did believe they could defeat America and free their country, that somehow winning this war wouldn't just doom them to another hundred years of it. And that even if they did, they could take it.

And apparently North Hamgyong hadn't even been able to have hope that he could save his sister.

"Because I have to," Korea said back, a different edge in his voice. "And so do you. You have these stars because I believe you are worthy of them. So stop trying to prove that you aren't. If you don't have hope, then have an officer's conscience and make sure our people do."

His eye narrowed, looking down on him now.

"You couldn't believe you could protect your sister, and now you're letting yourself lose her. Make up for it, North Hamgyong- don't lose our people, too."

Rage flared in him, and he struggled against Korea's force, trying to make his crying spine straighten. But his Countryhuman only applied more pressure, forcing him down.

He tried to fight, but he couldn't. And what was the point? If Korea wanted him on his knees, he would get him there, just like if America wanted them destroyed, they would be destroyed, somehow, someday. He wanted to keep fighting, he was a stubborn nationalistic bastard, he knew there was no third option, that there weren't really even two. But he didn't know how South Hamgyong and the others could pretend to believe that their only option was the one they wanted, or how Korea and the General did. He didn't see how they fucking could when every day their soldiers died in the thousands down at the front and their civilians did the same in the rear, when their railways and roads, their fucking veins, didn't go a night without getting completely, utterly fucked, when the Yank could recover from a nationwide steel shortage in a couple fucking months, and every week that ugly motherfucker Rhee was having their POWs tortured, forced to sign blood petitions, mowed down by Yankees and thrown into the sea, and shipped out to his other deathcamps to train the traitors and the cowards to kill their own comrades, chipping away at the number of people they would get back if the Yankees ever fucking signed the ceasefire. And he knew they wouldn't.

They were trying so hard, they had been trying so damn hard their entire lives, all of them. The men and women on the factory lines pumping shit out so they'd never have to go back to slaving away for fourteen hours a day for half a fucking yen, the peasants drowning in sweat under a sky filled with death machines so they wouldn't go back to starving, the soldiers and guerrillas getting mowed down at the front and behind enemy lines, every enemy soldier they managed to kill met by ten of theirs in single airstrike, every position it took a hundred men and a week to claim stolen back in a night as it was soaked in napalm and white phosphorous. They were all trying so hard and it changed nothing. It was useless.

So what was the point in having hope when you knew you were just going to be crushed by it?

North Hamgyong bared his teeth, lowering his head as he sank under the weight on his shoulders. Korea's gaze only got colder with every inch of distance he forced between them.

His legs quivered, filled with pain as his spine began to lose the fight, feeling like a rod of hot foreign steel in his burnt flesh, about to snap at a break line below his shoulder blades. Just when he thought it would-

"Comrade Korea!"

Korea took his hands off him like the molten agony had burned him, too, snapping into attention as someone hailed him.

North Hamgyong couldn't straighten right away, still feeling that heavy weight bearing down on his epaulets. Even when his spine felt like his again, he still could.

'Ssi-bal.' He tried not to pant, or have his aching legs give out as he rubbed his tender shoulder. 'Fucking bastard.'

He glared at Korea, but his Countryhuman was focused on the man hurrying towards them. North Hamgyong's guards had actually been doing part of their job, checking his identity before letting him approach. It looked like a senior colonel from the 'hidden' military headquarters (North Hamgyong was an engineer- there weren't many places around Pyongyang that were ideal for constructing bunker complexes). Four stars gleamed on each epaulet for eight in total, more than a general's, but also smaller.

"Comrade Korea." He stopped before them, saluting. He either hadn't seen their Countryhuman trying to compact one of his provinces like a hydraulic press, or was doing a damn good job at pretending he hadn't. Or...

North Hamgyong's jaw clenched at what he saw lurking under the officer's professional expression.

"At ease," Korea said, voice flat again. "Report, comrade."

"Comrade Choe Yong-gon is requesting you at Headquarters, Comrade General," he said, glancing at North Hamgyong.

"Tell him I will be there in under an hour."

The man glanced at North Hamgyong again, then said, "He's requesting you immediately, comrade."

Korea glared at North Hamgyong, like it was his fault he wasn't going to be able to personally chain him to a desk. "Fine."

Before he could order him to go waterboard himself in the river until he got back or some shit, the province cut in, "I felt heavy bombing in my province last night. Give me a status report on that."

The colonel looked at Korea for permission, pissing North Hamgyong off, even though he knew he still didn't want them knowing about behind-the-scenes shit. Though he didn't know what the point was. If Chongjin was captured again, then it meant it was over for good.

Not that it wasn't just a matter of time.

"No locations or upcoming operations," Korea said with his nod of permission.

It looked grudging. North Hamgyong bet he didn't want him to feel vindicated by how fucked over they were getting, but also didn't think it would look good if he steamrolled his right to ask. At least that meant he probably wasn't getting demoted.

Even if he had never asked for this burden, either.

The colonel gave North Hamgyong a salute. "It was mostly supply buildings in the Hwanghae area- Sibyon, Singgye, Namchonjom, Sohung. And Kiyang and Kunu-ri in South Pyongan province. F-80s hit the mines there, burned down over thirty buildings."

Korea's expression didn't change, but North Hamgyong could see the way he got even stiffer. It made his own teeth grind, especially knowing they wouldn't be hearing from the Hwanghaes or his least favourite cousin that wasn't North Chungcheong for at least another few days. They couldn't waste telegraph paper.

"So it was just the f- railways and power roads in my province?" he demanded.

Fuck. No major targets, but it had still kept him up half the damn night.

The colonel nodded. "Yes, Comrade General. And our vehicles. It was a bad night for our convoys."

"How many?" Korea asked.

"Seventy-seven reported, but at least a dozen more missing. We're waiting to see if they were waylaid or destroyed."

They were on the open riverbank, with nothing around to punch. It didn't stop the urge from swelling North Hamgyong's fists, making them clench.

Ssi-bal. If it was seventy-seven reported so far, the final number would probably end up being a hundred.

It took so much goddamn work to produce trucks, processing the raw materials and producing the parts, then assembling them. The Tokchon Motor Plant was working overtime underground to try and keep their army supplied, and it still wasn't enough. And the only other option was to buy them from the Soviets and other Euro Socialists. North Hamgyong knew Korea wasn't going to let them look at the amount of debt they owed them anytime soon, but he knew it must be enormous. They couldn't afford any more, not if they ever wanted to have enough money to produce their own automobiles in the future.

He bit down on his urge to curse so hard that the taste of copper filled his mouth.

"There's a frontline report waiting for Comrade Korea at Headquarters," the colonel said, his own voice carefully militant. "But there hasn't been much progress. The PVA still hasn't managed to retake the height west of the Bukhan River from the Rhee army's Capitol Division. There's just too much air support."

North Hamgyong didn't see any use in poring over the tactical maps, and Korea had them limited to basic ones anyway. But he knew any height west of the Bukhan would have to be the main one between it and the Kumsong River, and maybe the nearby ridge.

A bridgehead. The puppet army had been sent across to capture a bridgehead, and hold it.

He gave Korea a dark look out of the corner of his eye. 'Any day now.'

His Countryhuman pretended not to see it. "I will confer with Comrade Deng Hua on our course of action," he said. Looking at North Hamgyong now, he said, "Head to-"

"Wait." North Hamgyong narrowed his eyes at the colonel. "What else is there?"

The man shifted slightly on his feet, proving that he hadn't been imagining the uneasy look he was hiding. North Hamgyong should know what that looked like- every single one of his cousins that wasn't Hae was hiding one. He was sure the southern ones were, too.

'If they're even alive.'

Korea swung his head back to the man. "What else do you have to report?"

He dipped his chin slightly. "Comrade Choe Yong-gon wishes to give you the news in person."

"No," Korea said before he was even done talking, the same jagged edge that he'd had when gripping North Hamgyong's collar back in his voice. "Now."

The colonel's lips flattened, his shoulders dipping under some invisible weight before he put them back, jaw squaring.

"The enemy bombed the Supung Dam again."

North Hamgyong's teeth came down so hard he could've felt them splinter. Without thinking, he whirled to look across the river, like he could see if the lights were out when no idiot would be wasting electricity under the shortage in the first place. Like there were even houses left standing to have windows.

He swung his head back, burnt knuckles splitting.

Korea's expression was flat, not saying anything. So it was on North Hamgyong to demand, "Did it break?"

"No," the man said, but the way he said it didn't exactly fill the province with fucking rainbows and sunshine. "The planes came in last night around 23:55, around thirty B-29 heavy bombers. Aircraft hunters say they cut the searchlights with fragmentation bombs, and jammed our radars somehow. They dropped a few hundred payloads, mostly high-explosive and incendiaries. And the napalm. But they only hit a glancing strike on one of the turbine rooms, and a few dozen on one of the transformer yards. According to the missive, none of the generators were hit."

Not that that fucking mattered. They barely had any working. And the couple they did weren't enough.

"Three hit the dam itself, but it held," the colonel continued, unable to hide the relief in his voice, even if that darker thing was still there. "Anti-aircraft teams scattered their formations and stopped any real damage. They even shot one down."

One. Out of thirty. And that was good news.

"All the other bombs went wide. Most of the damage was collateral." The man's voice sobered again. "The only infrastructural damage for the plant was a cable, but six huts that local peasants lived in were blown apart, along with one of the warehouses used for storing the POWs' rations. And..." He removed his hat, holding it to his chest. "Two civilians were wounded, though they're expected to survive. And one died."

"Bastards," North Hamgyong swore. How was he supposed to hold the word back when the Yanks had made six families homeless and killed someone just to miss their fucking target?

"And... there's more." There was a slight waver in the man's tone. "When the first bomb hit the dam, the workers were unable to assess the damage in the middle of the raid. They weren't sure if it had cracked, or if the structural integrity might have been compromised enough to if another hit. So they did as you ordered."

'You.' A small word, not even said like an accusation. It was just the truth, one of the orders Korea had given before he'd left the dam after it was bombed the first time, a precaution that had made North Hamgyong grind his teeth every time he'd looked up at the enormous concrete wall that held back million of tons of water, thinking about the damage it could cause. Even though he knew the damage that could come if it wasn't given would've been a hundred times worse.

Korea knew it too. But still, at the sound of that insignificant word, North Hamgyong saw a look he knew too fucking well flash across his eye, a rusty nail directed inwards.

"They drained the reservoir," the province growled, and the colonel nodded grimly.

"Yes, Comrade General."

"How bad?" Korea was blunt, completely emotionless.

"Not as bad as it could've been," their officer said. "Since it hit near the top, they apparently didn't have to drain much. And with some of the generators still out of operation, the river downstream was still low."

North Hamgyong knew he was damage controlling. They'd been getting enough rain these last few weeks that even if it'd been lower than usual, it hadn't been low. And with not all the sluice gates operating at full capacity, there would've just been more water in the reservoir to release.

Like he'd fucking known he would, the man finished heavily, "But we lost a few ri of farmland."

"I see." Korea's voice was still dead flat. "Thank you for your diligence, comrade. Go inform Comrade Choe Yong-gon that I will be right there."

The colonel saluted and left, leaving them alone by the highway again. It was quiet now, the trucks all disappeared into the city. The only sound was the distant hammering and shouts as workers tried to fix the railroads and bridges again, and that aggravating fucking drone.

"We're fucked."

North Hamgyong's words sounded dull, even to him, the way shit sounded when your ear drums were screwed after a long factory shift. Korea didn't respond.

"We're fucked," he repeated, louder, as he turned to him. "The rice harvest isn't in yet. All the paddies we spent all summer growing got drowned, and all the other shit we just planted will have been fucking wasted. If we don't drain the fields in time, we'll lose a chunk of the autumn harvest, too."

It'd mostly be rations for the POWs, so it shouldn't have mattered. But North Hamgyong knew they couldn't starve them, no matter how much he suggested it. The Yanks could starve their prisoners, beat them, torture them, treat them like animals. But the moment they tried to do the same, even just to get enough food for their own fucking people, the entire 'international community' would come down on them like a fucking anvil, like they were their stupid fucking religion's antichrist.

"The dam didn't even break. We just flooded our own fucking fields for nothing."

North Hamgyong knew he was just hammering that rusty nail in further, but he wanted his Countryhuman to scream back at him, to rage and hit him instead of staring emptily into space.

Korea didn't snap the way he wanted, just stared forward and asked dully, "What should I have done then?"

North Hamgyong didn't know. There wasn't anything he could have done, even if that wouldn't stop him from beating himself up over giving the order. If the dam had broke, far more than a few ri would've been wiped out, and it wasn't like the workers could know if it would break or not break until it did. And by then it would be too late. They would see just how that would end the next time the Yankees came back, or the next.

That was the problem. There wasn't anything they could do differently, there wasn't any way to stop the Americans, or America.

"We will fix it," Korea said, still flat, still staring at something that didn't exist.

"We can't fucking 'fix' the crops," North Hamgyong said, frustrated. "We can't even fix the fucking plant!"

"We got the generators operating again in two weeks."

"Two of the generators!" the province cried.

As hard as they'd worked all summer, they hadn't managed to restore all of them, they were too badly damaged.

"Two are still fucking dead, and they haven't stopped hammering our other power stations for five fucking seconds." The cords on his arms strained from how hard his fists were clenched. "We are going into winter with less than fifteen fucking percent of our electricity working. All those fancy heated floors we spent ages installing in the shelters and hospitals aren't going to do shit if we don't have the power for them. People are going to freeze, they're going to starve, Korea."

Like they always had.

The dreary grey sun was suddenly too bright, piercing his skull like a round. The ground plunged away beneath his boots like it did at least once every damn day, exhaustion, hunger, and pain falling in on him, his spine bending under the weight, feeling like a useless hunk of metal again.

He didn't want to do paperwork and he didn't want to go back to his province, to run around solving problems that would stop mattering the moment the Yank got tired of dealing with them and unleashed the atom bomb. He just wanted to sleep, to pass out on the unyielding ground and close his eyes until this was all fucking over.

But he knew from experience that things didn't get better when you slept. You just woke up to a life that wasn't yours anymore and a moron sister that was getting raped every day and thought you should be grateful for it. Nothing ever got better. It only got worse and worse, and when it finally seemed like it wasn't, it was only setting you up to smash the hammer down on your skull, to punish you for being such an idiot that you could ever dare think that maybe life didn't have to be about suffering. You only ever got to build factories so someone else could knock them down.

He wanted to scream and punch something, to shake Korea until he admitted it was all useless, that there was only one option and that they were all going to die screaming.

Instead he pounded a fist into his thigh, and the explosion of pain made his legs finally give out. He fell into a squat, baring his teeth as he buried his face in his arms.

'Fucking pathetic.'

But he always had been, hadn't he?

"Do you want to know what hope is?"

North Hamgyong would have snapped that he didn't fucking care what hope was, that it was useless, that it didn't exist and that if he heard one more word about it he was going to shove the muzzle of his Tokarev in his mouth. But Korea's tone made anything he could have said die on his tongue.

He looked up. The other man was still facing forward, the side with the eyepatch to him, making his expression unnervingly blank.

"You can't understand how I can still believe in victory," he said flatly. "But you can understand working in a factory. You know what it is like to be chained to the line, to slave away until your fingers bleed and your muscles tear, to have your ribs kicked in by the Japs, and to get back up when it's over and keep working. Because if you don't, then the person you care about will suffer for it."

Korea turned towards him, eye somehow glassy and burning at the same time.

"Hope is something that breaks your spine," he said, the words seeping poison like puncture wounds on an arm. "It cracks your bones and crushes your body until it is all you can do to keep moving forward. And you do, even if it would be easier to fall to your knees."

North Hamgyong looked down at his, gritting his teeth under his Countryhuman's dark gaze.

"You can't conceptualize believing that one day things will be better," Korea said. "Fine. But I know you can conceptualize a burden. That is what hope is. That is what these stars are."

He grabbed at one of his own epaulets like he was going to tear it off.

"A burden." His fingers curled around the star pins, then let go. "One that we have to carry, because if we don't, then our country and everyone in it will suffer for it. I know you don't want that."

Of course he fucking didn't. He didn't want their people to suffer anymore, he didn't want Pyeon to never find his sister, he didn't want to feel this way. He never had.

"So get up," Korea ordered, glaring down at him. "Get over your stupid fucking issues with your sister, get over yourself, and stop being a fucking weakling."

North Hamgyong planted his palms on his thighs, baring his teeth as he tried to push himself up. His arms throbbed, biceps feeling like hunks of meat around a wooden skewer that was about to burn through. His skin split under the pressure, hot blood soaking his legs. His spine was a metal shaving that would snap if he tried to uncurl it, but he still tried, bending inch by inch, until with a grunt of exertion, he surged to his feet.

"Happy?" he rasped, white-hot agony coursing through his entire body.

He didn't think Korea had ever been 'happy,' not since 1945 at least. Annoyingly optimistic, aggravatingly fucking hopeful. But not happy.

He obviously didn't smile now. Just gave him another thousand-ri glare.

"If you ever want to give up, kill yourself first and do it quietly," he said like the merciless bastard he was. "It would do less harm to our people."

North Hamgyong didn't bite back. Korea's eye wasn't piercing, it was still unfocused. And pus still clung to his words. As much as it pissed him off to admit, it cowed him.

"Go work on the tracks until I come for you," his Countryhuman ordered, mechanical as a machine. "I'm calling South Hwanghae back, and we are going to North Pyongan. We will get South Pyongan on the way. Our peasants need to understand that we wouldn't have drained the dam if we didn't think it was the better outcome. And they need to see us on the ground working to fix it."

'To fix what I have done.' He wasn't trying to communicate, but North Hamgyong could still read it on his fucking face before he turned, walking stiffly away.

"If I hear you said a single word to our workers that I don't like, I will have you stripped of your rank and locked up until the war is over, and I can re-educate you," he said without looking back. "Korea doesn't need someone who is too weak to carry his own burdens."

North Hamgyong squeezed his eyes shut as his Countryhuman's footsteps left.

He wasn't weak. He had spent all those years slaving away with that tiny, useless body of his, doing two times the work of the real men with not even the breaks, trying to pay off the stupid debt South Hamgyong had trapped herself in, to make it so she had to take one less pig, and he'd never fucking faltered. Even when he had to muffle his sounds at night as his muscles throbbed and his joints ached like they were about to snap, and he wished they were both fucking dead, he still got up in the morning and did it all again. He had spent twenty-six years marching over every ri of their country, eating powdered meat or lichen or nothing at all, fighting the Japs every step of the way, and even once they could pretend the fighting was over, he'd led the charge on heavy industry, going sleepless for five years so he could take every class he needed and drive all over the north to rebuild their factories and make sure the people working in them were no longer working like slaves. And he'd dealt with the goddamn 'tactical retreat.' He hadn't let those bastards take Chongjin, and he'd kicked them out of Hamhung.

He'd shot his own fucking sister. Even if he hadn't been man enough to do what he needed to save her from the Yank, he'd still done it.

He wasn't weak. He just didn't work like a vehicle you could fill up with hope. It wasn't real, and he didn't know how South Hamgyong and the General and Korea could talk like it was, like it was something you could choose to pick up and carry with you, even if the last one had a different view of it than he'd thought.

But he for sure as hell did know what a burden was.

North Hamgyong screwed his lids shut so tight that he felt the edges crack as the burns drew in.

Then he set off to fix the veins of their country for the millionth fucking time, back straight and shoulders bowed.

North Hamgyong and his friends 'that bastard Jo Tal-gong' and 'that vindictive Worker's Party woman Jung Kye-suk.' And Han Gang-seok.

Real life note- so the Supung Dam was bombed again on the night of September 12th, 1952, but the thing about water being released and flooding the land may not have happened. I've seen several sources say that farmland flooded that day because 'the dam was damaged,' which seems to be objectively not true because the Soviet reports say it wasn't, and no North Korean or Chinese reports mention it (and they would've had to for the rebuilding). Some also say there was flooding because the North Koreans/Chinese lowered the water levels in case of damage, since the dam was hit, but I've never see any non-American sources say this, and none of the military reports at the time mention it (though the Americans did think they'd managed to destroy more of the plant facilities than they did at the time, and tended to inflate their numbers, so it's not like they're hugely trustworthy; it just seems to me like they'd try to paint the North Koreans/Chinese lowering the water levels as evil, like 'the commies wiped out their own farmland!!' It wouldn't be evil, because the outcome of the dam being genuinely cracked and having the Supung Reservoir violently gush out would be much more disastrous, but I could definitely see the Americans trying to spin it that way). I think there's a chance that the people saying that might have gotten this mixed up with another event that will eventually happen, and the ones that say 'the Communists lowered their own water' are trying to lie to cover up what actually happened. I don't mean that in a conspiracy way- the upcoming event is objectively something America did by their own admission, even at the time.
I'm choosing to use the lowered water levels on the chance they did happen, and because I think North would tell workers to drain the reservoir to prevent a full-scale flood in case of damage. He's paranoid (for good reason), and with how terrified he was when the electricity first went out, before he knew the dam itself hadn't been destroyed in June, he would be looking for any chance for even slight harm reduction. Just so you're aware that while this attack did happen, with the Americans trying to completely black out the DPRK again just before fall really set in, the flooding didn't necessarily.

Also if you watch a lot of old North Korean films, you might see the easter egg I put in this chapter. ^^

Take Your Silver Spoon

South looked around warily, staring into the shadows of the side street he'd just come from, heart pounding. His eyes traced the slumping outlines of the ragged hanok, a far cry above the shantytown huts on the very edges of Busan, but still a mark of a lower-class neighbourhood. The darkness lurked between the ramshackle buildings like something alive.

He didn't see the looming shadow he expected to. But with a deep breath, he turned and pulled open the thin wooden door on the house at the address he'd been told to go to just this morning, slipped through the window he'd made sure was cracked.

The person inside flinched when she saw him, like she'd been expecting the police enforcing the curfew to come storming in. She didn't relax even after he shut the door with a gentle 'snick' that seemed far too loud in the silent night, only hustled past him, snatching the sheet pinned beside the entrance and sweeping it across it.

If the outside hadn't been enough, the inside said the house definitely belonged to poor people. It was one small, open room with scuffed wooden flooring. It looked like maybe dividing sheets had been used to partition off parts of it before, but now they'd all been taken down and hung up on the walls, hiding the windows, like the place was ashamed of its empty innards. The woman bustled around, rechecking these, pulling at the fraying edges, adjusting them in ways South honestly couldn't even see, and thought she should've done before he got here, if it was that important.

Trying to muffle sound so they couldn't be heard from outside? That should be okay, right?

South glanced around the threadbare room. He was pretty sure he could still feel a draft. It wasn't like Busan was getting cold yet, so far down in the south. But it was getting cold*er*. Winter was once more closing in.

'Thank God.'

No more rolling around on the floor while he cooked alive, or stripping off all his clothes to become one with the table or counter. With America gone, he could go lie outside without having to overhear... anything. But the weather had been bad lately.

And the provinces were still there, their houses looming around his on almost all sides, windows watching like judgmental eyes, the boarded over set the most damning of all. Even though he knew they shouldn't be able to see him over his wall...

The weather had been bad lately. It was better to just stay inside.

There was nothing in the house to see by the light of the dim electric lamp on the floor. Either whoever had lived here had taken everything with them somewhere, or hadn't had anything in the first place.

But everyone had something, right? South had seen some pretty poor places back after Liberation, but even they had clay pots or rice straw mats, and even him and North had had the desk and thin futon. That probably meant the people here had packed up and left, even though there should be nowhere safer than Busan.

He wondered if they'd been Communists.

He turned to the woman as she checked the door sheet again, examining her.

She was older, middle-aged, with thick, slightly frizzy black hair that was pulled back in a headscarf. He could see lighter roots creeping out from under the dark blue fabric, even though she still looked way too young to be going grey. When she turned to South, the lamplight turned the wrinkles around her eyes and carved at the corners of her mouth to gaping shadowy crevasses. Stress then, he guessed.

'Join the club.'

He was lucky his skin wouldn't age that way. Then again, North did have that little divot between his eyebrows. Maybe he should stop scrunching his face so much when he cried. He didn't want to end up like him.

The woman was staring at him warily, her hands wringing around each other over and over, like dogs chasing their tails. Maybe she expected an officer to jump out from behind him or something.

Oh, that might help.

He pulled down the hood of the cloak he was wearing, fully revealing his flag.

"Hey," he said, trying not to sound awkward.

And finally, she relaxed. For the first time in months, years, when someone saw him they relaxed. She didn't narrow her eyes or curl her lip or give him a disaffected glare or regular hateful one. She didn't look at him with what he was starting to feel was pity, or worse, through him. She didn't look at him like he might cut out her other eye. Her shoulders slumped, and the lines at the corners of hers got a little less severe. And he could actually see them.

"Mr. Korea," she said, not resentfully the way the provinces did, the rare times they actually said it. She sounded... relieved, like some long journey was over.

South's heart panged.

Remembering his manners, he removed his cloak entirely, leaving him in the nice black suit America had sent him for Rhee's reinauguration. He spread the cheap fabric over the floor, folding it so it was slightly more plush.

"Here you go, ajumeoni." It was okay to address her that way, right? He didn't talk to many women, and all the ones he'd met at the club were young, his age. Physical age, he guessed.

Wait, was it rude to call a woman that could be a few years younger than him 'auntie,' even if she looked older? North had always just called them 'comrade' while they travelled, no matter what age, and South had copied him, not knowing what it really meant. No one had seemed to care, but obviously he couldn't use that now.

He wished he could ask someone what was polite. But the provinces would probably just lie to make him look like an idiot.

He patted the cloak beckoningly, trying to mask his nervousness. He should've had a drink after all, just one, enough to dull his nerves and make him act normal.

The woman hesitated, then sat. But not before pulling the makeshift cushion to the other side of the lamp, so she was facing the door. She might've relaxed a bit, but she was still clearly on guard.

It made him think of North after Liberation, and how no matter where they went, he always sat somewhere he could see the entrance, watching for whatever threat he thought was going to burst in when they were in a peasant's house in the middle of nowhere.

Or maybe he had been watching the exit, just waiting for another chance to run away, and leave South behind.

He clenched his jaw, lowering himself across from her, adjusting himself slightly on the hard wooden floor. He still had that awkward burn on his back that stretched down to his butt, and he had to sit more straight than was comfortable to stop the weird burn gash from complaining. He really didn't want to get blood on this suit. A chick at the club had said he looked good in it.

"What's your name?" he asked, hoping that wasn't too direct.

The woman shifted uneasily, glancing behind him. He guessed 'relaxed' really hadn't been the best way to put it. She was still quivering, like some sort of electrical current was running through her, and her eyes kept darting around the room, waiting for something to emerge from the shadows in the corners at any moment. She just seemed to think he wasn't a threat. That was good.

She pulled her hairscarf off, draping it over the lamp, dimming the light even more, until it probably couldn't be seen at all through the sheets over the exits. It pulled the shadows closer until they were almost suffocating, and cast a cool blue tint over them. It made his skin glow ethereally, like some kind of spirit, and greyed her out as if she was already dead. Then she leaned forward, lowering her voice.

"Kim Ok-ju," she whispered, like it was a secret.

That probably meant it was her real one then. And that she trusted him enough to share it.

"And you..." South took a surreptitious deep breath, trying to calm his pulse. "Wanted to talk to me?"

Kim Ok-ju nodded, her eyes flicking around again. "I found out where you were staying a few days ago, but I couldn't approach until those guards left." Her roving gaze suddenly returned to him. "Why did they?"

South kept himself steady as he said, "I noticed you hanging around, so I told them to take the night off. I have people." Did that sound too menacing? "You know, that... don't agree with Rhee."

She put a hand over her mouth, her eyes squeezing shut, tears welling at the corners.

"Are you alright?" South asked, alarmed.

After moment, she nodded, wiping at her face. "I'm sorry. For so long I wasn't sure. I didn't know if-"

She let out a shaky breath. Then her expression steeled, and she looked at him, looked into his eyes, making his heart skip.

"There are things happening in our country that you need to know about."

South listened as she told him all the Communists arrested in Taejon before the war began, about her husband, how he had been thrown in prison for protesting the 1948 elections, how when after the war had broken out and she'd heard prisoners were being released, she had followed him and a chain gang of men and women out of the city and into the hills of Taejon. How she had watched as the prisoners were made to dig their own graves, and how their bodies were shoved into them after.

That was... really morbid. But he guessed it made sense. Killing someone was hard enough- he couldn't imagine having to dig their grave, too.

"My In-guk was murdered," Kim Ok-ju said lowly, the words soaked in years-old grief that hadn't faded, and couldn't dull. "By Rhee's army."

South's throat felt thick, swollen. It took a couple tries to swallow.

"You're sure it wasn't N- the Communists that did it?" he asked, trying to sound steady.

Her hands balled on her thighs. "I know what I saw. The National Defense Army, our army, murdered my husband and thousands of other people. They rounded them up like cattle and buried them in the hills. The only Communists in Taejon when it happened were the ones in the graves."

She raised her eyes, her lips pressed flat. "And the Americans took photos of it."

A manila folder. Trees, houses, trucks, streets, church, soldier, grass. 'You're not going to find something that's not there.'

"Of course," South soothed, stomach churning uneasily. "I believe you."

"It's still happening," she said desperately. "People are disappearing, anyone who tried to speak out against the election, or stand up against the conscription. They killed my friend, Shin Du-su, for being in the Worker's Party! They cut him down in the street just for being a Communist."

She suddenly stopped, sitting bolt upright, her eyes darting around like a prey animal's. South froze, straining to hear what she had.

Some shift of fabric or the clink of a gun against a buckle. But there was nothing except the distant 'tu-da-da-da' of a helicopter.

Kim Ok-ju's voice came quieter as she curled up on herself, clutching at her breast with her hands. "I was so scared. Comrade Korea told you me it wasn't you, that we could trust you, but I was too scared to ever come. I was so scared I couldn't."

South's nails scraped at his legs. "You talked to North?" The name slipped out.

She nodded tearily. "I showed Comrade Korea the graves when it first happened."

South's lips twitched down. She didn't seem to notice.

"He told me after that you couldn't have known," she whispered. "B-But... I couldn't make myself try and meet you until now. But I knew I had to after- Mr. Shin was a good man." She raised her glimmering eyes to him. "He was kind. Even after what he went through, what Rhee's soldiers did to him, he never stopped looking after me, and everyone else. He got people food, he tried to help deserters from the army, he stood up for us. He was a good man, and he didn't deserve to die for it."

A good man. It must be nice to have someone think of you that way.

He could tell she really had spoken to his brother. His sickness was inside of her, that too-familiar fire swallowing her eyes. It was the way North had looked at him by the Raktong as he told him this exact same thing, and about the Hangang and Yeosu and Seoul. And Jeju. How he looked at him in the prison shack after March First. Like she was begging him to do something about it when it had already happened. Like there was anything he could even if it hadn't.

Kim Ok-ju's tears welled, catching the lamplight, illuminating her brown eyes and making her look human again.

"And neither did my In-guk," she rasped, and then her face crumpled in, and she started to sob, raw, gasping sounds that South knew came from the bottom of her lungs and hurt on their way out.

And despite that look in her eyes, despite knowing what she was, he found himself reaching out, wanting to comfort her, to hold her, and have her hold him.

Then the door burst open, kicked so hard it tore off its hinges, and his hand fell back to his side.

The curtain was torn down, heavy booted feet stomping in. Kim Ok-ju screamed, leaping up and away, smashing back into the wall of the small house with nowhere to hide.

As the officers surrounded them, guns drawn, her wide eyes flew to South, gleaming with fear, begging him to help, to do something he had no ability to do.

He looked away. Her face fell, hope shattering as she looked at him, saw him, and realized what was happening.

"No," she whispered the word, sounding more like a scared little girl than a grown woman.

"Hands in the air!" one of the men barked, his own on his gun, pointing it at the woman. "No sudden movements!"

"Her name is Kim Ok-ju," South said quietly, in case the police hadn't heard it from outside, still staring at the floor.

"Kim Ok-ju." The officer's voice filled the room. "You are under arrest for aiding and abetting a criminal."

"I-I didn't do anything!" she cried. "I d-d-didn't-!"

"You admitted to associating with Shin Du-su," he replied coolly. "A Northern agent responsible for multiple thefts of military property, harbouring known fugitives, and acts of insurrection and sabotage."

"He wasn't an agent!" she cried, and the fear drained from her eyes, replaced by that sickness again. "He was from the southern branch! He was my friend and you murdered him just like you murdered my husband!"

"Grab her."

He tossed his head at the other men, and they moved in, seizing the older woman by the arms.

"No!" she cried, twisting and thrashing like a cat, trying to scratch their eyes out. "No, please! Please! Korea!"

South didn't look up as she was dragged by him. He didn't need to see the expression on her face. He had seen it thirty-three years ago, from across the room as that corpse stared up at him from the floor of Seodaemun, gore smeared around the hole in its head. He had seen it three years ago, as a single eye glared at him, the other erased by a sea of blood.

Kim Ok-ju screamed, a desperate, terrified plea that cut short as something was slammed into her head with a 'crack.'

It was just something the police had to do. If they didn't, she'd keep screaming. And people were trying to sleep.

South stared at the dim light under the headscarf, the steady electric glow blurring before his eyes. As a truck engine rumbled outside, and silence fell again, another set of footsteps sounded behind him.

"Thank you for the assistance, Mr. Korea," a smooth, oily voice said. "It made it much easier to get a confession from her."

South inhaled, then climbed to his numb feet, smiling at Kim Chong-won. "Yeah, no problem."

He'd been nervous at first, when the man had came to him and said a suspected Communist sympathizer was apparently looking for him, and they needed his help to draw her out. But that had been easier than he'd thought.

"This was much more fruitful than we expected," the other man mused. "She was in close contact with an influential traitor. She's sure to know where the rest of his web is. At the very least, she will have names."

'What are you going to do to her?' South bit down on the question. He didn't want to know. And the woman was a criminal anyways.

"Glad to help," he said, dusting off his pants. He stopped short of saying 'Anytime.' Even if this had been easy, he hadn't exactly enjoyed it.

Kim Chong-won shifted his narrow eyes to him, consumed by black in the dim light. "Do you have any questions about her claims, Mr. Korea?"

South saw a truck rolling by in the dark streets, full of dirty grey uniforms. And those same eyes, meeting his in the shadows.

'They rounded them up like cattle and buried them in the hills. And the Americans took photos of it.'

"No," he said.

Kim Chong-won bored into him. "Are you sure?"

"She admitted that guy broke the law," South replied. "He just faced the punishment for it. It's not like public executions are illegal or anything."

No matter who Shin Du-su had been, he hadn't been a good man. He'd been a criminal, helping the Communists. And it wasn't like North would treat someone working for Rhee any different.

And he knew that wasn't what the colonel was really talking about.

"And she said she talked with North," he continued, hands in his suit pockets. "I bet he told her to say all that stuff about Taejon. And even if he didn't-"

He shrugged.

"They were prisoners for a reason. It wasn't like the army would've killed any people. Just Communists."

He hoped the man got what the joke meant. Kim Chong-won stared at him for a long moment. Then he seemed to, because his lips curved, and he picked up the lamp and removed the headscarf, flooding the room with light that seemed much brighter now, but still couldn't chase away the shadows.

For once, his smile almost reached the pits carved in his granite face.

"Then I think you should get home and rest, Mr. Korea." He examined the headscarf, then tucked it into his pocket. "The missus might like this."

He really was just a guy, with a house and a wife and a job, one that involved doing what he had to to keep the country safe. South wondered how he'd ever been afraid of him.

And he wondered if he asked in a friendly, conspiratorial way, 'Were you in Busan that day?' he'd chuckle, throw his hands up, and admit 'You got me.'

He didn't. It didn't really matter anymore.

He turned to leave.

"Mr. Korea."

For some reason, he still tensed, looking back.

"Your cloak."

South chuckled, taking the ugly fabric he'd given him earlier, draping it over his arm. "Thanks. And good luck with the talks."

The man dipped his head, voice loaded with meaning as he said, "There will be peace when it is time for peace."

Kim Chong-won wasn't in charge of Busan anymore, not after that court-martial he'd learned about a little while ago. There had been some trouble with some Reds being executed, and the man had almost gotten blamed for sending his guys to stop an investigation team from looking into it. But he was just doing his job, so even though some other men got punished for it, he'd been released.

South knew the hundred or so civilians hadn't been innocent. They were Communist sympathizers, helping North's guerrillas cause trouble in South Gyeongsang. And if you held hands with a Red long enough, it would stain yours.

Still... He was glad America hadn't told him until recently, after he'd hear the rumour at the nightclub. If he heard about it last December...

But he hadn't. And he knew Kim Chong-won was just doing what he had to so they could win. The court even agreed with him.

But while he was still a colonel, and with the police, he wasn't responsible for maintaining order in the port city. He probably shouldn't be here dealing with this when he had Panmunjon stuff to worry about.

South didn't bother questioning why he was. He just waved goodnight and left.

He felt eyes on his back as he walked away.

The open air was a relief. The sheets inside the house had made it feel stifling, not so much heatwise, but breathingwise. Even if South could still smell the stench of poverty out here- unwashed bodies and dried dung burned for fuel- at least he could take a full breath.

He wondered how small Kim Ok-ju's cell would be. If there would be windows.

The street was dark and silent, purposefully so. She had been screaming loud enough to echo over the neighbourhood. People had to have heard. But no lamps had been lit inside the gaping black windows, and no faces peered from them. No one had came to see if someone needed help.

South pictured the families inside, holding their breaths in the dark, eyes wide open, hoping it wasn't their door that was broken down next, the way him and North had used to when their jailors' voices would rise in the night.

He almost jumped as his guards melted out of the shadows where they'd been waiting, poised to protect him if the woman had been an assassin.

"I'm good," he said, holding up his hands to show he was uninjured. "America doesn't have to fire you."

None of them laughed. It really sucked when you were trying to figure out how to be funny for the socialites at the club when everyone around you had all the humour of his brother.

Actually, even North had used to snort at his jokes. That's how you knew it was bad.

With a twinge, South said, "I want to walk around a little before I go back. Is that okay?"

Kangwon's voice echoed in his mind. 'They're your guards.'

Exactly. And they were there to keep him safe. And since despite all the mop-up operations he'd been told about, there were clearly still Communists in Busan, even managing to sneak through the military checkpoints all the way from Taejon, he couldn't just order them to let him walk around aimlessly in the middle of the night if they thought it wasn't safe.

He didn't even have anything to do anyways. He just wanted to take a stroll until he was tired enough to forget about... what had just happened. It wasn't that important. He was just being a wimp.

He was already resigned to being denied, but then Smith actually said, "Acceptable."

South blinked, surprised, but pleased. He stopped himself from thanking them, though. They were his guards, so it wasn't like he had to be grateful they were letting him do something he wanted to do.

But he was glad. Even though he was so thirsty, when he thought about heading home to his small room, still unbearably hot, to sit in silence and pain while that cry resounded in his mind-

'Please! Korea!'

The night was nice. Cool enough that he wouldn't have sweat pouring into his burns and salt-curing them, but not so cold yet that he'd end up shivering. The only thing that would make it better was a drink.

"You don't have any alcohol on you, do you?" he asked the men with him, in Korean and English.

"No sir," came the answers.

South flushed, turning away from the judgment he saw on their faces, Gyeonggi's accusatory words flashing through his mind.

'You're becoming an alcoholic.'

He wasn't. It just felt better to be drunk than sober, which the province should sympathize with since he'd made such a big fuss over how much Seoul being burned hurt. And he needed a lot of alcohol now to reach that level of drunk. He didn't need to drink, he just needed to stop hurting. That's what he'd been trying to say when he'd shouted at them that he wasn't an alcoholic in front of everyone. It just hadn't came out right.

God, that night had been such a screw up.

South tried not to cringe at the memory as he headed off without purpose through the darkened streets, guards at his heels, and completely failed.

He knew he shouldn't have Commanded South Chungcheong to sing. He knew she'd hated it. The glare she'd given him after had said it clear enough. It had been worse than if she threw her actual knife at him.

But it was so aggravating, because he didn't know why he shouldn't have Commanded her, or why he'd had to in the first place. He didn't understand why the provinces didn't want to sing and dance, to eat good food and have fun, to be normal. He wanted it more than anything in the world, but all of them seemed perfectly happy to stay the way they were, to cling to the fucked up shapes life had hammered them into. Just like North.

He knew brainwashing was real. If it wasn't, how could they ever think like his brother?

He wasn't saying North had done it on purpose. He was just like that, able to convince you that suffering was the best option, that it was necessary, even when it wasn't.

Ribs cracked, eye swelled shut, just wanting to lie down and sleep, to stop hurting for once, please, and his brother looking even worse, a trickle of blood falling from his mouth with his words.

'Get up. One of the guards just left to file a report- this is our chance.'

South was sure North believed all of the Communist propaganda he brainwashed his people with, because he was brainwashed. He'd been brainwashed by Kim Il-sung and CCCP and the other commies he'd met, so he spread their lies on purpose. But he couldn't blame the other stuff on brainwashing. He'd been that way even back when it was just them, always wanting to get up and try again, even when they were both battered and bruised, trying to escape when he knew they couldn't, refusing to eat even when they finally had enough, exercising even when he...

And he knew it hadn't faded after he'd left because he'd turned down the seconds offered to them by peasants, or sometimes rejected meals altogether, and barely slept on their way across the country. Even when they had thought they were free, that they shouldn't have to suffer anymore, he had still been pushing himself to his limit.

It was like... like North enjoyed suffering. And he wanted them to suffer with him.

South had a flash of his brother, facedown on the floor, crooked jaw straining to get the words out through the mess of blood and saliva. 'I'll take his punishment, too.'

Okay, he... couldn't say that. He didn't want South to suffer. He'd never used to, anyway. It was more like he didn't think life should be enjoyed. It was probably why he liked the idea of Communism so much. A world of concrete blocs and grey clothes where everyone lined up for a bowl of rice a day probably sounded great to him.

It still didn't matter either way, but he didn't believe what Kangwon had said about it being nothing like that, about them still having music and dance and culture. They just had those things now so everyone would get tricked into thinking it wasn't that, then when there was only one Korea and no one had another choice, the government would take them all away. And North wouldn't do anything to stop them because he didn't care about stuff like that. South knew he'd never been as enamoured with the idea of the life in a palace they could have had as he was. He would be fine with a world without fun or feasts, a world where they threw themselves at every threat they saw until their bones shattered, even if they didn't need to.

South just wanted to save the provinces from that. He wanted them to learn that there was more to life than fighting, he wanted to teach them how to live, like America had done for him.

But none of them cared. They wanted to be hurt, to starve. Even the Gyeongsangs and Gyeonggi, who had actually been accepting the invitations to go out with him over these past few weeks, were only doing it to try and infect him with Communist ideas, trying to talk about politics even with the Commands, not taking to the dancefloor when anyone asked, and picking at their food, even though it had to have been better than anything they ate with North, or maybe even ever. Even if they weren't as bad as his brother, who had used to dramatically swallow every bite like it physically pained him, South could still see the reluctance whenever they sat down in front of the arrays of banchan, or juicy steak, or fancy cakes.

That wasn't right. When he had gotten out of Japan's clutches, he'd been elated with the first meal the Provisional Government gave him, and every other one after it. He had burst into tears with his first bite of pork, the only meat he'd ever had in his life, and inhaled the noodles so fast he'd thrown up, unused to anything heavier than rice or the occasional vegetable he'd been given a few years after North's bad behaviour was gone. And even though it was embarrassing, he hadn't even really minded because it meant he got another bowl.

And then he'd cried because he was finally seeing noodles in person, and his brother wasn't there to rub it in that his arms really were noodly.

But he'd still been so thrilled to finally have good food. He still was. He wanted the provinces to be, too. Yes, people were still starving. He knew that North Chungcheong was right, and that if he went up the crooked row of simple houses and knocked on the doors, he'd probably be able to find someone who hadn't eaten in a few days, maybe even a week like he'd claimed.

But why did that mean they should have to starve, too? If they had food, shouldn't they eat? It wasn't like depriving themselves filled anyone else's stomach. No one here could afford the type of food South got anyway. The ones that could were the ones that already had enough.

The provinces should be happy he was willing to share the money the government gave him, and the supplies America sent, and that he was willing to keep trying. He had every right not to when they'd been so ungrateful on his birthday, and on Liberation Day, too. They should be happy they got to eat rich food and drink expensive wine and listen to exotic music and dance. South Chungcheong should be happy that she'd got to sing for everyone, and that they loved her. She should be thrilled that people always asked him when she would be performing next, and that there were so many guys that told him they'd been disappointed she hadn't joined him on stage on Liberation Day.

But when he'd gathered the courage to pass on their compliments yesterday, she had just stared at the floor, then blankly asked if that was all.

He didn't get it. He loved performing for everyone. The look in their eyes as they were fixed on the stage, focused on him and no one else, and the way they clapped and cheered after was even better than when America would have him put on little shows for his old girlfriend. All the wealthiest, most powerful people in Busan, and even foreigners, all cheering for him, looking at him. Buying him drinks after and actually wanting to talk to him, to tell him he'd done a good job, and that they couldn't wait to hear him again with bright smiles.

He'd like to see North do that. He might be able to whip a crowd into mania the way he had on the radio, convincing them that dying was a good thing, but South could make people happy. And his brother was a terrible singer.

It had felt amazing, right up until he realized that the provinces were all staring at him with wide-open, bloodshot eyes, and that South Chungcheong was gone.

They had been the center of attention, they'd had the entire room fixated on them, receiving nothing but praise from the crowd, especially her, even though she wasn't actually that good at singing. And yet when she came back into the room, she had looked at him like she wanted to disintegrate him.

'If you do this, then you will never be my Korea.'

She had said it so seriously, her eyes trying to spear his soul, like she had never meant anything more. He'd been taking her to have a good time, and she'd been acting like he was walking her to the gallows. And after, when he had hurried back to the table, the others had all glared at him the way Hwanghae had, like he was supposed to know their bodies would take the Command so literally, or like they even cared what happened to South Chungcheong.

He had just wanted to take them out to have a good night, one good night in the middle of this stupid war their precious North had started, and it had just made them hate him more, like everything did. Couldn't they see he was trying? Couldn't they see he just wanted them to get to know him so it wouldn't be so hard when him and North became Korea? He just wanted them to like him, to finally be a family, the way they were supposed to.

'You believe setting us around a table and making us eat your foreign food will make us a family. It does not.'

It did. They were a family. He was Korea and they were Korea's provinces.

'You aren't our Korea.'

Gangwon had been so nervous the entire night, from the moment the got in the car, avoiding his eyes and chewing his nails down to the bloody quick, being as obedient and quiet as Jeju. But he'd still said something like that, forcing it out through his stutter and the Commands trying to stop him, because that was how much he hated South, how much their brothers had infected him during his time in the north.

South apparently couldn't even whip someone right.

They just didn't get it. He didn't want to replace North, he wanted to become him, and he wanted his brother to become him. They would be better that way- North would finally be able to have fun, to stop starving himself of it and everything else, and stop encouraging the provinces to, and- and South would know how to get along with them, to be confident, able to get them in line with a single word, make them behave without Commands.

He wasn't like Joseon, he didn't want to use them as concubines or send them off to the far corners of the country to only see them once a year for taxes. And he wasn't like North, treating them as nothing more than soldiers or- or tools. He just wanted a family. He wanted a home.

Warmth stung his eyes, little beads of it that burned in the crisp air, and he quickly wiped his arm across them.

'Dammit.' That kept happening, even when he felt fine. He'd have a great night, sing lots of songs, talk to lots of people, go back to the house stuffed with food and music and praise, and the tears would just start coming. He'd been blaming it on the alcohol, but he was far, far too sober now.

The ones he dashed away were just replaced by more liquid from his eternal well. He couldn't wipe them fast enough, and he could feel the pressure of a sob creeping up his throat. He knew he was too far away from the manor to make it before it broke free.

"Hey." He turned to his guards.

Ku Cheol-moo and Seok Ki-cheol had disappeared at some point, probably scouting ahead or something. Smith and Wesson's jewel-coloured eyes watched him impassively, watching always watching.

He tried to sound casual, but it came out way too choked as he asked, "Do you think I... could have a minute alone?"

He knew it was useless, but he didn't want to break down in front of them. He'd been doing so good, and he didn't want them to see him lose it again, to hear the whispers outside his door at night and have to wonder if they were talking about him, mocking him, saying he was a pathetic loser, that he wasn't man enough to deal with this, that he was still the same useless kid he'd always been and America shouldn't have left him alone. He already had their eyes on him almost every minute of every day, why did they have to be filled with silent disdain, too, judging him just like those windows?

He trembled, eyes burning, throat constricting around that sob, knowing he was about to burst into tears in front of some of the people he hated to most.

But then, amazingly, Smith and Wesson exchanged looks, and the former said, "Of course."

South blinked, his tears shocked back for a second. "...You mean it?"

Wesson gave him an unimpressed look from under his brows, and he flushed.

"I mean, yeah, obviously. Thank you." He didn't catch it in time. "So, I'm just going to... be over here?"

He took a hesitant step towards a nearby alley, looking back at them. They didn't move, and even though he waited for the other two to rush out of wherever they were and tell him it wasn't smart, they didn't.

He felt a tentative flicker of hope. Maybe now that America trusted him enough to leave him alone, he could get some time to himself, once and awhile.

And that would prove his guards were for his own safety and comfort, not just protecting his pal's investment.

"I won't go anywhere," he promised, before he ducked inside the alley.

It wasn't really a proper one, more of a small corridor between two leaning houses, two narrow for him to spread his arms out all the way between the cracked clay walls. But it let him put some distance between him and the men as he went most of the way down it, giving him some privacy.

South let out a shaky breath, a weight lifting off his shoulders at being out from under their eyes, even if the one inside him only got heavier by the second. He slumped to the ground under it, just remembering to put the cloak under him before he did. Then he hung his head between his knees, burying his face in his hands, and let the tears flow.

God, he was so pathetic. And so lonely.

Even going to the club almost every night, finally getting to chat with people, wasn't enough. It should be, but it wasn't, and he didn't know why. All the military officers, politicians, diplomats, and their wives were so nice to him, saying his singing voice was amazing, and he was so cute, and he was doing a good job fighting North (even if he wasn't really). Praising him and flirting with him and talking to him about things normal people talked about.

But they never asked him how he was doing, or if he was eating enough. And they never looked him in the eye.

Kangwon had. South Chungcheong had used to, even if it seemed like he'd got his wish that she wouldn't anymore.

Kim Ok-ju had.

South's nails dug into the edges of his face.

He shouldn't call her by her name. He bet she'd only called him by that one because she wanted something from him, just like that woman he'd disarmed in Pyongyang a lifetime ago.

'Please! Korea!'

He wasn't her Korea. North was. He'd heard it in her voice when she said his name, the way her lips hugged the vowels, and in the 'dongji' she tacked on, spoken so much more reverently than the 'nim' she used for South. She was a Communist, and she deserved whatever was coming to her. So had Shin Du-su, and whoever Kim Chong-won managed to get out of her. They all did.

So why did he still have to feel bad about it? Why could he still hear the desperation in her voice, see the betrayal in her eyes, even if he hadn't looked? Why did she sound like his brother had looked that night in the woods, even if all his voice had held was stunned fury?

'What the fuck, South?'

He wondered if she had thought he was a good person, before the police burst in. If any of the provinces ever would, if they knew about this, and everything else. And after what he'd done to Gangwon. If... If anyone would.

'I really don't think you're a bad person. But there's only so many bad choices you can make before that becomes who you are.'

He missed America. Even knowing he was selfish and cruel and domineering and- everything else. He was still his only friend, the only one that would tell him he'd had to do this, that it was for the best. He would have him smiling again with a few words, and he'd feel stupid for ever feeling bad at all, he knew it.

And he'd call him low or a chop or some other weird American slang for crying over someone who wouldn't cry over him.

He still missed him. He got that he should be happy that he was gone, that it got him farther away from Gangwon and what he knew about Red China, and meant he trusted him enough to leave. But why couldn't someone trust him enough to stay?

He wanted North, but he couldn't even wish he was here anymore. He hadn't been able to for awhile. He couldn't tell himself he would hold him and tell him everything would be okay the way he'd used to. He had taken another step over the line, and knew he would look at him the way that woman had, echoing her the way she echoed him. He might do worse.

It didn't stop him from reaching into the empty space inside of him and grabbing that cord in his hand, holding it tight.

It had pulled on Liberation Day, hard enough that it felt like something inside of him was in danger of being torn out of his chest, almost making him spill his drink on the Minister of Something-or-other that was congratulating him on Rhee's victory in the election, and it had happened again a few times since. But not for a few days.

He had almost wanted to pull back, he had, just because it was their day. But...

He didn't want North to misunderstand. He didn't want him to think he was asking him to come here or calling for him to save him. He was the one that needed saving, not South. He didn't want anything from his brother, other than for him to just give up already. And then to hold him, to forgive him, to Reunify with him. To understand.

More than anything, he still just wanted to hug him again, one last time, before they stopped being them.

But with every passing day, his hope for that faded. He knew North. If he had to give up, it was just going to make him even more stubborn where he could be. Especially if he knew about tonight, or if the provinces got to him.

Or America with those recordings.

Even when he was forced to give up the fight, he would fight South until the last. And the idea of that, that not only would he be on his own after, but that he wouldn't even be able to get one last embrace from his brother, even one he was fighting to escape...

He couldn't help the low sob that left him, tears pattering down into the shadows between his legs.

"Are you alright, mister?"

South yelped, fear shooting through him as he jolted sideways, bumping into the wall. His heart thundered wildly, prepared to be attacked by a Communist, someone who had seen what he'd done to Kim Ok-ju and came to-

But it was just a kid.

A little girl crouched in the alley a few feet away, barely visible in the dim moonlight that made it into the small space. She must have approached from the other end, and he just hadn't heard her over his wallowing.

'Jeez, good thing she wasn't a commie.' Or else he'd probably be red right about now. Like his throat, because...

Yeah, he wasn't going to use that one in the club.

"Hello?" the girl prompted. "Are you okay?"

South glanced at the mouth of the alleyway, waiting to see his guards come rushing in. But he guessed they hadn't heard him. He could hear the distant murmur of voices, Seok Ki-cheol's and a deep one he didn't recognize, probably a police officer who was wondering what they were doing out here, or something.

He really hoped they didn't tell him it was because their Countryhuman was over here crying in an alleyway.

"Uh, yeah," he said, his still-racing pulse bringing the stupid stutter back. "It's just kinda... been a long day."

It wasn't like he'd actually done anything but wait in the house for tonight, his nerves driving him up the walls. But he'd been doing a lot of pacing to try and forget how badly he needed a drink. Combined with the constant pain and hunger he felt from the stupid sympathetic reactions his body had, that was more than enough to exhaust him.

"Ohhhh." The girl nodded sagely. "There are twenty-four hours in a day. That's a whole lotta hours."

"Y-Yeah." South looked around, realizing that a creepy dark alley at midnight probably wasn't a normal place to find a very young girl. "What are you doing out here?"

"Huntin'," she chirped happily.

That was... kind of a scary answer. South nervously looked at her hands, wondering if she was a Red after all. But he didn't see any weapons in the tiny palms pressed flat to the ground. And she was small enough even he could probably take her in a fight. Definitely take her in a fight.

Not that he was thinking about beating up a kid. Just that he could. If he had to.

He squinted at the girl, trying to see her better in the dark. She was tiny and scruffy, with one of those hideous mushroom cuts that he really couldn't understand why mothers gave their daughters, but grown out past her ears. It was messy, like she hadn't brushed it today, or maybe in awhile. And the short kids' hanbok she was in looked like it had seen better days. The skirt draped over her knees, which were bowed out like a frog's, looked a little tattered, and he thought her jeogori didn't just appear grey because it was dark out.

"You looked real sad, mister," she said before he could say anything, sidling up to him with a little hopping motion. "What were you crying about?"

It looked like a couple of her baby teeth had fallen out, which made her voice come out even lispier than North Gyeongsang's. It was kind of cute, but it also reinforced to South that he had just been caught weeping in a back alley by a girl who probably didn't even know her Hanja yet. Or maybe even her Han'gul.

That wasn't embarrassing at all. Nope! And kids were famously known for being great secret keepers.

'Awesome.'

"I just..." South obviously couldn't tell her the real reason. "My friend left, and I... really miss him."

The girl blinked curiously. "Did he die?"

"No." Even if sometimes... "He just... left. And I wish he would come back." South slumped back onto the cloak. "Even if I shouldn't. I know he's the not greatest person, he's done some... bad things. He believes some bad things. But I still miss him. I wish he'd never left in the first place. And I don't..."

He hung his head between his knees again, ending in a mumble, "...Even know who I'm talking about."

He let out a shaky breath, feeling his throat swell shut.

'That's it, South- cry in front of the kid again, real cool.'

He rubbed a hand across his face, damp again, and finished dully, "I'm just upset."

Like usual, no matter how hard he tried.

"Would a blowjob make you feel better?"

South froze, not immediately comprehending what she'd said.

"Huh?" he said stupidly, looking up.

The girl blinked at him innocently. "Y'know- a blowjob." She opened her mouth and made a gesture with her little hand that made his stomach churn.

He knew what the English word meant. America had joked about

Grace giving him one before, and explained what it was when South asked (even though he had quickly realized he didn't actually want to know). He just couldn't reconcile that it had just came from a young girl that definitely shouldn't know what it meant.

He gaped at her, completely dumbstruck.

She pouted when he didn't answer. "C'mon, mister, don't be stingy. You're the Coun-try-hu-man, right? You can afford it. It's only, um..." She put a stubby finger to her lips, looking his suit up and down, then decided, "A thousand won. Or I'll take less if it's Yankee money, since it goes a li'l further."

She blinked her big, innocent eyes at him. "So do'ya want one?"

"Do I want-? No I don't want a blowjob!" South hissed, face red, looking around for someone more qualified to deal with this than him, which was literally anyone. "You're like, nine! Where are your parents?"

He reached for her instinctively, and she squeaked, hopping up and away.

"Not without paying!" she said, stomping her foot crossly.

"I said I don't want-"

But before he could finish, she was already taking off, back into the darkness of the alley.

"Hey, wait!" Without thinking, South jumped up, rushing after her.

He heard someone behind him, and only just had the presence of mind to shout, "I'm not running away, I'll be back!" before he had to focus all his attention on not faceplanting.

He chased the girl through narrow streets and alleys, weaving around trash heaps and startling awake the few people still sleeping outside while it was warm enough to, following her bobbing mushroom cut. He didn't know how long he ran for, but it couldn't have been too long because he was not fit enough for that.

She darted around a corner and he skidded around it with far less grace, almost smashing into a panel of wire fencing set between two houses. The girl was squirming through a small gap, tearing free just before he could catch her ankle. She scrambled up, not looking back as she kept running, stubby legs pumping.

"Wait!" South cried helplessly, falling to his knees like there was any chance of him fitting though the same hole. "I'm trying to help!"

She didn't answer, and in a few seconds, her footsteps faded into the night.

South frantically patted his pockets, finding the cash he'd had in the suit since the reinauguration party, tossing it through the hole. The coins scattered across the dirt, the crumpled bills tumbling alongside.

"I'm leaving money here for you!" he called, hoping she could still hear him, then slumped forward, forehead to his knees as he tried to catch his breath.

'Help.' And how was he supposed to do that? He didn't even know what he'd been planning on doing once he caught her. Adopt her? It wasn't like he knew how to take care of a kid. But maybe he could find someone else who would, or take her to an orphanage or- or anything that wasn't what she was doing.

'Do you know what I witnessed this night as I walked the streets? An American soldier paying a child in a brothel to have sexual intercourse with him.'

He'd thought South Chungcheong was being dramatic. Sixteen was one thing. It was still gross, but it was better. That girl had been an actual child. Who the fuck would actually-?

God, she really couldn't have been older than ten. She'd said that word so easily, and the shrewd look in her eyes as she set her price almost made him feel just as sick. Had she already...?

Did she really think he was the type of person that would say yes to that? Was that what people thought about him?

"Well, well, look who's out here slumming it with us beggars."

South jerked his head up at the deep voice, only to see a group of four men slinking out of the shadows, crowding around the mouth of the alley.

It wasn't his guards.

Immediately his pulse kicked up. The gang looked rough, their clothes worn and hair tangled like the girl's, but their bodies far more muscled. He knew from one look that he could not take them in a fight.

He also realized that he didn't know where he was. He'd only been paying attention to the girl in front of him, and hadn't even realized he'd ended up out on the fringes of the city, where the poor hanok transitioned to those shantytown huts, and the stench of livestock and poverty was even stronger.

"What's wrong?" the same man sneered, looming in the mouth of the alley, blocking his escape. "Cat bite your tongue?"

South swallowed, slowly standing up, trying not to appear too nervous, even though he very much was.

"Hey," he said casually. "Nope. I'm just out for a stroll."

"A stroll?" one of the others asked, looking around. He sounded out of breath, like he'd been running, too. "Like anyone wants to be out here."

"Yeah." South chuckled, hands clenching in his pockets. "I actually don't really want to be. I got a little lost. So if you don't mind..."

He sidled forward a little, the kind of pointed movement most people would have moved aside for.

The men didn't budge.

"Not so fast," the deep-voiced one, a guy with a dingy workshirt and a kerchief around his forehead, said, and South stopped, not wanting to get closer.

"I think since you came onto our turf, you should pay a toll, don't you?" the man asked.

"Yeah," another one, a burly guy that could probably crush South with one hand, agreed. "I mean, you don't gots to be here. We have no choice. It's only fair to pay up."

"Are you...?" South blinked. "Are you trying to rob me?"

"It doesn't have to be a robbery," the lead man said. "It can just be a toll. But if you don't want to pay..."

He pulled something from his pocket. Something that's sharp edge gleamed in the dim moonlight.

"It can easily become a robbery."

South's breath hitched.

He was lost, with no sign of his guards, and surrounded by four crazy people. Of course this would happen to him.

He tried to channel North, putting his shoulders back and straightening up, attempting to sound authoritative as he said, "You do realize who I am, right? You're seriously going to try stealing from your Countryhuman?"

But of course, if he was more like North, a lot of things would be different. The men didn't flinch.

"Who else has the riches to steal from nowadays?" the out-of-breath man said. He was twisting his sleeve at the cuff almost nervously as he looked around. "No point in stealing from anyone around here."

Dammit.

"I don't have any money," South tried, making the burly man snort.

"Right. You're tossing it around like chicken feed, but you're just as hard off as us in your leather shoes."

South glanced down at his dress shoes, then back at the money he'd scattered in the dirt. "That was all I had. You can keep it, but I r-really don't have anything else."

Sorry to that little girl, but he was the one that needed help now.

The fourth man finally spoke up, his eyes narrowed. "Typical fucking richie. More money than this entire neighborhood combined, but you act like you can't spare a single coin."

"I-I don't really-"

"You come down here into the fucking slums you and your goddamn pals put us in and act like it's a fucking sightseeing trip," the man growled, pushing past his buddies. "Then you go home to your mansions and pheasant. Well guess what- we can't fucking leave."

South cringed away, but the lead man dragged him back before he could reach him.

"That wasn't the deal, Kang," he muttered.

Kang bared his teeth at South, looking too much like his brother for his comfort, even with his dark complexion and square jaw.

"You do have something," the main man said. His gaze returned to South, giving him a calculating once-over like the girl had, but in a way that made him far more uncomfortable.

"Your clothes."

Fear trickled through South's insides like ice water as he suddenly remembered thrashing in that Japanese guard's grip, hot breath in his 'ear.'

'Now let's see how pretty you sing when we're alone.'

Please please please don't let that be where this was going, please.

"M-My clothes?" he stammered, dropping any attempt to pretend he wasn't afraid as he shrank back, arms wrapped around his chest.

"That fancy foreign suit costs more than most people would see in a year." The man jerked his chin at it. "And I haven't worn a pair of real shoes in months."

South's eyes flicked down to their feet. They all had cheap straw sandals on, except the angry man, who only had greased rags wrapped around them.

"Take them off."

He swallowed. "C-Can I not? I have more shoes at home, I could- I could take you there and give you all a pair."

"You have enough shoes to give away," the angry man growled. "And my family doesn't have even a single pair. Does that seem fair to you?"

It did, because most of them had been gifts, or bought on lent money. But he was smart enough to realize the man wouldn't like that answer.

"No," he said hurriedly. "And I'm sorry, but I don't really have anything to do with that."

"You don't have anything to do with it? You're in charge of the damn country!"

The burly man stopped him before he could go at him again, levering his own glare at South.

"Strip, boy."

South stood in place, shaking, highly aware of how trapped he was. He knew he couldn't make it past the four when even the short run had tired him out, and screaming in a neighbourhood like this could just draw out more people like them, if anyone came at all. He could try and cram himself through the wire fence, but it had been a tight fit for the girl, let alone a grown man. He knew they would catch him and drag him out. And when he thought about being on his stomach, back to them and trapped-

His chest tightened to the point he couldn't breath, his ribs creaking as he hugged himself tighter, wishing he could just crush himself into nothing.

"Take them off," the leader ordered in a low voice. "Or I will."

They were looking at him, but it didn't flush him with pleasure like it did when he was on stage. It just made him feel small and weak again, as he was forced to remember what it was like to be vulnerable.

An embarrassing whimper came from South's throat as he gave in, unbuttoning his suit jacket with shaking hands, sliding it over his shoulders and leaving him in his collared undershirt. He felt too cold and too hot, sweat soaking his underarms and neck, and shivers wracking his body as he held the black fabric out.

The nervous man snatched it, his own grimy hands quivering as he looked over his shoulder.

Where were his fucking guards? Wasn't this what they were for, stopping him for getting mugged and probably humiliating their entire nation while he was at it? They could stalk him every single moment of every single day but they couldn't even keep pace with him when he ran off the one time he needed them?

This was what he got for being a crybaby loser that couldn't just man up and go home. That woman had been a commie trying to trick him with his brother's lies, she deserved to be arrested, she deserved to die. But his stupid guilt that he shouldn't have been feeling had gotten him into this situation. And he was still too much of a weakling to get out of it.

North would. He'd killed over four hundred people in Seoul, practically on his own. He would turn these guys into bloody mist, for once something South wished he could do, too.

Who did they think they were? Just because they were poor, they thought they deserved his clothes? These had been gifts, and even if they hadn't been it wasn't his fault they couldn't afford them. Maybe if they worked overtime instead of prowling the streets looking for people to mug, they could.

South kicked his shoes off more aggressively than he needed, nails digging into his arms.

"Pants and belt, too," the burly man ordered, and his anger tempered with fear again.

"No," he said, still feeling defiant, and not wanting to be left in his underwear. "These are mine."

"Enough shoes to hand over four pairs, but only one pair of pants?" the angry one scoffed. "Right. Fucking drop 'em."

"I'm not giving you my pants," South insisted, even though the words had to fight to make it out.

Kang's eyes flashed. "You have everything in the fucking world, but giving away even one thing is too much for you. My sons are sleeping on the streets in fucking rags on empty stomachs while you waltz around in a Yankee suit that could feed them for months! Take off the fucking pants, Korea."

South's jaw clenched. To only be called that now, when he was being ordered to strip in a dingy alley in a slum-

"No."

Kang's face darkened, and he pulled his own blade from his pocket, longer and sharper than the first. "Then I'll cut you out of them."

"The deal-" his buddy tried.

"Fuck the deal!" Kang snarled, and lunged.

It was a familiar feeling, though one South hadn't experienced for years. But the old reaction came back like it had only been minutes. Under the threat of the large man barreling down on him, nowhere to go, he froze, small and afraid, and cried out a name.

'WHAM!'

Kang's body jerked sideways like he'd been shot with a cannon, his head slamming into the wall with an even worse sound than Kim Ok-ju's had made. Hope and fear surged within South, mingling together in an ecstatic, sickening cocktail, before he realized it was just his guards.

Ku Cheol-moo had bodyslammed the guy with full force, leaving him sprawled on the ground, unmoving, and Smith and Wesson moved in, guns drawn. South could hear Seok Ki-cheol on the street, ordering someone to go back inside.

"Stand down," the Korean guard barked, rubbing his shoulder.

The leader was staring at Kang with wide eyes, face pale. "You killed him."

"Stand down."

"You sai-"

"Now!" Ku Cheol-moo snarled, and the three beggars turned and ran, leaving South's clothes behind.

"Mr. Korea." Smith turned his gaze on him. "Are you alright?"

His green eyes were no warmer than usual, but for once the sight of them flooded South with relief. He couldn't help but reach out, clutching at his sleeve, tears in his eyes.

"I want to go home," he begged, and again as his hand was pried off. "I want to go home."

"Get dressed," Smith ordered. "We'll get you back to the manor."

That wasn't home. But it was the only place he had to go.

South couldn't look at Kang as he shakily put his dust-streaked clothes back on and shuffled out of the alley, fighting the urge to cling to the nearest uniform, keeping his hands trapped in his pockets instead. He couldn't look at the wide-open, vacant eyes above the twisted mouth, crooked teeth still bared even in death, or the hateful expression, like he was angry he had died before he could make sure South did, too.

It was far too familiar.

(And Dig Your Grave)

I didn't include the little girl for shock value, but because there are American anecdotes about the war where they talk about how prostitution was rife in Busan, and one specifically mentions a nine-year-old or so girl that he saw offering blowjobs. I'm using it to show explicitly just what happens when a government doesn't care about the masses, and the sheer level of the sexual violence Korean girls and women faced from American soldiers. These orphans grew up with no education or support, and had to do whatever they could to survive the war. And once it was over, with the Rhee government's lack of programs that would be considered 'Socialist,' like free education, housing, or healthcare, or the right to employment, they were left with no other option than to do the only thing they knew how to- service foreign soldiers. It's how tens of thousands of South Korean women ended up being raped and abused in the camptowns around American military bases afterwards, or essentially sex trafficked, marrying those soldiers so they could move to America. And many of the orphans that didn't fall through the cracks and have to resort to prostitution still ended up shipped out to foreign countries, sold to wealthy couples so they could feel like they were saving a 'poor heathen child,' cut off from their culture and taught to hate the people that had been fighting for their country's freedom.

This is about South's throwaway 'a hundred or so civilians were killed' comment. You might have heard of this as part of the larger Geochang Massacre.
In February 1951, a township called Sinwon in South Gyeongsang was suspected of supplying guerrillas in the South. Kim Chong-won had six hundred villagers rounded up at the local elementary school, performed screening to weed out friends and relatives of soldiers, then shot the rest, including children. One young boy that survived the firing squad reports that he had to help burn his mother's body before he was allowed to flee. They were buried in an unmarked grave, and the Southern government refused to acknowledge it. It was a direct operational order to deprive the Communist guerrillas of 'resources,' and that included people who could come to support them.

When an opposing assemblyman called for an investigation (privately, so it wouldn't be heard about overseas), they threw him in jail, and when an investigation team went to the town to investigate in April, they were ambushed by 'Communists,' according to Kim Chong-won. For their reputation, the Southern army was forced to court-martial him in December 1951, once the case got more attention. While it was proven that the 'Communists' were actually Kim Chong-won's men, and the government had to admit that around 180 civilians had been murdered by them as well, the assemblyman said the real number was up to the seven hundreds, with hundreds being fifteen or younger. The trial also only focused on this one specific part of Geochang County, not the other locations where massacres happened. And while several deputy ministers were forced to resign once it went international, the division commander that oversaw the massacre wasn't punished at all, and Kim Chong-won faced no real punishment. He was given only three years in prison, and granted amnesty by Rhee and released in less than a year, along with the others, and reinstated as a police officer (in this story, he was pardoned completely because America pulled strings, as he didn't want South seeing Mr. Totally-Didn't-Oversee-The-Massacre-of-Prisoners get jailed for overseeing the massacre of civilians, since back in 1951, that could still shake his loyalty). Though he wasn't at Panmunjom in real life, he did go on to become the national chief of police, and was a key part in Rhee's dictatorship.

Even after the war, villagers from Sinwon couldn't visit their families' graves for fear of being labelled Communists. They were also blocked from holding political positions as relatives of 'Reds.' After Rhee's fall from power, they finally went to set up gravestones. And then they confronted the town's wealthiest man, as he'd been the township representative at the time of the massacre, and was present for it. He was a Rhee informant who had sold out his own neighbours to die. When they tried to force an apology, he attempted to flee, so they burned him alive. The central government was furious to hear about this, as those from Rhee's liberal bloc that had kept their positions were afraid that they too would be made to pay for their crimes. But the police they sent to crush the Sinwon villagers were driven off. The civilians couldn't stand against them forever, so after a week they surrendered, but all took responsibility for the execution, demanding that either none of them were punished or all of them would be. And to avoid another scandal, none of them were, and an investigation was promised. The survivors formed a Bereaved Families Association to demand it , and get recompense. But soon after, Pak Chung-hee's administration arrested many of them for being 'anti-state.' They also destroyed the memorial the villagers had erected. For thirty more years they had to keep completely silent. It wasn't until 1996 that the names of all the victims they could identify were published. It wasn't decided that they could receive financial compensation until 2022. And it was only decided that they could.

This was only one of the townships during the Geochang Massacre, and doesn't even count Hamyang or Sancheong County, and all of the townships there.

Dog Eat Dog

South burst into the house, not even stopping to take his shoes off as he careened down the hall, past the kitchen. As badly as wanted a drink, he wanted something, needed it more.

He burst into the office, lurching for the telephone America had installed for him before he left. He tripped over his unsteady feet, and would've hit the ground if the desk hadn't been there. He went sprawling across it, the sob that had been building in his throat the entire way here finally tearing free as he fumbled for the handset in the dark. His fingers closed around the smooth plastic, and he gasped in relief, jamming his finger into the rotary dial, trying to remember the turns he needed as he spun it blindly, the number he'd memorized burning inside him.

He cried out half in frustration and half in another sob as he screwed it up like he screwed everything up, and had to restart. When he finally got it, he slammed the receiver to his 'ear,' hearing the click as the operator automatically connected him to the one number this phone was for, and the hollow dial tone ring, ring, ring.

"Come on," he begged, eyes burning. "Please pick up."

He had to. He had to because if he didn't, South didn't know if he could keep himself from pulling on that cord, no matter what North thought it meant. He wasn't strong enough not to, and he knew he wasn't because even after everything, as that man had closed in, his first instinct had been to cry out, not for his guards or America, but for his brother.

'Ring ring ring.'

If North had heard him, would he have came? Would he have protected him? Or would he have agreed with that angry man that looked and sounded so much like him, that he deserved to be punished for having more shoes than he could wear while others had none?

'He said you were kind.' Would he still? Would he still think South was worthy of protection?

He shouldn't have to question it, he was his brother and he'd never had to question it in the shack, that North would always protect him, that he'd always take his punishments for him and give him his meals and watch out for him while he slept, and he shouldn't have to now.

He hadn't done anything. That commie had deserved to be punished, just like Gangwon did, that guy in Seodaemun had to die for North to live, Seoul had to burn, his brother had needed a warning to stop sending his guerrillas across the Parallel, and he'd just wanted South Chungcheong to smile. He hadn't done anything except for what was necessary, what he had to do to survive, for them to survive.

'Ring ring ring.'

North shouldn't hate him, he couldn't. He was his brother. But all those sights and sounds crowded his mind, trying to convince him he was wrong, voices speaking over each other, overlapping until his head was filled with a raucous clamour and he felt like he was going to scream.

Whispered, broken screams, the lash of a whip, then closer, vibrating up his own arm, choking cries, hateful eyes; 'Take care of my brother.'; 'If you do this, you will never be my Korea,' 'You and Japan are on the same side,'; 'I'm up for anything,'; rats in cages; 'Orders, sir?'; 'Kill them;' Gyeonggi's screams ringing off the walls, smoke and charred meat thick in the air; slurring, whisky on his tongue and buzzing in his brain, the words falling out, 'I know something that'll teach him his lesson,' blood on the knife, on his hands, on his brother, enough blood to drown them both and it wouldn't come off; 'I'm sorry!' 'If you were sorry, you wouldn't'a done it'; 'Burn it.'

'Please! Korea!'

South's eyes squeezed shut, holding that cord tight in his heart. 'Please.'

'I really don't think you're a bad person. But there's only so many bad choices you can make before-'

The phone clicked, and that obnoxious voice he missed so much drawled, "Yello?"

For a moment, South couldn't speak. He wanted to cry, wanted to beg America to come back, to not leave him alone like everyone else had, demand to know why he had when he'd promised he wouldn't.

But he knew he couldn't. He had to prove he could do this. And America couldn't come back. Stupid elections, stupid Grace, stupid China.

So instead he rasped, raw and desperate, "Am I a good person?"

America didn't question who was calling. Who else would call him at whatever hour it was there, tears in his voice?

"'Course you are Southie. Why wouldn't you be?"

"I-" He bowed his head under the onslaught of memories, crushing his face into the unforgiving surface of the desk. "I just feel like I mess everything up."

"Aw, c'mon, kid." He heard a creak as America sat down. "You don't mess everything up. And everyone makes a few mistakes, even me, probably, once in a blue moon. You don't think I'm a bad person, do you?"

South couldn't let himself hesitate before he answered, "No," the word falling flatly into the phone line between them.

"Exactly," his friend said, satisfied. "You know I'm a great guy, and I think you're a good kid. So that means you are."

He'd known he would say that, he had wanted to hear it so badly. But it didn't make him feel as good as he'd thought it would.

"You shouldn't beat yourself up with questions like that, Southie," America chided from across the sea, still with a slight twang. "Do'ya think someone like North ever spins out over whether or not he's a good person?"

"No," South muttered.

With all the blood on his hands, he should. But he knew his brother didn't care about stuff like that. He never had.

'How did it feel?'

Eyes fixed on the blood on the stones, knuckles whitening even further around the windowsill, like he was already thinking about killing again. 'Good.'

South was the only one that did. He was the only one that had to be plagued with this stupid, terrible feeling that lodged inside him like a burr. He didn't feel guilty about Gangwon anymore, so why should he have felt guilty about a woman who the only thing he'd done to was offer her a place to sit, and let her spew her commie talk at him? He hadn't been the one to arrest her. He bet North wouldn't have even felt anything if she'd been a Rhee supporter that he killed. He didn't feel guilt, just like Japan.

South wondered if he'd ever even felt truly guilty for leaving him.

"Exactamundo. And I'd hope you know you're at least better than him."

He was. He'd thought it before, hadn't he? South had always been the good one, the one that didn't want them to get hurt, that didn't like killing or fighting, the one that hadn't started this war. He was the one that never would have left his brother, no matter what 'more important things' there were. He didn't have more important things.

"I know," he said quietly. "Do you... Do you ever worry about stuff like that?"

"Nope," America answered with confidence. "'Cuz I know I am. And I know you are, Southie. I told you- you're one of the good ones."

South nodded, forgetting he couldn't see him. "Yeah," he whispered, the reek of cigar smoke and blood in his 'nose.'

"What made you wanna call me up and ask that in the middle of the night to ask something like that?" his friend asked. "It's gotta be what- oh-one hundred over there?"

The Korean hesitated, then reluctantly told the other man about what had happened, from luring out Kim Ok-ju to being cornered by the men.

He fiddled anxiously with the telephone cord after.

He hadn't told America about what he had been asked to do, because he'd been hoping he could pull it off, then tell him about it casually the next day, like it was no big deal, and prove he really could be trusted to handle things.

'Did a great job at that, didn't you, South?'

'Die.'

"I'm sorry I didn't tell you about it," he blurted when America didn't respond right away. "I just-"

"It's hep, kid," his friend soothed. "Your boys told me about the plan beforehand. I'm the one that gave the go-ahead."

Of course. 'His' guards.

"But I'm gonna be honest- I don't really see why any'a that would make you flip your lid about you being a bad person," he continued. "Sounds like you did a great job with the commie broad, and you aren't the one going around making guys strip at knifepoint. And it's not like you took jailbait up on her offer."

South had flushed at being praised for the... sting operation? Was that what Kim Chong-won had called it? But he winced at the last part.

He hadn't told his friend exactly what the little girl had offered. It made him too uncomfortable, and he didn't want to think about her, where she was now, or if there were more girls out there, doing what she was. If there were American soldiers paying for it. Or his. Rhee's.

"And it's not like she was being held in a brothel," his friend continued. "There isn't anywhere for you to storm into all heroically and shut it down. She's making her own choices."

'Do you think that sixteen-year-old child wants to sell herself? Or do you think she must?'

"The only thing you could'a done would be arrest her," America said. "And I think she's better off on the streets than she is in a jail cell, don't you? At least she can get some clams for it out there." He didn't wait for an answer. "You tried to give her cash without expecting anything in return, which is probably more than any other fella would've given her. Well-"

He cut himself off. "Bad joke. Anywho, you did what you could. Hell, you even offered to hand out free shoes to the bastards mugging you. Even if that would'a been plum stupid, and way more than they deserved, it still proves you've got a good heart."

Yeah, it did. He bet North wouldn't have been so nice. Even though he liked poor people, it wasn't like he'd accept them trying to rob him. He would've beat them up. And he bet America would have killed them.

And he had done everything he could for the girl. He'd even left the money in the dirt, just in case. She probably was selling herself because she 'must,' but that wasn't his fault. Private prostitution might be legal, but not for girls that young. There wasn't any law he could change to stop her because she clearly didn't care about the ones that already existed. And nothing like what South Chungcheong had claimed was happening to female commie POWs was happening to her. She was making her own choices, even if they were awful, even if she was only making them because she had to.

Sometimes that was just what you had to do to survive.

"If you ask me," America said in his 'ear.' "The real bad guy here is poverty."

"Yeah?" South mumbled, still with his forehead pressed to the desk, like he could contain his thoughts that way.

"Yep." There was a thumping sound, and the Korean knew his friend well enough to now he was kicking his heels up on his desk. "It makes folks do crazy things. Robbing your own Countryhuman?" There was a disapproving headshake in his voice. "Would never happen over here, let me tell ya that."

It shouldn't have happened here, no matter how poor someone was. The punishments for committing a crime against a Countryhuman were even harsher than the normal ones. Since they still had the same penal code Japan had, harming South was considered high treason. Even if the one guy hadn't been spewing things that sounded suspiciously Red, even just attempting to steal from him could be punishable by execution.

He hadn't read the entire code because it was too long. But he'd read the parts that had to deal with him and North, back when he'd still had hope they could talk things out. He'd felt so safe reading that section, knowing that him and his brother would have that kind of protection, that for once the people that would be punished would be the ones hurting them.

He guessed he shouldn't really be surprised someone had broken it. It had never stopped Japan, after all.

"Lying, cheating, stealing, whoring, murder," America listed jovially. "There's nothing people won't stoop to if they're desperate enough. And poverty, she's the great desperation-maker."

'My sons are sleeping on the goddamn streets in fucking rags on empty stomachs!'

Yeah, that was what he'd seen in that guy's wild eyes, the same thing he'd seen in North's those last years as he threw himself at their guards, the determination eroding away like rock, replaced by that sharper, rawer thing- desperation.

"That's why Communism will never work," his friend said casually. "North and Red China, and CCCP, even if all their big talk about peace and paradise and equality was true, it'll never happen. They want to create a world where everyone's a have-not. A world where everyone is like those men."

South shuddered, drawing closer to the desk, even though it pressed into his burnt stomach.

"But humans aren't wired for that," America told him."They're greedy, selfish, and when it comes down to it, they only care about themselves. You can't even blame 'em for it- it's just their nature."

South didn't care if it was in their nature, he could and would blame them for trying to rob him.

"Even the hoity-toity commies that think they're better than that break when they're put to the line. When it comes to them or someone else, they'll always choose themselves." America asked, "Wouldn't you?"

He would, he guessed. Unless it came to North.

Then again... If they couldn't Reunify mutually, it was him or North, wasn't it? One of them would come out on top in Korea. And he couldn't let it be North.

But it wasn't like he was choosing himself over his brother. There wouldn't be any reason for South to exist without North. He just wanted Korea to be someone that could actually enjoy life, for both their sake's.

And it wasn't like North hadn't already chosen something over him. And it hadn't even been himself.

"Yeah," South said quietly. "I... would."

"See? If even a good guy like you would, anyone would," America said confidently. "That's the problemo- the commies want a world where everyone's just as poor as them. And that'll lead to a world chock full'a people who are just as savage as them, willing to do whatever it takes to have just a little more than their neighbours."

A world where you couldn't walk the streets without someone trying to shake you down for your money or steal the clothes off your back, or run into a kid offering blowjobs for food or jewellery or whatever would become valuable once his brother eliminated money like he wanted to.

South knew North would never want a world like that, even if he'd be happy with cement blocs and gruel. But he also knew he had never been able to see that escaping the prison shack was hopeless. If he didn't want to see something, then he wouldn't.

"Humans are animals, South," his friend said, his voice dipping low. "Money just gives them the opportunity to pretend they're not. To wear Balenciaga instead of pelts, and eat caviar instead of flesh. And if you take that away..."

Then all you had was a world of beasts.

"That's why we're fighting to keep everybody capitalist." He lightened again, and there was a drumming, heels on a desk probably, shoes on, of course. "We want everyone to be able to get rich and pretend they're better than monkeys. There'll always be one or two with sticky fingers, a'course, that's just the way humans are. But in a world of havers, there's a lot less uncivilized riff-raff." He lost his twang for an exaggerated, slightly mocking British accent on the last words, then returned to it. "Just look at your country versus mine."

South could hear North's voice in his head, one of the thousand things he'd babbled about after Liberation, after he had asked why they didn't like capitalism (after asking what capitalism was), if it made people rich (one of the few things he'd absorbed from his explanation). South had known a few wealthy people from their country in China, and they were the only reason he never had to struggle for food or anything during the war.

He'd said something like, 'Because it doesn't make people rich- the labour of the masses does. It's impossible for everyone to be a capitalist- the only way they can accumulate capital is through the labour of others. And everyone else, the people that do the work, gets left behind.'

His brother could believe the kind of drastic change Communism needed was possible, that the world could function without money or... whatever else Communism involved, that people would be perfectly happy to be poor and would all get along, but he couldn't imagine that it was possible for everyone to get rich in the system countries like America already had working fine. South thought he just wanted to be right.

"In the future, the only folks that'll still be poor in Korea will be the ones that choose to be, 'cuz they're too lazy to work, just like over here. And, well-" There was an audible shrug in America's voice. "They deserve it then I say, I say."

"Yeah," South said, his thoughts about those men committing crimes when they could be working coming back. "They will."

"And when it comes to that Red dame-"

"I don't regret that," South said quickly. "She was a Communist. She deserved it, too."

She had only came looking for him, only looked him in the eyes, because she wanted him to do something for her. And she just proved America's point. In the end, as she was dragged away, she'd betrayed her morals, calling out for him to save her when her brother was the one she really saw as Korea.

Desperation made people vicious, willing to do anything, and poverty made people desperate. South could never agree with a system that reduced everyone to that, made them no better than animals. And anyone that did, whether they were dangerous or just dangerously stupid, had to be put down. He had accepted that part a long time ago.

A couple rats could empty out a granary in no time, and leave everyone to starve. The only solution was to shoot them dead.

"Then let me hear ya say it, kid."

Knowing the volume he wanted, South drew in a breath, then announced loudly to the empty office, empty house, "I'M A GOOD PERSON."

Ack. It was still a little embarrassing.

"That's'a boy," America praised. "Then let's just hope they catch the guys what done that to ya."

"Mr. Smith said he has people looking for them," South muttered, warmth in his cheeks fading.

He almost hoped they didn't find them. What if they did, then they had to go to court or something, and he had to show up and recount the embarrassing story to a jury? The commie press would have a field day if they heard, and he could honestly see some people thinking it was so humiliating that they wished North was their Countryhuman instead. If they did catch them, he hoped they just shot them.

"And one of them died."

He'd asked what would happen with the man, worried that he might get blamed for it somehow. Ku Cheol-moo had just smirked.

'There's plenty more trash on the streets. No one cares when some gets cleaned up.'

"Don't feel too bad, kid," America said flippantly. "Some people just don't know how to show a little restraint. You reap what you sow and whatnot."

He had felt a little bad, since the guy had said he had kids at home. Well, 'home.' But if he hadn't wanted to make them fatherless, then maybe he shouldn't have been going around threatening people with knives. Hopefully they at least still had a mother. And that she was smarter than her husband.

"For what it's worth- and that's a whole lot- I think you did good tonight." The words made South heat up. "A little embarrassing you had to put on half a striptease, but hey- you win some, you lose some. And at least you won the commie. Not too shabby for your first special op."

It wasn't, was it? He had succeeded.

'Please-!'

And it was good that he had.

South straightened slightly smugly, still leaning over the desk.

"And the little snags after, well, they wouldn't be happening if North hadn't started this war."

South sobered, eyes downcasting in the dark.

"Your going-away present didn't work."

He flinched, realizing that could sound like he was blaming America. But his friend sounded unbothered as he said, "I think we both had an inkling it wasn't gonna."

Yeah. Just like he had known bombing the Supung Dam again wouldn't, after he'd heard about it last week. And sure enough, the Reds still hadn't surrendered, only pushed harder for America's negotiators to stop taking recesses.

And China was still here.

"But don't worry, kid- winter's coming. And according to you, that sets our chances of getting a surrender up by at least ten percent."

South didn't know about percentages. All he knew was that if his brother was going to give up, he wouldn't be doing it in summer. He only had in the past because the season had been drawing to a close, fall threatening to start creeping through the cracks in the shack again. And he knew that now only the dark cold of winter could force a surrender.

His nails scratched against the desktop. He swallowed, breathing in deep, then silently exhaled.

"You'll have to do something big."

He didn't need plausible deniability. This was war. They were only talking about things they needed to.

Even if North might think differently.

"Don't you worry your spherical little cranium about that," America assured him, his smirk leeching across the wires. "I've got something planned for next week, a little b-day present for Red China. And if that doesn't work, well..." He laughed, low and gleeful. "Let's just say they'll both regret being so stubborn."

South's stomach churned uneasily. His tongue felt like sandpaper, parched and cracked.

"Good," he said, the word coming out almost as confident as he'd wanted. "Thanks."

"Anything for you, Southie."

South's grip relaxed on the phone, tendons aching from clutching it so tight for so long.

America hadn't forgotten about him, he wasn't losing interest. Distance hadn't made him stop caring for him, even if his care was... the way it was.

He hadn't abandoned him. That was what mattered.

He wasn't his brother.

There was a sound in the background, another voice saying something in a similar twang to America's.

"Yeah, babe, be right there," his friend said, muffled, then clear again. "I've gotta go, kid."

"Yeah, no problem. Thanks for picking up." South rubbed his arm. "It really... means a lot."

"I told you you could always call. Oh and by the way, next time I'm there, remind me to teach you how to shoot."

"Sh-Shoot?" South stammered, squeezing the phone again.

"Yeah, a man needs to know how to use a firearm. It might stop you from getting caught up in any more jams like tonight, too."

North had tried to teach him how to use a gun, briefly. But every time South had tried to hold the sleek, deadly pistol...

Eyes wide and terrified as they looked up at him. 'Please don't.'

'BANG.'

His brother had seen it. He had known why he shook so badly, even if he didn't say anything. He said South could learn later, and he would protect him until then.

And then he'd left again, leaving him defenseless. Just like back then.

But he knew America wouldn't accept waiting. If he wanted him to learn to shoot, he would be learning to shoot.

"Yeah," he said, hoping his friend could hear the smile he tried to put in his voice. "Looking forward to it."

He guessed it could be useful. Even if he planned on never going anywhere except the nightclub until the war was over. And if he did, his guards would be coming with him. Alone time wasn't worth getting mugged for, or worse.

"Do you know when it will be?" He tried to sound casual, but America saw right through him.

"Getting lonely?" he asked knowingly.

South flushed in shame. "No," he said, unconvincingly.

His friend chuckled. "It's fine, kid. I'd miss me, too. Hell, I'd be offended if ya didn't."

"Rhee's been elected," he said hopefully, trying not to sound like he was whining. "It's been more than ten to fifteen business days."

"Yeah, but my elections aren't over," America said regretfully. "I'm nonexistent-ears-deep in politicking here, kid. Trust me, I'd love a vacay, but I'm booked up 'til November 4th. And then a few more weeks to get things in order with the new guy."

"Who's going to win?" South asked hesitantly.

"Asking for insider trading, Southie?" he teased. "I'm sorry to say, but since I don't have your Rhee over here, I won't know who's gonna come out on top until they do."

South laughed, throttling the phone. "Yeah, I guess that's true."

"But you heard MacArthur is out?"

"Oh, really?"

"Yep, around the same time I left your place." America clicked his tongue. "Didn't do so well at the Republican National Convention. Old hoss came almost dead last for nominations. His speech wasn't too popular."

South remembered the droning, too-long speech in Seoul, as black smoke eddied in the skies, and gunshots echoed over the city.

Yeah, he could believe that.

"But hey, what can ya do?" America asked, sighing. "Dougie's a uniform at heart, not a suit. Ike'll be more comfortable in office."

South didn't know if he should be relieved or not. MacArthur had made him uneasy right up until the last, and the idea of him in charge of America's atom bombs was... scary. He didn't exactly want a nuclear belt dividing the country in half even more. Or the damage that would come once they were Reunified. And he definitely didn't want America going to war with China until this war was over and Korea was one.

But at least he knew MacArthur would keep fighting.

He was tired, he should just go drink until he could blackout and rest. But instead he said, "They're- My politicians are saying... some of your candidates are saying they're going to end the war here."

He bit his lip, heart pounding.

"They will," America said, making it stop. "And that's a good thing, isn't it, Southie? We're the ones that want peace. It's the Reds dragging this out by being stubborn."

South paused, then relaxed.

"Yeah," he said. "Right."

"I'll be by in December, around Christmas, if they still are," America moved on. "Little sooner if my next present shows quick results." His tone grew more serious. "But South, if it doesn't, no matter who takes office, I promise we will end this war. I will bring peace to Korea."

Peace, when it was time for peace.

And it would only be time when North was on his knees.

"I know," he assured. "I trust you."

He trusted that he would never let Korea go.

"And I trust you, kid." His pal's tone returned to normal. "By the by, you having any luck with those provinces of yours?"

"Yeah," South said. "They're coming along great."

They would, someday. The Gyeongsangs and Gyeonggi might be trying to get to him when they came to the club with him, but he could try and get to them, too. And South Chungcheong hadn't glared at him on Liberation Day, or even when Rhee got sworn in again. She'd just kept her eyes down. She had said he would never be her Korea, but he would be. Just like him, she had no choice.

And neither did the northern provinces. America would win, South would give them their punishments, better than he'd given Gangwon, and once they were broken of his brother's brainwashing, they would be a family.

He was a good person, better than North, better than America and Rhee and Kim Chong-won. And they would see that. Kangwon would see that no matter what choices he made, South still had a good heart.

"That's keen," America said, and a chair scraped back as he stood. "Oh, and by the way, Southie- you want to talk to North?"

South froze. The words had been so casual, like he was asking him if he wanted him to bring applejack next time he visited, instead of speak to the brother whose voice he hadn't heard in person in two years and a month.

"You would... let me do that?" he ventured, wondering if this was some sort of test.

"I haven't been stopping you," America said, sounding surprised. "I just said it was probably best if you didn't, and you agreed. You've gotta remember I'm not in control of you anymore, South."

No. Just his army.

'They herded them like cattle.'

'They herded the Communists like cattle,' he corrected. And it wouldn't have had to happen if North hadn't started this war and stained them Red.

"It wouldn't be face to face," his friend explained. "Not when we can't trust our Northern pal not to try anything."

South thought of the look in his eye by the Raktong, like he was thinking about knocking him out and kidnapping him.

He didn't think he would decide against it this time.

"Yeah, definitely not," he said, rubbing his arm.

"But the Reds have been a real thorn in the side about you two having a chat, so I'd like to throw 'em a phone call to get them and our birdy friend to shut up. You up for that, cool cat?"

A talk with North, hearing his brother's voice again, not spewing fire and brimstone to a crowd on the radio, but talking to him.

The cord throbbed inside the aching emptiness inside him, yearning, and he plucked it, just lightly enough that he could feel where North was. The vibrations quivered along it, running northwest.

"...Not yet," he said, pulling away from the feeling. "I'm not..."

He trailed off, ashamed.

"It's fine, kid," America sympathetically reassured him. "I told you I get how much influence he has over you."

"I wouldn't-"

"And we both know how persuasive he can be."

South looked down into the dark at his feet, a void he couldn't see the bottom of.

'Get up, South. We need to get out of here, we need to try again, no matter how much it hurts. We need to be free.'

Yeah. He knew.

"Let's wait until after your... present," he said, trying to sound like the idea of talking to his brother didn't make him roil with equal amounts of nerves and excitement. "Once he's been hit by whatever, maybe I can convince him to surrender."

'Please just give up. Please. For me.'

He could be persuasive, too, even if it was only when it came to his brother.

"Good idea. I've always said you were a smart one."

America's tone said he'd ruffle his head if he was here, and by the ache he felt, South knew he would have to practice steeling himself for when he heard North's voice, but couldn't touch him.

There was another person in the background of the call again, and his friend called back.

"Okay, kid, that's my call to leave for real. Lunch is on, sloppy joes." He audibly rubbed his hands together, though South had no idea how he did it when he should be holding the handset.

He also didn't know who Joes was, or why he was sloppy. He didn't want to think about the word 'sloppy' in relation to lunch at all, actually.

But he still said, "Enjoy it."

"Enjoy your late-nightcap," America returned, predicting him with ease. "Have a glass for me."

South's lips thinned, but he easily assured him he would. Then he was left holding a dead line in a dark office.

He didn't know how long he stood there for, listening to the hollow drone of the disconnect while the connection inside him ached. It couldn't have been long. He was too thirsty.

Eventually he put it down. There was only silence after the 'snick.' An endless, empty silence.

He would be able to talk to North soon. In a week and four days, at the least, he would be able to...

He didn't know. Try and convince him that freedom wasn't worth suffering for, that they could have it even with America here, that this war had gone on for too long already and couldn't go on for another year, let alone a thousand. To tell him it wouldn't be so bad, being Korea with more of him, that he would take them to clubs and parties, eat good food and wear nice clothes, and be happy, the way they were meant to be. To make him give up, and hope that this time it stuck.

To show them both he was still a good person, and maybe, just maybe, hear him say that he knew that, and that everything was going to be okay.

North had never came back for him, never even tried. He had left South alone, at Japan's mercy, and gone on to eat songpyeon and celebrate holidays, to see the country and all the sights they'd once talked about seeing together, to get drunk and laugh, all without even knowing if his brother was alive or dead.

He had built a family without him, one he didn't even appreciate.

South wasn't like that. He was the good Korea, he was the good person, and he wouldn't leave his brother to suffer under Communism. He wouldn't let him be just another animal in a world full of them.

North had never come back to save him. But South would save his brother.

—

America dropped the phone back onto the hook, smirking. He took one last drag on his cigar, puffing the smoke rings at the high vaulted ceiling of his private Washington residence, smaller than the White House obviously, but no less ritsy.

Ten, eleven, twelve-

Gah, no dice. Still stuck on twelve. But it didn't kill his mood- he wouldn't be stuck for much longer.

He stretched in celebration, cracking his spine. God, it was still nice to have a ceiling he didn't bump his head on standing up. He got that gooks were short, but they seriously had to start building stuff with taller people in mind if they wanted to draw in business. And he knew South did want to draw in business. He would, too- America had big plans for Korea, plans he knew his Southie would be more than appreciative of.

After all, he got how important it was to get rich quick.

America grinned, stubbing his cigar out and following the scent of cooked beef to the spacious dining room.

That little girl had been a stroke of luck, the cherry on top of the sundae he hadn't even known they'd been looking for, hammering the point in even deeper- humans were dogs. They'd do anything they were told to for money, roll over, bend over, tear someone's throat out with their teeth. It was why you couldn't trust the unwashed masses, and at the heart of why you couldn't trust commies. They were heathens that were disobedient enough (and stupid enough) to show their fangs at the hand that fed, instead of the mutts in the ring with 'em. They thought they could climb right out of it without earning the right.

But the only way you got out of the pit was with cold hard cash, and climbing over the bodies of your fellow hounds. America had grasped that truth at the tender young age of around a century, when he realized that all of the crops and ores leaving his ports were making British business owners richer, which gave the old man the ability to open more ventures, settle and control more countries, and demand even more from his. If he ever wanted to be in control, he had to be the one that controlled the moolah.

It was cliché, but it was the truth of the world- money was power. And humans would do anything for power.

The commies always said he hated poor people, but that just wasn't true. He loved 'em! The world couldn't go round without them. After all, who else would do anything you asked in exchange for just enough greenbacks to buy a bag of rice?

Sometimes you didn't even have to pay them. The rice itself would do just fine.

America grinned, circling his arm around the waist of the little dish plating up his lunch, sweeping aside her freshly-dyed blonde hair to plant a kiss on her rosy cheek. She wasn't quite as much of a looker as Gracie had been, but she wasn't half bad. And her brand of kooky was a little less 'loaded gun in the night.' Plus her gams went on for days.

He was sure he could get a Korea that made a great businessman. Southie was making good progress, but he wasn't quite enough. He didn't see him ever being the type to sit through a board meeting and make layoffs or cutthroat financial decisions. But once he got a bit of decommified North in him, that ruthlessness would serve well.

And South would make sure it served who it was supposed to.

America took his seat at the grand table, in front of his dish and across from his other one, who giggled coquettishly and said she wasn't hungry when he asked where her plate was.

He'd been fooling around with her long enough to know she was a poor liar. He had no idea how she actually managed to convince her mom she was staying at a girlfriend's house. The broad must be too focused on her drink to care. He could even see the stain at the corner of her pouty lips where she'd missed a bit of sauce. She was a shy eater, one of those chicks that wanted guys to think she ate sunshine and only had one hole down there.

That was fine, but they'd have to work on the sneak eating. Even if he didn't see it, it didn't mean the calories didn't count, and she was already bordering a bit on pudgy. Those Irish genes, y'know?

And they would definitely have to work on the lying.

America tore into his sloppy joe, ground meat and red sauce dripping out the other side, plopping onto the plate with the sound of organs splattering, making him miss the camps.

He'd have his fun again soon enough. Red China's birthday gift was just the test, one last little benevolency, 'cuz hey- what was America if not benevolent? With not a single target left in the north, just mayyybe Northie would do the chivalrous thing and surrender, and he could skip to the second phase of the most recent iteration of his plan for total victory with ease.

Buuuut he had another little inkling he wouldn't. And then the chink would receive his real birthday gift, a few days late. Surprises were the best kind of present, after all.

It would be more of a blow for the Nork than him, but it would be a blow. And the chink had taken enough of those, with the power getting knocked out in his northeast the first time the Sui-ho Dam had been bombed, the food insecurity in the south of his country, and how he'd been hemorrhaging soldiers for almost two years now. And right about now, Red Chinese politicians were probably starting to whisper about the wisdom of wasting resources when they were still clamouring for Formosa.

Red China might've been too stupid to take America's offer to abandon Korea last year, and stupid enough to flaunt his little 'temporary visit' on August 15th, alongside Big Red. But he had seen the look in his eyes at the trial- he was crafty, calculating, even for a commie. He had to be to get judged 'innocent.' He knew it was a dog eat dog world, and you know what they said about chinks and dogs.

He wouldn't hold out for Korea much longer.

This next push wouldn't stop that dog from trying to climb out of the pit without deserving it. But it would scare him back to the side, so America could beat the Korean one down with a stick for good.

And once he was gone, and America held all of Korea, he would go to the Norks and oh-so-kindly offer amnesty and, more importantly, a goodly sum to any commie politicians that could provide proof that the Red Chinese Countryhuman had been in their country for more than a day.

And they would take it, because they would realize that no matter how badly they wanted the world to align with their delusions, it never would. It wasn't their world- it was America's. And if you wanted to get by in it, then you needed all the money you could get your filthy paws on.

The other countries already knew that, just like they knew the consequences of letting the dogs turn their teeth on them, especially a dog like China. He would get his war, finally, and be one step closer to fulfilling his destiny.

'Just a couple more weeks.'

He couldn't wait.

Local guy (personification of a country) doesn't understand the concept of the abolition of money being the abolition of poverty, and that the lumpenprole and proletariat only exist in relation to the bourgeoisie. There can be no poor people if there are no rich people. More at ten.

Sometimes when I see my cat I get so excited I start shaking and I need to sit down and take deep breaths. I wish he was made of jelly so I could hug him as aggressively as I want without hurting him. I think he'd like this too, since one of his favourite games is to lie down while I play the drums on his side very hard and fast, and gets mad if I try to stop.

Finally... The next chapter... It is almost here... Nishishishi

I Want To Believe

The worst thing about having your body shut down around you was that it wouldn't let you sleep to forget about it for even one fucking moment.

North Hamgyong went rigid on the cot as another wave of pain swept through him from head to toe, shocking down his spine like it was hitting each individual segment with a damn hammer.

Ssi-bal. He'd been working like a fucking dog for the past two and a half weeks, day and night, to get the fields around the Amnok River drained, trying to salvage the paddies they could, and get the other fields replanted with autumn crops. He'd been digging ditches, hauling earth, and lugging around handplows with Korea, Hae, South Pyongan, and the Chinese provinces non-fucking-stop, and now that he was finally back in the bunker for one night, he still couldn't get any damn rest.

And he knew this would be the only chance he'd be getting. They still had flooded areas to drain, rice to help harvest, fields to turn over, and embankments to build because Korea thought a few dirt walls would help stop the fucking tsunami that would happen if the dam broke for real. As soon as China's National Day was over, he would be shipping them right back to the Amnok, probably with everyone else this time.

And that included South Hamgyong.

North Hamgyong grit his teeth, pressing his face into his sweat-stained pillow, that she'd conveniently forgotten to wash the last time it was her turn to do laundry.

It had been bad enough working next to Hae and her stupid cheery smile while they were knee-deep in water, surrounded by peasants with hollow cheeks and empty eyes who'd just had to watch a quarter of their fucking harvest get wiped out, and haunted soldiers that almost dropped their tools every time a plane flew by.

And Korea's fucking presence, not saying a word after he'd rallied the work teams, just seizing a shovel and starting to attack the earth like it was the Yank himself. If he had to dig useless drainage ditches while his back screamed and his hands bled with South Hamgyong spouting slogans in the background, he was going to lose it. And he didn't want to give her the pleasure.

His knuckles clenched in the thin fabric of his bedroll as his leg spasmed, a cramp wracking his thigh, digging into the muscle like a knife and twisting like one of the other Hamgyong's jabs.

What was the point of draining the fields if they could just be flooded again whenever the Yank wanted? What was the point in trying to stop a flood when they knew they couldn't? What was the point in working himself to the bone with Korea when they knew it wouldn't be enough?

What was the point in tearing your body apart to carry a burden when you had never been strong enough to carry any other?

He pressed his face into the pillow until he couldn't breath, muffling himself as his body cramped and throbbed and burned.

"Is anyone up?"

He ignored the whispered question, burrowing deeper into the fabric, until his lungs started to ache as much as the muscle around them.

"Is anyone awake?"

When he didn't respond, the voice said, "North Hamgyong."

He shoved his upper half up, glaring into the darkness of the bunker. "If you knew I was awake, why bother fucking asking?"

"I was being polite," Kangwon said, keeping his voice low so he wouldn't wake the others. "Do-?"

"I'm not taking you to piss."

"Please?" his cousin asked shamelessly.

"It's not like you have to go all the way to the latrines," North Hamgyong griped as another cramp wracked his leg. "Just do it on the edge of the clearing."

"I think SH is out there."

She shouldn't be. She had the last shift tonight. He knew what that meant.

And now he really fucking didn't want to go outside.

"And you can't sleep anyway," Kangwon added. "I've been listening to you roll around."

Fuck. He better have only heard the rolling.

"You're fucking forty-two years old," he hissed over the sound of Hwang's whistling snores. "Or twenty-four, whatever the fuck. Either way, you're too goddamn old to be afraid ghosts are going to get you the moment you step into the woods."

"I'm-"

"You're not fucking worried the Yanks or their puppets are going to get you," he interrupted in a fierce whisper. "There are sixteen armed guards keeping watch on our perimeter, a security checkpoint and resthouse nearby, and anti-aircraft positions on the mountain. You're afraid a ghost is going to crawl up your dick while you're taking a piss."

Kangwon was silent for a moment. Then, "I'll give you a massage when we get back."

North Hamgyong glowered in the direction of his bunk. Then forced himself up, sitting on the edge of the cot so he could knead functionality into his leg again.

"What are you waiting for?" he demanded. "Get up."

The coward scrambled down from the cot above Chagang's, radiating smugness.

Bastard. North Hamgyong hated to give him the win. But between the germ warfare and the sheer amount of casualties beating Kangwon down, him doing post-Liberation Day shit in his province, and his cousin being glued to the hospital on Foundation Day before leaving for his own, and now this bullshit with the dam, it had been over a month since he'd received any relief for his back. And he was feeling it.

"And it isn't a massage," he muttered.

"Right," Kangwon whispered back. "It's just me rubbing your muscles until the knots are worked out. Weird, I feel like there's a word for that."

"Medical. Treatment," North Hamgyong hissed.

Massages were for bourgeois bastards that hired women to feel them up so they could get off. Unlike him, they wouldn't lose sleep and mobility if his cousin didn't rub their backs at least once a month.

"Obviously." There was a rustle as Kangwon lifted his foot to put on his boot, then North Hamgyong flinched as he fell into him.

"Sorry," his cousin murmured. "Lightheaded."

"Maybe you should've thought about that before draining yourself dry." He let the shorter man brace himself on him as he slid his boots on.

"I did," he replied. "Still had to do it."

"What kind of bastard is perfectly fine donating so much blood it makes him anemic, but can't take a damn piss by himself?"

"I can piss by myself," Kangwon lied easily. "I just like the company."

Whatever. At least he wasn't semi-delirious, the way he'd been on Foundation Day. It seemed like he was just draining himself mostly dry now, not all the way.

North Hamgyong followed him from the room, rubbing his shoulder. His cousin had made the pain worse by leaning on it. At least he'd make up for it with the- not massage. Then maybe he could get some damn shut-eye.

Kangwon didn't turn on his flashlight until they were in the hallway with the door shut, though it turned out they still had to be careful not to wake anyone up.

North Pyongan was leaning against the wall at the end of the hall, under the fucking creepy art South Hamgyong had hung on it- a Yank soldier howling as he was melted to the bone by his own side's napalm. His cousin was dead asleep, with his Chinese province's head on his shoulder. Their hands were linked on the floor between them.

Kangwon caught North Hamgyong's look and made a disapproving face.

"What?" he scoffed. "It's disgusting."

"You could try being happy for our cousin," he said quietly, reaching out to carefully adjust North Pyongan's cap so it wouldn't fall off.

"Why?" he retorted. "He's delusional. Even if she's not using him, Korea's never going to let them work out in the long run."

He had no idea why he was tolerating it now. He wasn't some great romantic, not in that sense of the word, anyway. Which probably meant something fucked up was going to happen to their lovesick cousin in the future.

Kangwon shrugged. "I think most people in love are probably at least a little delusional. Might as well be glad they're getting a bit of happiness from it in the middle of all this."

'Love.' North Hamgyong's jaw feathered. 'Bullshit.'

He should wake North Pyongan up so he could be the one to get dragged out into the woods in the middle of the night.

But while they'd been labouring away, he'd been doing the real hard work- travelling down the Amnok to apologize to his peasants, and explain why the dam had been drained. North Hamgyong would rather break his back for real than have to look his people in the eye and say 'Sorry your livelihood got fucked and you're going to suffer even more this winter than you already were.'

So he'd leave him asleep with his woman. Grudgingly.

"And Comrade Liaoxi's great," his cousin added, glancing at her. "You know she's a hard worker- she's helped you with the Supung twice now."

She was. Both of the Chinese had put the noses they didn't have to the grindstone with them and both of their soldiers and technicians to try to fix the power station and flooding. But that didn't change what she was.

"She's a foreigner."

His cousin gave him another look. "There's really nothing wrong with foreigners."

"Yeah?" North Hamgyong challenged. "What happened to that germ warfare report?"

He knew what had happened- it had just been released, the entire Commission presenting their tests and interviews and studies, their proof that America was using biological warfare on them. And you know what they got back? Crickets. The foreign press all around the world had already moved to suppress it, led by the Yanks, of fucking course. The most they'd got was some activist types declaring 'That's bad!' before proceeding to not do anything about it.

It didn't matter if the Chinese obviously weren't joining in on the suppression. They were foreigners, and one day, if they became enemies, they would have no problem censoring anything they did to Korea.

"We don't know it won't get a response yet," Kangwon said. "CCCP is bringing it to the UN for us tomorrow."

But his voice was subdued, and his gaze dropped to his boots as he went quiet. The sound of him picking at his nails almost echoed in the oppressive bunker.

'Stupid.' North Hamgyong balled his fists, stomping past Korea's door.

Their Countryhuman was in there, having come back barely an hour after he left, which meant the General had kicked him out of Jonsung Complex again, probably trying to make him get some sleep.

It was useless. He bet he was lying in there, fangs bared at the ceiling, just like he'd been. It'd be better to just let him work himself into passing out.

At least the Chinese bastard was gone tonight. Korea had left him at the Supung Dam, for some reason. The teal Chinese province had said her Countryhuman had told her he was finally being exiled from their country for good.

North Hamgyong hoped that was true. He hoped Korea kicked her out next, and her rhyming sister.

But he doubted it would happen. Hope was-

'Tch.'

He tore open the door, stomping past the two people that were flanking it, both of them startling.

"Fucking shoot me," he spat at South Pyongan, who'd drawn her pistol. "You'd be doing me a favour."

"Well then I definitely don't want to do that," she drawled, spinning her firearm around a finger before holstering it. "Where are you two off to?"

"A walk," Kangwon said at the same time he said, "Kangwon's taking a piss and can't do it without someone to protect him from the ghosts."

South Pyongan nodded sagely. "Ahhhh. Piss ghosts. Classic."

"Don't be so vulgar," South Hamgyong sighed.

"I'm not afraid of ghosts," Kangwon denied. "I just don't want-"

"Yeah yeah, move along, Ghost Boy," the Pyongan interrupted. "I hear piss ghosts target liars."

South Hamgyong gave her a dry look, then said, "Be safe, Kangwon."

She said it pointedly, looking only at him. North Hamgyong's teeth ground, but he didn't give her the satisfaction of a reaction. But he did glare at Kangwon as he caught the look that passed between him and South Pyongan.

"Yeah, we'll be safe," his cousin sighed, starting for the trees. North Hamgyong stomped after him.

"Don't let the piss ghosts get'cha!" South Pyongan called before the forest swallowed them up.

"I hate her," North Hamgyong grumbled.

"She's your sister."

"I wasn't-" He cut himself off, teeth sinking into his cheek.

Even if he had been talking about her, why would it fucking matter? Why should being his sister stop him from hating her? They were the ones that always used to get on his case for being protective of her, or 'possessive,' and told him just because he was her brother didn't mean he had any say over what she did, even when he'd just wanted to keep her safe. But then they turned around and acted like since they were 'family,' they should be holding hands and skipping everywhere together. And they were even worse when it came to Korea and his.

'Treat each other like siblings should.' If North Hamgyong had wanted to be beaten, he could've asked if that meant he should cut out South Hamgyong's eye.

Fuck. Even South Pyongan had abstained from that vote over whether to kill the Southern bastard or save themselves, just because he was Korea's brother. So what? That meant he should forgive him for betraying their country, for hurting him? It meant they should? Why should Korea be okay with the nation-traitor crippling him because he was his brother, when that hadn't stopped him from doing it in the first place?

Why should North Hamgyong forgive South Hamgyong for trapping him in that cage with her when she didn't forgive him for making her do it?

"You two should talk," Kangwon said when he didn't answer, as they headed deeper into the woods.

"I have nothing to say to her." It wasn't like anything he could say could make up for what he already had.

'I wish I hadn't missed.'

It wasn't like he wanted to.

"I think there's actually a lot need to say to each other," Kangwon said gently. "I could mediate-"

"No."

Kangwon stopped, putting a hand on his shoulder. "Cousin, I know it's hard. But nothing's going to change if you two don't try and make it."

North Hamgyong grit his teeth. Like South Hamgyong hadn't been trying to 'make it' for decades now, trying to force something broken to work, smiling blithely down at it and ignoring the choking smog and shrieking as it died.

He might've been the one that snapped the last fibre holding the fan belt together, but she was the one that had worn it that close to breaking.

"I don't want anything to change."

"North Hamgyong-"

"Keep fucking moving." He shoved past him. "And shut your damn mouth if you don't want me to leave you out here."

He could feel his cousin's eyes on him, pityingly sorrowed, even though both the Hamgyongs were just finally getting what they wanted.

North Hamgyong only looked back when Kangwon had drawn slightly ahead of him again, outspeeding him with his need to pee.

The woods were dark, the undergrowth only just starting to thin out with fall. He couldn't see anything of the bunker, or of the woman he was supposed to call a sister.

How was talking supposed to hammer out any of the bullshit between them? They couldn't say the shit they needed to with Kangwon there, and if he wasn't, they'd just start screaming at each other again. The look on her face and her delusional fucking optimism would make him say some bullshit he shouldn't mean, then she'd say something she shouldn't either, then they'd be at each other's throats again, maybe even literally now, judging by the way she'd lunged at him before. Taking a hammer to the Hamgyong's problems had never fixed them- it just smashed them into the mangled mess they were now.

Besides, she didn't want to try anymore. He'd finally made her stop.

He shouldn't want her to keep trying. There was no reason for her to. He was an antagonistic, cruel, stupid bastard. She shouldn't have to keep trying for someone like that, even if he had been her brother. Even if she'd been the one to fucking decide that in the first place, and thought Korea should keep trying for his.

They weren't even related anyway. They were just two provinces that shared a name, because years ago someone had been stupid enough to divide Hamgyong in two, making it easier for them to manage and harder for the idiots that would come to represent it. Provinces whose Countryhuman's sibling complex drove him to encourage the delusion.

South Hamgyong had only hunted him down and dubbed him 'oppa' because she wanted to play house, for someone to keep her safe without expecting the kind of shit a man who wasn't related to her would expect in return. She'd trapped him in this role he'd never asked for, only to turn around and say he had no right to play it, no right to keep her from fighting, or sleeping next to their male cousins, or facing off against more bastards who would be happy to do the same things her 'clients' had to her, no right to protect her. No right to be her brother.

Because he had failed.

The forest was dark, almost quieter than usual, as they headed to where the latest latrine had been dug, out near the western edge of the woods. The nightbirds were dull and muted, and the crunch of dead leaves under their heels was sharp, twigs snapping like bones with every other footfall.

North Hamgyong kept his hands in the band of his pants, trying not to eat shit from tripping on a root or rock buried under the leaf litter. Kangwon casually drifted closer and closer to him, like he was just slowing down for no reason. He gave up the act when something rustled in the bushes, grabbing his sleeve with lightning quickness.

"Did you hear that?" he whispered, voice higher than usual, more like Gangwon's.

The thought of their kidnapped relative just pissed him off more. "The fucking rock I just kicked?"

"Oh. Haha. Yeah." Kangwon let go.

"You lived alone in the forest for nine years," North Hamgyong said, unimpressed. "Did you ever see a gwisin? Agwi? Changgwi? Anything?"

"No," his cousin admitted.

"Exactly," he emphasized. "And aren't ghosts supposed to show up because they died violent, sudden deaths? How many people have had that happen to them because of the Japs or Yanks?"

Too fucking many.

"Shouldn't we be crawling with them? But I've certainly never fucking seen one."

It wasn't like that guy had ever came back to haunt the manager's office at the factory, even if some of the other workers had worried about it. And that bastard definitely would've deserved it.

You didn't become a ghost when you died. You didn't go to North Pyongan's heaven or reincarnate. You just died, and then there was nothing.

The promise of that had used to be a relief. Now it just made his tendons strain.

"It doesn't necessarily have to be ghosts," Kangwon said, lowering his voice even more on the word, eyes flicking around the shadowy undergrowth like he was afraid of summoning one from the darkness. "There are other things, out in the woods."

North Hamgyong shook himself. Why the fuck did he have to say it like that?

"I haven't seen any demons or dokkaebi either." Except for Hae. "Now come on, get moving. I didn't come out here to sight-see with you."

He stomped off, Kangwon scurrying after him. He wanted to get this over with, so he didn't shove him off when he 'casually' grabbed his sleeve.

"Lightheaded still," he explained, and North Hamgyong glowered at him, realizing something.

"If you knew South Hamgyong was outside, why didn't you just get South Pyongan to take you while she stood guard?"

His cousin didn't flinch at being called out. "She might not care, but she's still a woman. So I'd rather not."

"I'll believe it when I see it," North Hamgyong muttered. "She probably has the same parts as us."

Kangwon snorted, then covered it up with a cough. "Low-hanging fruit."

"Whatever. You know she'd just offer to let me kick her in the crotch to find out."

"So long as she got to kick you back," the other man supplied, and he nodded.

Which is why he wouldn't be telling her that joke. She already targeted a man's weak points when they sparred. Not that they'd been doing that lately. Even she was in too much pain.

North Hamgyong eyed Kangwon. He was shambling slightly, the shadows under his hooded eyes looking even deeper in the swaying beam of the flashlight. They peered out from the bandages he was swaddled in, flicking around the maze of thin trunks around them.

Despite how steady and regular his tone was, he looked fucking miserable. He might be using his blood loss to cover up that he was definitely afraid of ghosts, but that didn't mean he wasn't still anemic. His dark skin was washed out, and he didn't have his usual surefootedness in the wild, favouring a leg.

He should be a patient in a hospital, not rushing around taking care of them. But he was still pushing himself to the edge, wearing himself ragged dealing with and investigating the germ warfare, just to have it turn out useless, and taking care of the endless stream of people maimed by the Yanks bombs, enough so that North Pyongan had told them to be gentle with him, and to remind him they were there for him whenever they went to donate blood.

That wasn't North Hamgyong's crap. All he could do was try and talk him out of giving so much blood. They needed it, but they didn't need one of their top doctors passing out in the middle of a surgery or going into a coma.

He didn't listen, just kept fucking forging on. He was like Korea in that way- an idiot. But it wasn't like North Hamgyong wasn't one, too.

'We're free.'

They all were.

After a short walk, they reached the latrine. It was still too deep in the woods to see light coming from the fields around them, but it was dug in a small clearing between the ash trees, where the canopy opened up just enough to see the sky above. The moon was almost full, but too low on the horizon to be visible, leaving the expanse an inky, impenetrable black, like someone had spilled engine oil across it. North Hamgyong's eyes strained, but he didn't see any shadows blocking out the few stars that glittered in it. Even though he could hear the drone, it was far away and tinny.

Kangwon's flashlight lit the slender grey trunks with harsh white light, making the shadows between them deeper as they drew back in the face of the beam. The leaves cast shifting silhouettes as they rustled in the cold breeze. The black made the oranges and yellows stand out starkly, along with the occasional splash of red, like blood.

The bandages cut most of the chill, but North Hamgyong still pulled the neck of his sleeveless undershirt up over his collarbones. It'd be time for winter uniforms soon. The manual labour had been keeping him warm for the past weeks, even farther north, where the wind swept across Supung Lake and down from the mountains, carrying a bite with it. But he'd never been able to forget that fall was creeping in. Every 'thunk' as his shovel met the earth, every uprooted rice plant he'd pulled out of the flooded paddies had been another second counting down to winter.

"Hurry up," he said gruffly, swatting Kangwon's arm, trying to make him stop strafing the latrines with the flashlight like a sniper looking for a mark.

His cousin had been nervously staring into the dark, and he startled as he was hit, dropping the light, immediately plunging the clearing into darkness and making him yelp.

"Ssi-bal," North Hamgyong swore, then again, ordering, "Get off me," as the other man latched on to his arm with force, almost startling him.

"Sorry," his cousin said. "Tripped."

"Yeah right," the taller province muttered, bending down to pick up the flashlight, gritting his teeth as pain throbbed in his back and hips.

He clicked the switch on the light. It didn't turn on.

"Great," he huffed. "You broke it. Korea's going to kill me."

"I'm the one that dropped it."

"Yeah, and I'm the one on his shit list." Just because he'd mobilized him to the dam didn't mean he was off the hook for calling South Hamgyong what he had.

"I won't tell him," Kangwon promised. "I don't need it too often anyway. We have lamps in the hospital for when the power cuts out."

That was fine for seeing. But lamps couldn't power life support systems.

"Hurry up and do what you need to do." North Hamgyong turned away, smacking the flashlight on his wrist, trying to get it to work again.

Kangwon didn't move, lingering behind him. North Hamgyong heaved a sigh.

"I'm not holding your fucking hand while you piss."

"I wasn't going to ask you to," he said, with that aggravating 'I'm being reasonable' voice he used when he was pretending he wasn't scared. "I just think you should pee, too. Having a full bladder is bad for your health."

"I pissed after dinner because I'm not an idiot."

"I'm used to having the toilet available in the hospital. And you could just come a little closer."

North Hamgyong glowered at him over his shoulder. "You want me to aim for you, too?"

"I'm still anemic," his cousin said patiently, even though he was shifting from foot to foot.

"I am not holding you while you use the latrine," he made clear. "And if you piss yourself because you're too scared to, I'm telling South Pyongan. See how you like being Piss Boy for the rest of forever."

Or however long they had left.

Kangwon stared at him with furrowed brows, but if North Hamgyong didn't let Hae's pleading face get him, he wasn't going to let a man's. He turned his back to him, pointedly.

"Fine," Kangwon sighed. "...Can you promise you won't sneak up on me? I don't want to end up in the latrine."

And there was the real reason he hadn't wanted South Pyongan to bring him. The blue woman would probably take off into the woods and hide just to freak him out.

"Do you think I'm five?" he demanded. "It's past midnight- I'm not in the mood for bullshit."

"Right, yeah."

Kangwon's footsteps reluctantly padded away, then paused. North Hamgyong determinedly didn't look back. The footsteps resumed, more hesitantly.

The latrine wasn't even that far away. He was on the edge of the clearing, just under the trees, literally less than five fucking metres between them. He could genuinely hear the sound of his cousin unbuckling his belt and whipping it out. He could also hear his teeth chattering as branches creaked out in the woods. What he couldn't hear was-

"I don't hear you pissing," he called.

Not that he fucking wanted to. Why was he always the one that got stuck doing this?

"You know it's hard for me to do it around people," Kangwon answered, voice hushed. "And keep it down."

Like if ghosts or whatever were real they'd be limited by hearing. They'd probably sense your karmic debt or some shit. In which case he would've been better off bringing anyone other than North Hamgyong.

"Then you should stop being a damn scaredy-cat and man up," he said at the same volume. "Do you pull this shit with our soldiers when you do this in the field?"

His cousin's shameful silence said it all.

"Korea should send you to a camp."

"I don't make a big deal of it," Kangwon defended. "If South Pyongan isn't around, no one knows I'm afraid of the paranormal. Because I'm not."

And the reason he couldn't piss was because 'it was hard for him to do it around others.' North Hamgyong was not the one that needed re-education.

"You have twenty seconds before I leave you out here."

He could feel Kangwon's urgency spike behind him, but still no piss.

"Tch."

North Hamgyong throttled the flashlight in one hand, shaking it violently as he smacked the bottom. After a hard enough blow, the batteries knocked back into place, and the beam once more illuminated the dying leaves.

"Thanks," Kangwon said with a relieved sigh.

"I just don't want Korea to make me dig the next latrines," he muttered, pointing the tool backwards in his hand to give his cousin some light.

Almost immediately, liquid started pattering down onto the earth, making him roll his eyes. Yeah, clearly he just 'liked the company.'

"If ghosts were real, what the fuck would I be supposed to do about them anyway?"

"Run slower than me."

North Hamgyong shot him a look over his shoulder, catching his smirk.

"Bastard."

"Joking," he said. "It's just easier to believe supernatural things aren't out here with me if you are. If I believed in the supernatural, obviously."

"Obviously," his cousin sarcastically echoed.

He glowered into the dark as Kangwon pissed like a horse. The bastard had probably been lying in bed holding it for an hour before he decided he couldn't wait until morning.

The shadows shifted out in the woods, leaves swaying, colours fading to dim grey where the flashlight beam touched them less, before transitioning to bottomless black. The rustling of the foliage murmured rhythmically, making his eyelids dip as the exhaustion bore down on him.

His spine ached, demanding to bend, but he kept it ramrod straight. He wasn't wearing his epaulets, but he could still feel them pressing down into the charred skin under his bandages. The work had been letting him dull his mind, but now those words came back, circling his mind like an irritating gnat.

'That is what hope is. A burden. One that we have to carry, because if we don't, then our country and everyone in it will suffer for it.'

It was easy for Korea to say. Everything was. It was easy to say they were going to win, that the war would be over by next year, that they could still be free. It was when he was wrong that it got hard.

Yet he still made himself get up in front of their people and say it again. He still carried it with ease, he always had, like he was Mireuk the giant, striding from one end of the earth to the other to hold up the sky with his copper columns. Never mind that the sky was fucking falling down around them.

He had a flash of Korea in the fields, digging like he was possessed by one of Kangwon's spirits, blood sheeting down the shovel as he stared blankly at the soil.

Maybe not ease, not anymore. But that just made it even fucking harder. How was North Hamgyong supposed to carry this burden if even Korea was bowing under its weight?

He did know what a burden was, he had slaved away in that factory, whored out his labour, for six years, all so the person he'd cared about wouldn't have to suffer. But she had, every day. He hadn't been able to do shit about it. None of his suffering had ever stopped hers.

And he hadn't been able to carry it. Even if he'd never dropped it, even if he'd kept it on his shoulders while his teeth splintered and his ribs snapped, he had been planning on dropping it. Because that's what offing his sister and himself would've been- putting down the burden, giving into that relieving nothing because he was a weakling who couldn't take it.

One and a half more months and he would have.

He didn't want their people to suffer, and he knew if he didn't, he had to carry their weight, the weight of that 'province's responsibility,' even heavier than the four billion tons of an officer's.

But he wasn't fit to. Not when he couldn't even carry his own sister. Korea hadn't been able to carry his, he'd gotten out of wherever they'd been and left the Southern bastard behind. He'd left him again after Liberation. But he still believed he could save him, that he was good enough to. He was a fucking idiot for it, but he did.

North Hamgyong didn't. He couldn't. And Korea was right- he had lost South Hamgyong because of it.

His eyes squeezed shut. Then the darkness behind them got darker, colder.

'Ssi-bal.' He opened them to see the flashlight had gone dark again. He thumped his palm against the bottom, harder than needed, but this time it stayed dark.

Damn it. He just knew he was going to smash his teeth out on a rock on the way back.

"Kangwon," he said, realizing he didn't hear the stream of liquid anymore. "If you're done, let's go."

"North Hamgyong," he said lowly. "Come look at this."

"Fuck you."

"I mean it."

And something in his voice, a waver he didn't hear even when his cousin was elbows-deep in a comrade's blood, told him he did. And he realized he hadn't yelped when the light died.

He spun around, emerging from the trees. His cousin was standing with his hands on his belt buckle, staring up at the hole in the canopy. As he approached, he raised a shaking finger.

"What-?" he demanded, following his trajectory, then stopped.

There were lights in the sky.

They were in shades of orange and yellow and red, like blood, like the dying trees. They darted over the oil spill, fast. Trails of light flashed behind them as they moved in circles, loops, darting forward and doubling back with far more mobility and speed than he'd ever seen on any fighter jet or midnight bomber.

"Hey." Kangwon half-turned to him with a trembling smile. "What are those?"

North Hamgyong blinked, hard, thinking they were afterimages from the flashlight, but when he opened them they were still there.

"Stars," he said after a moment, voice hoarse, though even shooting stars didn't move the way those lights did, like mosquito larvae skidding across stagnant water.

"I can see the stars." Kangwon's finger moved to one of the white, static dots, far smaller, farther away than the lights.

"Yankee planes," he said after a moment, watching one red light blink out of existence, then appear in another part of the sky.

He'd thought Kangwon had lost his stutter in the Division, but it was there as he said, "I've n-never seen planes move like that."

"It's- It's experimental tech, or something."

Incredibly advanced, so advanced that he couldn't even hear the drone of the engines that was always fucking there, or the one he'd been able to hear before. He couldn't hear anything, no distant trucks, no nightbirds. Just the rustle of leaves, which suddenly seemed far too loud.

Neither of them moved. He didn't know how long they stood there under the sky, transfixed by the lights high above them, flitting and swirling like they were alive, until they suddenly froze in place and started to blink, off and on, off and on. They flared like streetlights when you narrowed your eyes at them, in shades of blue and green that reminded him of burning copper, coronas growing brighter-

And then they were gone. No silhouettes in the cloudless sky, no shadows as they crossed the real stars and vanished. Nothing. Like they'd never been there.

The flashlight flared back to life.

North Hamgyong slowly, jerkily, brought his gaze down to Kangwon. His cousin did the same. His russet skin was almost as pale as his bandages in the harsh white light, and his eyes were the size of headlights.

"I don't... think those were planes."

"They were," the Hamgyong said, heart in his throat. "What the fuck else would they be?"

Kangwon stared up at him, trembling. "North Hamgyong."

"No," he said.

There was a whine in his voice. "North Hamgyong-"

"No." North Hamgyong seized him but the shoulders, making him flinch. "Absolutely fucking not. There was nothing there. We saw nothing. And if we did see something, then it was Yankee planes, some new shit to kill us the bastards are trying out, that's all. And we are not going to tell anyone about this because they didn't do anything and it doesn't matter and we didn't see anything. Understand?"

"But-"

"Do you understand?" North Hamgyong shook him so hard his head bobbled.

"Y-Yeah," Kangwon said quickly, still being shaken. "I understand."

"Good." He let go of him, then grabbed his shoulder again. "Do up your fucking pants, we're getting out of here."

His cousin hurriedly finished buckling them. The taller province was already dragging him away before he was even done, both of them half-jogging, not even caring when they stumbled over roots as they made a beeline back to the bunker, leaving the leaves to rustle for no one.

—

South Pyongan and South Hamgyong looked up as the undergrowth beyond the GAZ crackled, and their two cousins came spilling out, faces pale and haggard.

"What took you two so long?" the Pyongan asked, leaning against the mountainside. "You were gone for like, an hour. Did the piss ghosts get your dick after all?"

"We didn't see anything!" Kangwon blurted, and North Hamgyong growled, "Nothing," as he dragged him by them, tearing open the steel door and disappearing inside with a heavy 'clang' that still made unease churn within one of the women.

She pretended she didn't feel it, as usual, as she looked at her cousin, arching an eyebrow.

South Hamgyong shook her head in answer, pretending she didn't feel what she felt about one of them, also as usual. "Men," she sighed.

Accepting the verdict, South Pyongan bobbed her head. "Men," she agreed.

High above, the stars in the sky twinkled merrily, alone once more.

—

Some time later, North Hamgyong laid in bed, still awake. His muscles weren't cramped and screaming anymore, but he'd traded the soothing of that inner agony for a worsened surface one. Each grind of Kangwon's palms against his lower back and probe of his fingers had burst open his overcooked skin, no matter how gentle he'd been trying to be.

Whatever. At least he'd be able to move tomorrow, and wouldn't want to kill himself if he had to sit in a chair for an hour at another banquet for the Chinese.

They'd both been dead silent as his cousin gave him his treatment, and Kangwon had slunk back onto his bunk with only a nervously muttered, "'Night." The Hamgyong hadn't answered, still determinedly trying not to think about what had happened because nothing had happened.

But even if something had, it paled next to everything else. He'd rather his mind chased its tail over lights in the sky and strange silences, instead of the bitter one between him and South Hamgyong.

The bunker door had opened earlier, South Pyongan pushing open the one to their room and quietly waking Hwang for his watch. North Hamgyong was safe for tonight, along with the rest that had been working on the flooding. Their other cousins were taking longer shifts to let them and Kangwon rest. He'd been planning on taking the male Hwanghae's, since he'd been working his ass off with all the bombing raids in his province, but now the idea of standing out there in the dark, not just having to look out into the dark woods, but up...

Fuck that. At least if Hwang saw that shit he'd be excited.

North Pyongan had woken up, slinking into the room as the Chinese province returned to the women's with South Pyongan. The bunker was silent again. With Hwang's snoring gone, the other men breathed quietly, barely audible under North Hamgyong's laboured breaths.

He hadn't heard South Hamgyong come in. It had to have been a bad one tonight. Another one.

The door quietly squealed open again, like he'd known it would. Socked feet padded across the concrete floor, creaking coming from North Pyongan's bed as South Pyongan crawled into it. Sheets rustled as she made herself comfortable up against the wall, trying to hide out of sight from the next shift change, like she'd been doing almost every night for the past few months.

He didn't know if North Pyongan ever woke up. He never heard him say anything, but that didn't mean he didn't.

The annoying siblings weren't disgustingly glued to each other anymore, but every time they were here, they were together. Now that South Pyongan wasn't able to scrap the way she wanted, in the small bits of free time they had during breakfast and after dinner, she'd never be anywhere but pressed up to North Pyongan, even if she was talking to someone else.

She knew. They all did. South Pyongan spending every bit of time she could with her brother, North Pyongan brushing his sister's shoulder and squeezing his Chinese woman's hand very chance he got, Hwang tightening his grip on the finalized short course plans as Hae babbled about being their own provinces, Chagang staring down at his bowl of juk with a blank expression, Kangwon's hands shaking as he slid the IV into his arm and said the war would be over soon. South Hamgyong and her increasing nightmares. They all knew. They were just pretending not to. Except for maybe Hae. And that was just because she didn't want to. They just got pissy with him for ruining their delusions.

Didn't they know that if he could be delusional too, he would be? This was fucking exhausting, living every day feeling his muscles wind tighter and his jaw winch shut, waiting for the end. Those final months in the factory under the weight of what was happening to South Hamgyong and what he would have to do had been torturous, to the point he'd almost been glad when they started running out of time. He knew they couldn't make enough money, he knew they were doomed, that they didn't have much longer left. So why the fuck should he have to live with the future hanging over him like a Jap sword?

...Fucking fine- he was jealous. He could admit that. It disgusted him that North Pyongan could hold hands with a Chinese Provincehuman and think they had any chance of a future together, but he envied that he thought they could have a future at all. He envied that Kangwon could treat patient after patient torn apart by Yankee germs and bombs and still believe that one day he wouldn't have to. He envied that South Pyongan could still joke and tease and ignore the atom bomb suspended above their heads, and that

North Pyongan had her to-

Even if it would be better for them if they could admit that the cliff was there, he envied that they didn't have to spend every waking minute with their eyes fixed on the edge, counting down the steps left to reach it.

He had always despised South Hamgyong's optimism, the way she could look him in the eyes and tell him they almost had enough when they didn't, when even with four more years they wouldn't, let alone four months, how she tell him she'd saved him candied fruit with vomit on her curved lips, the way she'd smiled at him over that table and told him everything would be alright after he'd just woken up to find out she'd been forced to whore herself out because of him.

But he'd also envied it. The way she was strong enough to believe those things, to believe they could be free. Even when he wasn't strong enough for her to believe he could save her, she was strong enough to hold on anyways. Even back when she'd been weaker than she was now, back before it had turned to pretending. She was strong enough to bear that burden. He wasn't.

And...

'We'll be free one day, oppa.'

He didn't know if he had always despised it. He didn't know if the memory of them standing on the hill as they laid eyes on Hungnam for the first time had always felt like a rusty nail, and her smile the hammer that pounded it in. He didn't know if the way her eyes squinched in his memories as she tapped her eyeless fish against his had always made him grit his teeth and want to make them dull, or if all the years sitting in his sister's cage as she pretended that she hadn't ruined them, that he hadn't made her do it had done it, the bars pressing in and leaving imprints on those moments, warping them.

It didn't matter. This was the way they were now.

'Get over it,' Korea had said. But how could he? How could he when his back still ached and the scars on his arm still itched and the sight of South Hamgyong's smile still filled him with that old rotten anger, and he saw her in the Worker's Party members that assured their civilians they would win, and in the peasants that promised they'd get the fall harvest salvaged no matter what, and in the General as he told him hope was what gave you the strength to fight? And in Korea as he bared his teeth at the flooded earth. How could he when the bars had done their damage, when everything they both did just made him taste bitter green tea and candied pears and blood?

How could he when she hadn't either?

The bottom bunk closest to his head creaked again, and he heard North Pyongan sit up, and gently pull South Pyongan down into his lap. As mouthy as she was, she didn't say anything, either the one sleeping now or the one pretending.

North Hamgyong gritted his teeth, turning to face the wall, letting the friction between his bedroll and his body tear his skin.

The female Pyongan never would've done what his sister had, not the old one. But if she had, he bet the Pyongans wouldn't be where the Hamgyongs were now. They'd still be sharing beds and wanting to spend the time they had left together. Not like him, who'd started wishing he could just work late again instead of visiting the house on the hill, and couldn't move on.

Not like him, who'd been so weak he'd lost his only sister.

A soft humming filtered through the dark, and North Hamgyong closed his eyes.

Finally, the long-awaited alien chapter...

It would be funnier to just leave this without comment, but I need to explain. Originally this was supposed to be randomly interjected with absolutely no plot relevance, but a small timeline tweak ruined my fun. ㅠㅠ So now the alien chapter is a load-bearing chapter. This is inspired by the alien sightings alleged by Americans during the Great Fatherland Liberation War. In January 1952, American pilots reported seeing orange globes over Wonsan and Sunchon that followed their bombers in the sky. In May 1951, Yankee soldiers near Chorweon also saw an orange light that came into their camp, unscathed by artillery strikes. They shot at it, reporting that it sounded like their bullets hit metal, and it blasted them with light, then flew off. Three days later they all got sick with symptoms that seemed to be radiation poisoning. There were also dozen of other reports of unknown aircraft. At the time it was assumed by the Yanks that it was some sort of Soviet experimental tech, yet it never made a return in any future conflicts, and when the Soviet Union fell, nothing like that was ever found in their records. What was found were Soviet reports of seeing unidentified discs of light over Korea, too. And Korea and China did not have the technology for this at that point. So governmentwise, it could really only be America left. Or, you know. Aliens.

Americans also reported UFOs during the war in Vietnam, and in many other conflicts. It was actually in 1952 that Project Blue Book, the US 'let's find aliens' operation began. I want to acknowledge that Americans do tend to be crazy and spiritually schizophrenic, so that could be why they're always seeing aliens during wartime when their victims aren't. But also Communists are materialists (this materialist just also believes in aliens), and more likely to rationalize those things. Plus if your average Korean or Chinese soldier saw some weird advanced technology, it would be far more likely for it to be assumed as American.

For the one that made US soldiers sick, I think it is interesting that it happened in May 1951, during the tail end of the first germ warfare outbreak, and also when the front was near Chorweon. That very well could have been an American experiment that hit their own soldiers either on purpose or accident. Just like the other orbs could have been American tech that remains classified to this day, since their archives have never been opened. I think there's a very good chance that's the case for many alien sightings- Americans interfering with other countries, as usual. I long for a river of blood to spill their secrets.

Anyway. Just to show I'm not crazy. I'm not one of those 'aliens are responsible for this and that, and secretly run the governments!!' I just believe they're out there. Watching. And also seemingly harassing Americans during their genocidal wars. If I want to believe aliens are out there, and perhaps comrades, this harms no one.

However this experience has harmed Kangwon and North Hamgyong. They will never recover. And they will never tell a soul what they saw.

Also a fun fact- the word piss has been used 34 times up until this chapter in all of Chasing Liberty. And 14 times in this one alone. What does that make the piss ratio? Another fun fact- North Pyongan knew North Hamgyong was awake. He wasn't just humming for South Pyongan.

Something Wicked

Kungkwang-kungkwang-kungkwang. North's heart beat in his 'ears,' too fast for someone who had been lying in the same spot for hours. Despite it working overtime to pump blood, the dark behind his lids spun, and his fingertips tingled with pins where they lay on his chest.

It was fine. He was sure it was just one of those useless reactions his body had, or his system straining itself to try and scab over the burns after all the labour he'd been doing. Whatever it was, he wouldn't be going to the hospital. He would only set foot there tomorrow, and not to see Kim Yong-hwan, just to donate blood before they departed for the Supung Dam again.

His jaw ached as he somehow managed to grit his teeth tighter.

He should be there now. He shouldn't have left, there was still too much work to do. And his people needed to see him on the ground, needed to know he wouldn't have given the order to release the water if he didn't feel like it was necessary, needed to know he hadn't done it callously.

All that damage and the bombs hadn't even cracked the concrete. They hadn't even-

There was a sleepy hum from beside him, and the sound of fabric rustling. North angled his head away from it, heartbeat pounding annoyingly loud in one ear slit now, drowning out his thoughts.

"I told you to get out of my country."

"I did." China didn't sound muzzy at all, even though it had to have been an hour since he returned, and North hadn't heard him moving around from his half-conscious state. "And I told you that your orders stop applying the moment I set foot on my soil. Either you forgot, or you expected me to come back."

North stayed facing away, even though it was too dark to see each other anyway. "Did anyone see you cross?"

"I accidentally made my presence known to a few border guards. I believe they saw me without my mask."

China didn't do accidents. And he didn't sound bothered. It seemed he had guessed what North was planning. Though hopefully not all of it.

"Sloppy," he still judged, making his comrade hum in amusement.

"I'll make sure to write some self-criticism after the banquet."

Ssi-bal. North didn't want to go to that. But he knew he had to. They were honouring their Chinese comrades on their National Day again, and it wouldn't look good if the Countryhuman of the country they were fighting for wasn't there.

And... North did want them to know he... cared about them. It was just the other parts he wanted to avoid.

"Though I hope you'll let me visit the theatre first," China continued.

The Korean stiffened. "Why?"

"I was thinking maybe your lovely dance troupes might be putting something on for my birthday."

"There isn't anything special today," North lied.

"Pity," China sighed. "Will I at least be getting a present from you? Another persimmon perhaps?"

Relaxing, North said, "The banquet is your present."

"I thought the banquet was a reward for being a good ally." There was an audible pout in China's voice as he rolled over to face him. "What about my birthday present?"

'Greedy.' As usual.

"You're the one who wants to pretend the days our nations were founded are birthdays." Him and everyone else. "I'm not obligated to play along."

His comrade let out a exaggerated sigh, flopping back over. "Very well. I suppose it's a fair exchange. I fed you, so you'll feed me."

North's head retreated down between his shoulders, both of his 'ears' filled with the unsteady rhythm of his heart again.

They hadn't spoken about that night, even before the mess with the dam. He'd helped China clean up far too late, then returned to the bunker to collapse. Even with his stomach feeling uncomfortably full (even though he was aware that he hadn't actually eaten that much), he had managed to get some real sleep, which was already feeling like a distant memory again. In the morning, the other country hadn't even mentioned it.

Not that there was anything to mention. It had just been a meal for his not-birthday. A meal he probably should have thanked China for, regardless of who made it. But still wouldn't.

And it was good he hadn't said anything. Chagang had been gone when they'd gotten back, replaced by SH. They were both discreet, and wouldn't mention either that China had taken the food cooked by the Liaos into the woods, then taken North into them, or that they'd came back with empty dishes. So as long as China kept his mouth shut, the others wouldn't find out.

His provinces might not begrudge him the meal. And it wasn't like they'd gone hungry while he feasted. But he had eaten better. His portion of the rice ration wasn't worth the meat sauce and bitter melon. Hae would have loved to have more meat, and Kangwon could have used the calories to finish recovering from his anemia. Even if he hadn't eaten it entirely willingly, they should begrudge that. And then they would begrudge that they weren't eating well at all, that no one was, that he'd destroyed their farmland for nothing and-

"Though I'll point out that you aren't actually involved in the preparation of the banquet," China added.

North pressed his face into his bedroll, breathing in the mild scent of tallow soap under the charred meat smell it was already soaking back up before he could respond, "And you didn't make the noodle."

"Touché." China's dejected sigh transitioned into a moan as he stretched. There was a soft scuff as his palms brushed against the wall by their heads, and North could hear his clothes rustle as he arched his back off the bedroll in the same noisy routine he performed nearly every morning.

He turned onto his own back, blindly reaching out.

"Oof." China thumped back to the ground as he was chopped firmly in the stomach. "Aiya, it's my birthday and you're assaulting me before you even wish me a good one. It's beginning to become a tradition with you."

"Still not playing along," North said, sitting up. They'd been speaking low, maintaining the nighttime atmosphere. But he raised his voice now. "Get up. I have things I need to do today."

"Not even going to let me sleep in?" His comrade's voice was muffled. Turning on the his flashlight revealed he was facedown on his pillow.

"You need breakfast."

North hadn't warned him he was kicking him out of his country ahead of time, so he had no idea if the other man had been able to make arrangements to eat dinner last night. He didn't want him passing out. It would make him look like a poor host.

"And you need to take the GAZ with us."

There was no way he was letting him walk to the city alone when the border guards had seen him cross. Even one spy with another radio...

And China's holidays weren't exempt from the heavier bombing. North didn't trust that his 'visit' on Liberation Day wouldn't spur America to up his attacks even more today, even without confirmation he was here. He already thought he was anyway.

"If only I had my own vehicle." China sighed dramatically. "Alas."

"Too bad you don't," North said flatly.

He'd had to pick out an officer's transport to wait for him to get back over the border. He couldn't risk the name 'Mao Zhilong' being seen on China's special transportation permit if he went hitchhiking. Not today.

China lifted his face from the pillow, squinting in the bright glow of the flashlight. "Has anyone ever told you you're utterly shameless?"

"Just now," the Korean answered immediately. "Up."

He went to grab China under the arms and haul him up, but hesitated.

He still didn't understand how his comrade was so casually... touchy. At their dinner, his legs had kept brushing against North's. At one point his knee had bumped against the side of his folded leg and been content to stay there while he talked about operas he'd seen, a topic North couldn't even remember how they had got on. CCCP was the same way, always touching him on the shoulder or arm like it was the easiest thing possible. And the way they'd hugged each other on Liberation Day, like it was so natural...

Whenever North touched someone, he was hyperaware that he was doing it. He hadn't absorbed a single thing China had said after his knee touched him, too focused on the pressure against his skin. Outside of his people on holidays, he was always waiting for the chance to withdraw, or for them to. He was fine initiating contact on the battlefield, to haul a comrade to safety or hold him down for the medics, but outside of that it felt like... an imposition.

It was an imposition. He wanted to dig his fingers into China's ribs and heave him to his knees, at least. And it wasn't like the other country ever paid any mind to his comfort. So he shouldn't care.

He noticed the glint of China's eye peering up at him from the folds in his pillowcase, squinted mischievously, like he was ready for him to grab him.

He looked away, changing the direction of his hands to twist, grabbing his boots instead.

'Stupid.'

He'd had no issue when they did on-the-spot sparring, easily jabbing him in the ribs and grappling with him on the ground, just like he had no issue doing it to his provinces. He was capable of grabbing North Hamgyong by the shoulders to force him to kneel. But patting him on the back after an arduous day of labour was impossible.

Why was it so easy to reach out to hurt people, but not to just... touch them?

He curled his fingers into his palms, feeling them throb through the bandages, and the pulse of China's blood in his veins as he had held his life in his hand.

It hadn't been that way with South. Touching him had been as natural as breathing. More so. Kim Il-sung was the only other person he came even close to that with, and even then...

"Comrade, come back to me."

China's sing-song broke him out of his reverie, and he realized he'd been staring blankly at the boot in his hand, the other one on his foot already. The other man was finally sitting up, or at least propped up on his palms, the thin blanket half-draped over him.

He smiled. "No flying away on my birthday."

North snapped his gaze away, hurriedly shoving on his other boot. "It isn't your birthday."

"Ah ah," he chided, unbuttoning his nightshirt. "That's your complex to bear. I do consider this my birthday, and I expect lots of special treatment for it, especially if you aren't giving me a gift."

A year ago, the entitlement in the words might have made North bristle. But he knew him well enough by now to know he was joking.

"You'll get special treatment, alright," he muttered. "I'm ordering South Pyongan to push you out of the truck."

"I suppose that means I'll have to sit up front with you then," China lilted, seamlessly outmaneuvering him.

North huffed, not refuting him as he stood up to put on his tunic. As had become holiday protocol, he would be changing into his less-worn one after breakfast, when he put on fresh bandages. But not the white dress uniform yet. He wanted to visit some of the Chinese units stationed around Pyongyang before the banquet.

Well, he didn't want to. But he needed to.

He picked up one of his epaulets, holding it so the sides cut into his tender palm, gazing down at the emblem. Then he fastened it and its twin to his shoulders.

Even if he was going to change, he had to put them on. It was his duty. One he needed to prove to his provinces, especially North Hamgyong, that he could bear.

As his comrade began to put on his jacket, still dragging his heels, North hurried from the room, taking his flashlight- and China's- with him.

—

"And you're sure everything is ready?"

SH let out a fondly exasperated sigh as Korea demanded the same thing from her yet again.

'They've probably only gotten more ready since the other four times you've asked.'

She didn't say that. It was nice he was worrying about something like this for once, and she didn't want to shame him for it. Especially not when he'd been so awkward and... she didn't want to say 'sheepish' when he asked her to set it up.

"Yes, Korea," she said instead. "The recital went well. All our comrades have been working hard with the instructions I gave them before I left."

She'd had to scramble to do it. Korea had woke her up early the day after Foundation Day and assigned the task to her. Which meant she had to rush around Pyongyang like her life depended on it, just barely getting back in time to catch her transport to Hamhung.

But at least she hadn't had to ride with North Hamgyong. Always nice.

"I'm ready, too," she assured him. "But are you sure you want me to per-?"

"Shh!" Korea hushed her sharply, looking around at the stretch of underground hall they were in, eye narrowed.

They were in an offshoot that dead-ended in a meeting room, metres down from the main corridor, where a few Party members were hurrying by, putting the final touches on the mess hall.

Korea glared in that direction. SH knew he was expecting China to poke his head around the corner.

"He's with his soldiers," she said helpfully.

"That's what he wants you to think," Korea muttered, keeping his eye on the hallway.

Placating his paranoia, SH kept her voice down, and shaped her words a little more vaguely. "Are you sure you want me there tonight?"

"Yes," he said immediately, then twitched towards her. "Are you comfortable with it?"

He sounded alarmed, so SH quickly assured him she was.

He hadn't asked before because he'd known she would be. She hadn't meant to make him doubt it.

"I'm just worried I don't know the steps as well," she confessed.

Even if she was tolerable at the performing arts (more than tolerable, according to Yun-hui, and a few other people, she supposed), she still didn't feel like she was amazing at them. Not when she wasn't dying of hypothermia and exhaustion, anyway.

"I didn't have much time to practice." She'd been allowed to return from her province three days early to do it, but that wasn't as much time as the three weeks the rest of the troupe had had.

"You'll do fine," Korea dismissed. "He's always praising you anyway."

SH straightened a little at that. She knew China had liked her performance of 'Aegukka,' and had griped about missing her May Day one because of his injury. And of course he was always bringing up her art. He'd told her he loved the Foundation Day piece she had made, and that Korea did, too, to her relief. She'd been worried after he looked at it the way he had when she gave it to him.

But it was nice to hear that their comrade had been complimenting her to her Countryhuman, too. It meant it really wasn't just flattery.

But...

"Wait a second." She narrowed her eyes at Korea. "Are you just using me to show off?"

He tilted his chin, not answering, and she let out an amused puff of air.

And a little touched. Korea was a perfectionist, but he thought her skills were good enough to demonstrate. And he hadn't even heard 'Aegukka.'

"I'll make sure to do our country proud," she assured him.

He opened his mouth, then shut it. "You had better," he said gruffly. Then his brow crinkled. "Do you think-?"

He cut himself off, spinning in an abrupt circle. SH had to step back into the rough stone wall to avoid being bumped.

"This is stupid," he growled with sudden aggravation. "We have more important things to worry about than entertaining foreigners."

"It's more thanking them for all they've done for us," SH pointed out, and he made another growling sound.

"You've lost valuable days, days you should have been in your and North Hamgyong's provinces preparing our people for winter."

He said it like he was mad at her, despite being the one that gave her the orders.

"Everything is going well, Korea," she soothed.

As well as it could when not a single one of their towns hadn't been reduced to ashes, and their villages were swollen with refugees and dependent on supply lines that were constantly under attack.

"The harvest is almost all in, the autumn planting is mostly finished, and our comrades in my province are rallying the villagers to start kimchi-making, clearing roads, and getting everything else ready," she told him again, like she had when they gave their reports at dinner yesterday. "And even the North Hamgyong organs are carrying everything out diligently."

That 'even' was not a dig at certain people she couldn't avoid naming because he shared one with the province she'd been in. It was because they'd had so many left deviations in the Party branch there, and that issue with his former Provincial People's Committee chairman. That was all.

Flicking away the glimmer of anger she felt at the thought of that person, she said gently, "Our people will be fine, Korea."

Most of them would be anyway.

She reached out a hand, but he flinched back from it. By the way he tensed, she knew he'd done it more noticeably than he'd meant to.

She had to get better at that. She knew he must feel awful, he didn't need her making his burns worse. She'd managed to resist hugging him on Foundation Day because of them, but it was harder to control the instinctive comfort she wanted to give him.

"They still could have used you there," he muttered as she withdrew her hand.

"I did work here, too," she told him. "I didn't just practice all the time."

She'd visited their railway workers, donated blood, and worked on her posters, churning out more designs of Yankee soldiers murdering civilians and getting their 'brains' smashed in by the KPA.

Conveniently, she forgot to tell Korea most of them had been rejected. 'Too gory' again. Which was why she finally had a suitable one to hang in the bunker.

"And it's really nice that you are thinking about this," she said. "It's sweet."

His eye flared, and he snapped, "It isn't 'sweet.' It needs to be done."

She closed the jaws of her trap. "Then it's a good thing I was here to do it."

He hunched, glaring recalcitrantly off to the side.

"...Whatever. It's already over."

"Not until tonight." SH looked to the side, hearing more voices echoing down the rough stone halls. "Oh, the banquet guests are arriving. We should get in there."

Korea shifted slightly, eyeing the door to the vacant meeting room.

She didn't attempt to touch him again. Just smiled as she stepped in front of it.

"Don't you think?"

Her Countryhuman glowered at her, but looked away like he hadn't been considering it.

"Let's go."

"Do you think you could-?"

But he was already gone, leaving SH to finish tiredly, "Eat something this time."

He'd refused breakfast again this morning. And dinner last night. And asking Liaotung (casually) had confirmed he'd barely been eating at the Amnok River, sneaking his rations into the other workers' sacks when he thought no one was looking.

She had felt hopeful when he stumbled back into the clearing on Foundation Day somehow looking nauseous and as close to sated as he ever got at the same time, and stood there swaying and avoiding eye contact with her while China started to wash the dishes they'd brought back (SH had volunteered before long, since it looked like if she didn't, Korea wouldn't be sleeping). But it looked like he was still being like this.

'That just means I have to keep trying.'

She nodded confidently to herself, marching after Korea to join the Chinese at their celebration, hopefully the last one they would have to have in their country.

Or maybe it's only easy to reach out when you have an excuse.

Important to me that North acts like a weird little freak when it comes to acts of friendship. 'They hadn't spoken about that night' like they tore each other's clothes off in the throes of passion instead of China giving him a noodle.

With the acceptance that there will be three parts to this, I have done you the kindness of cutting this 13000+ word chapter into two. We get a rare shorter one today.

The phrase 'something wicked this way comes' has always been associated with that 'dark beast slouching towards Bethlehem to be born' line to me. I thought they were the same poem. No. I just remembered something wicked is from Macbeth, so I looked that poem up and I'm sure I have never heard it before. I don't know why I know that line.
And what rough beast, its hour come round at last / Slouches towards Bethlehem to be born?
I also thought it was some hardcore anti-Christian poem. But no. 'Tis about war.

Feast and Famine

The banquet was being held in the same mess hall the last National Day had- a natural cavern that had been expanded manually, the rock carved back and tamed. More work had been done in the year since, leaving it a friendlier space for sheltering civilians during air raids and hosting mass meetings. Extra decorations had been added in advance of the holiday. A scarlet carpet had been spread out in the hallway leading to it, flanked by China's five-star flag and their red-star one. More of them stood near the long tables set out inside, and hung from the walls. The number of lanterns drilled into the stone had doubled, and electrical lights were now placed overhead. The dark stone had had its rough-hewn edges covered by cheerful red banners with slogans written in white lettering in both Korean and Mandarin. 'HAPPY NATIONAL DAY TO OUR CHINESE COMRADES,' 'LONG LIVE KOREAN-CHINESE FRIENDSHIP,' and 'GLORY TO THE CHINESE PEOPLE'S VOLUNTEERS' were a few she saw.

She also saw, to her delight, that her painting had been used. The canvas was set up in a prominent location near the wooden stage at the back of the cavern, presiding over the tables along with a few others depicting scenes of Chinese and Korean soldiers.

Hers was a moment she'd witnessed in Mangyongdae when visiting the School for Bereaved Family of Revolutionary Martyrs. A PVA unit had been resting there on their way back from the front. One of the men had tried to go to sleep under the shade left by a ruined house, only to get shaken awake by an older woman and forcibly dragged over to her mostly intact one, where she'd made him sit next to her son, who looked to be home on leave, and ignored his protests to serve him a bowl of rice hash. In the painting, the Korean soldier had an arm around the Chinese one, both of them laughing in between bites of hash, while the mother in her choson-ot looked proudly on.

SH hadn't intended on painting it. Scenes like that just weren't encouraging her creative juices to flow lately. But she'd thought it was cute, and so saved it in her heart. And when the General Political Bureau of the army commissioned (well, it was for free, so maybe it was more like 'recruited') her a few months back to get something ready for China's National Day, with no inspiration coming from her own mind, she'd chosen that one. It had only been finished two days ago.

Some of the Chinese soldiers in the room were already gathered around it, praising the detail. SH (with a little strategic sidling) caught a few snatches of them reminiscing about their own experiences in their villages, praising their villagers' hospitality and laughing about how it seemed aunties were the same everywhere.

She gave a satisfied nod. That was what she wanted to inspire with her art. Pieces shouldn't just be looked at and admired, they should inspire feeling, and reflect the observer's own life.

Art wasn't about the art, it was about the people experiencing it. They shouldn't just look at her motivationals and appreciate the men and women with their burgeoning harvests and lush fields- they should think about their real comrades and how hard they were working to keep them all fed, so they would be inspired to work just as hard.

And her war posters shouldn't just strike anger in the witness. They needed to see the blood on the Yankees' hands and know that it wasn't just paint. Their neighbours and friends, their families, and all of their countrymen had been made to suffer because of them, because America couldn't just keep his hands to himself. All of the pale, blood-soaked ones in her art were his, and all of the crimson fluid splattered across them came from the well inside of SH that he and all of his puppets had filled with her people's blood.

Those left needed to see those crimes and not just feel rage, but know it. They needed to hate the Yankees as deeply as possible, so they would keep fighting. And so they wouldn't get complacent even after a ceasefire.

But it still wouldn't be enough. They could never hate the Yanks as much as they hated them.

Because they didn't, not truly.

It was a truth that made the dark thing growl, but one she'd understood a long time ago, lying in the dark and listening to someone else's breathing, a bite mark burning on her breast. Their puppets did, the southern troops. They hated them for the crimes Rhee's clique had told them the KPA had committed against their families, or because the world they wanted threatened their officers' privileges and powers. But not the foreigners.

None of the men in her cage had ever hurt her because they hated her. They hadn't- done any of what they had because of it. They had choked and beaten and bitten her, violated her not because they felt any hate in their hearts, but because they felt nothing at all.

Some men that hurt women might hate them. But the majority simply didn't see them as human. The hatred of them that was baked into almost every society in the world, or at least all those SH had ever heard of, wasn't born of true hatred, of the fury of being wronged or oppressed. It was born of apathy. The same apathy which Japan had stared through her with as he called her 'it' or 'the province.' Anything but what could mark her as a person.

His people had been the same way, as were the Yankees now. They didn't decimate their villages because they hated them, they didn't cut their electricity and scorch their fields because of it. They were told to hate them, and they did, in a way. But there was no feeling in it. No Yankee poster could ever rouse someone across the sea to gnash their teeth and shed bitter tears, because there wasn't truly anything to hate Korea for. The Yanks didn't hate them for what they had done, the majority didn't even hate them for what they believed because their hatred for Communism was the same- they were told to feel it, and so they did.

They hated them the way men hated women. For what they were- Communists, Koreans, foreigners- and not who they were. To them, there was no 'who.'

There was no such thing as 'too gory' when it came to their propaganda. Because no matter what horrors SH showed her people, no matter how hard she tried and succeeded at stoking their fires, it could never be enough. She was teaching them to hate people- their enemies taught the ones butchering them to hate things.

The thing inside of her uttered a low growl she felt resound in her clenched throat, and she suddenly realized it had a claw through the wall.

Anyway!- she beat at the appendage with her paintbrush- tonight was a celebratory night. The only thing anyone in here should be feeling was admiration for their Chinese comrades, and gratitude from them that their efforts were appreciated.

Even if it took a few too many coats of paint to seal the hole the shadow left.

She straightened up, smoothing the skirt of her dress uniform, before striding over to greet Deng Hua and the other officers with Korea (and make sure her cousins gave suitably polite greetings).

No North Hamgyong. Hm. Oh well! Maybe he'd gotten caught in a raid.

One couldn't hope. One also couldn't not hope. One felt nothing about him at all.

Deng Hua had a more cheerful face than Peng Dehuai (not a very high bar), but greeted her just as respectably. SH had heard that he'd been reluctant to take command of the PVA after Chen Geng, uncertain that he had the skill for it. But he seemed to have settled into the role well. He didn't seem to be on the verge of a nervous breakdown, at least.

After, she took her seat near the head of one of the long tables, covered with a cloth of good-quality fabric the colour of the banners on the walls. Like last year, Korea had scattered the provinces around the room so they could mingle with as many Chinese soldiers as possible. Also like last year, he'd seated her several tables over from where he would be sitting, so she couldn't coax him to eat.

She was also a couple seats down from South Pyongan, so she could rein her in if she got too rowdy. Her cousin was leaning over her chair, refusing to sit until she had to, already talking to some of the soldiers there.

"You comrades are from the 45th Division, yeah?"

"Yes, Comrade Province." The man across from her saluted. "134th Regiment, 4th Company, unit commander Ping Ziwei."

The 45th Division was in the 15th Army, if SH remembered right. They were on the front right now, down near the Kimhwa Triangle (she refused to call it the Iron one- she was not letting foreign men parts of her country as they pleased) and despite their neat uniforms, their slightly haggard faces and the scabbing cuts on them said they weren't new recruits on their way to join.

"Are you a model unit?" she asked, leaning over slightly.

"That's right, comrade." The commander flushed with pleasure, sitting up straighter. "My unit has had a perfect record ever since we came over last March."

They'd been here for the Fifth Phase Offensive then. SH debated asking if they'd recovered from their losses around the Hwacheon Reservoir to show she cared, but decided against it. It had been well over a year since then, and she already knew that they had. She didn't want him thinking she didn't, and was ignorant to how hard their allies were fighting.

"I've heard good things about the 15th Army," she said instead. "You've been holding out well against the Yankees near Pyonggang."

"Honoured to know we've been heard of," he said humbly. "But we don't deserve the praise. We've been losing ground recently. Just can't hold it with all those bombs."

SH's nails scraped at her thighs.

"But we won't get pushed back any further," a younger soldier with slightly shaggy hair promised from next to her. "We've got a maze of tunnels built, and a firm hold on a good position. And I hear the 38th Army is making a push to take back a key position soon."

SH exchanged glances with South Pyongan. 'Oops.'

His comrade across from him kicked him in the shin under the table. "Military confidentiality, Yang."

Yang winced, giving him an indignant look as he rubbed his calf. "It's not like I just told the cook. They're Korean Provincehumans!"

"No, your comrade is right." SH didn't want to get into the specifics of the Commands, not when the wall felt so fragile, so she said, "You never know who could be listening."

"Yeah," South Pyongan piped up. "Probably no Yanks, we'd see that fishbelly colour a ri away. But you never know when a traitor's lurking right around the corner."

The soldier jumped as she suddenly grabbed his shoulder, and he glanced over it instinctively, though there was just another table of soldiers there.

"You're right," he admitted shamefully. "My bad."

"Just be careful." SH gave him a reassuring smile, and his cheeks turned red.

"Yescomrade," he said quickly.

Sigh. She'd give him some allowance, just because he looked young enough for Korea to be his first combat experience. And because his comrade kicked him in the shin again.

The men's brief cross-table brawl (slapping fight) was interrupted by Deng Hua calling for his troops to sit down. The mingling PVA soldiers quickly headed for their seats with militant discipline as he began to address them, giving them praise for their efforts and passing on Peng Dehuai's from where he was still recovering in China.

SH subtly looked around as he spoke, finding her other cousins. Chagang was seated at the foremost table next to the stage, waiting for Korea to sit at the head, North Pyongan was at a round corner table with Laioxi (masked), Hae and Liaotung (also masked) were sitting behind her with another frontline unit, Hwang was also near the stage with a few political officers, and Kangwon had actually left the hospital for once, and was with a group of Chinese medics near the door, where he'd been trading field treatment experience, and probably setting up a blood delivery.

Really? Korea had told them all to make sure to be on time, but someone still wasn't here.

It was probably because she'd reminded all of them to be punctual, too, before they went their separate ways this morning, so now he was purposefully disobeying Korea's order just to feel like he was disobeying her. How immature could someone be?

She bet if she confronted him about it, he would find some way to twist it into her being responsible for his absence, like she hadn't just wanted everyone to be respectfully on time to celebrate their comrades' National Day and China's birthday. He'd blame it on her, just like he did with everything.

'You should know. It's your fault.'

The fabric of her skirt bunched between her fingers as the wall creaked menacingly, pressure mounting against it from the other side no matter how much paint she soaked it with. She was only able to gain a reprieve when the General's voice boomed around the hall, drawing her full attention back to the stage.

He'd taken Deng Hua's place, giving a brief speech thanking their comrades for their aid, and lauding the recipients of the Soldier's Medal of Honour in the room, both the current holders and the ones that would hold it after tonight.

Some people had feelings about foreigners getting one of the highest awards in their country, the highest for the Hero of the Republic title bestowed upon Peng Dehuai. That person was an idiot who had incorrect feelings about everything, though. Everyone else in the country was solely touched that thousands of Chinese had done enough for their people and nation to be granted such a high honour.

SH kept her attention fully focused on the General and his warm words and warmer smile, using him to paint over the hole. Using him to paint harder when the door to the hall opened and someone came in, boots clomping on the stone floor.

She didn't look. She had spent years stupidly waiting to hear those footfalls coming up the hill. Maybe one day she'd finally be able to disassociate them with their owner, but it wasn't today.

Did he have to stomp? He was already late, the least he could do was come in quietly, with even a thimble of shame.

But she knew he didn't feel that. Not when he'd so easily blamed his mess and the mess that was him on her.

When the General was finished, Korea stepped onto center stage, surveying the room. SH surveyed him in turn, looking for signs of his lingering anemia, which he still hadn't recovered from (wonder why?). But his legs were solid, and his hands were hidden behind his back.

"Ever seen a Countryhuman in person before?" South Pyongan asked the soldiers under the cheers and whistles of the crowd greeting theirs.

"Actually, yeah," Yang said cheerfully. "We met Comrade Korea after your Liberation Day, right Liu?"

"Came down to the front to see how we were doing," Liu supplied from the other side of the table. "And bring us some words from Comrade China."

SH's brows shot up as she traded looks with South Pyongan around Yang. Her cousin gave a little shrug, silently saying she hadn't heard about that either.

The Hamgyong had known he went to visit their section of the front (something that made her more than a little nervous), but she hadn't known he'd visited the Chinese divisions, too.

"He looked a bit rough, forgive me for saying, comrades," Ping Ziwei said, looking up at Korea on the stage.

SH couldn't exactly not forgive him for saying the truth. Even now Korea looked...

Her gaze flicked to him. He might not have any burns on his face, but he also had no bandages to hide the heavy shadow under his eye, or the sharp edges and hollows of his cheeks. And while more obvious signs of his anemia were hidden, the difference in shades between the flag above him and the one on his face wouldn't just be noticeable to an artist.

"But he insisted on meeting with us, even while we were under fire," the man continued.

"They say he visited the whole line without sleeping," Yang chimed in, eyes bright. "We even offered to let him rest, but he said he needed to make sure all of our comrades knew him and Comrade China were thinking of us."

'Without sleeping' was usually just a dramatic way of saying 'barely slept.' But SH knew for Korea it had almost definitely been literal.

'So he was travelling the front without Chagang and without sleeping. Great.' If she had hair, he would make it fall out.

But as even more nervous as that made her, it was still...

"You've got a good country there," Ping Ziwei praised, and SH smiled.

"I know," she said softly, looking back at Korea as the raucous greeting quieted down.

"Comrades," he said, his voice echoing in the underground hall, the walls bouncing his words back like they wanted those gathered to hear it better. "In less than a month it will have been two years since the People's Volunteer Army crossed the Amnok River to

Korea."

SH shifted, folding her hands tight. Korea stood rigidly, keeping that same even oration.

"Many of you crossed after, either to launch the Fifth Phase Offensive or to shore up the front against the enemy onslaught, as they have striven to steal even more of my people's land during their stalling of the ceasefire negotiations." There was a tinge of darkness in his words, echoed by the thing behind the wall. "But regardless of when you came to our country, you have all performed outstanding feats on behalf of Korea in the time you have been here. If I were to honour every one of your comrades who deserved it here today, this room would be overflowing, and the front would be undefended."

The soldier on the other side of SH made an amused noise, thinking Korea was adding a bit of levity to the speech with a semi-joke, not knowing that he didn't exactly 'joke' ever, let alone for something like this.

"China came to Korea's aid in- a desperate time, when no one else would. And-"

His eye flicked down to SH, skirting to the other provinces around the room, and not for the first time, she thought it might be better if they didn't come to events like this. It might make it easier for him.

"-we will be forever grateful for that," he finished. "I have given nothing but praise for your army on my Liberation Day and Foundation Day, and to all three of your commanders, and Comrades Mao Zedong and Zhou Enlai. And to Comrade China."

A smile ghosted across SH's lips at the begrudging way he tacked on 'dongji' to their ally's name. Maybe she should give him a disappointed brow, but she was sure the Chinese couldn't hear it, and it was very Korea of him. Though...

She subtly glanced around, confirming it.

Where was China?

"I've given a thousand praises and I could give a thousand more," Korea said soberly. "But they might mean more coming from someone else."

He lifted his head, his gaze travelling over the sea of heroes, and SH instinctively followed it, just as the doors at the back of the hall flew open. When she saw who stood silhouetted in the frame, she stood up out of shock, a number of Chinese following her.

"Hello, comrades," China said, smiling as he moved into the room. "Happy National Day."

He was dressed in the same slim black dress uniform he'd worn on Liberation Day, that SH hated to admit he wore incredibly well (and had refused to out loud when he tried to bait her to), the golden threading and red stars reflecting the glow of the lamps next to the entrance in shining pinpricks, and his leather boots polished to a gleam even in the dim light.

And he wasn't wearing a mask.

SH swung to look at Korea, though her mind had already put together that he must have sanctioned this. And she was right. He didn't look shocked or worried, or murderous, the way he had when China had first revealed himself to her and her cousins. He almost appeared relieved instead, and had already retreated out of the spotlight.

She would admit- she had a tiny moment where she wondered if he had orchestrated this solely to escape bearing the main responsibility of thanking the PVA.

But as the faces of the men and women around her transformed from stunned to delighted, eyes glowing like the stars on their Countryhuman's flag as they realized that it was really him, that he was here, she dismissed it.

Korea didn't run from responsibility. He had given China permission to reveal himself because he thought their foreign comrades deserved to see him, to know that he was here with them, even if they couldn't know how long he had been here with them.

To think anything else was the kind of cynicism a certain other person would have had, and probably did where he was standing in the shadows off to the side of the door. That it had even flickered across her mind shamed her.

"Comrade China!" someone across the room called, half a question and half a breathless exclamation.

"Yours sincerely."

China padded forward, differently than usual. He used his hips less, not moving in that sinuous glide that reminded SH of a ribbon being drawn through the air, but striding assertively, more like Korea moved. In fact...

She narrowed her eyes. It was a lot like Korea moved.

The Chinese country marched past his soldiers, casting a winning smile at one man as he brushed by, mounting the stage at the back and practically spinning into the limelight. Korea took another step away, clearly thinking about sneaking off and joining the General offstage, but China reached out without looking, taking his hand and tugging him in, not letting go.

SH recognized the sudden blank look on Korea's face. It was the one he wore when Hae would glomp him in public, or she would link their arms. He wanted desperately to shove the other man away, but couldn't in front of all the onlookers. He was effectively paralyzed.

"Comrades!" China called, the word flying like a songbird up to the stone ceiling. "No words can express how it lightens my heart to finally meet with my volunteers! Not a day has gone by where I haven't thought about my comrades fighting so bravely across the Yalu."

He was speaking differently, too. The silk in his voice had roughened slightly, his fingers running over cotton now instead. It wasn't enough to make him sound like a completely different person, like he did sometimes when he sang, but it was enough for SH to think if she heard it over a telephone, she wouldn't immediately be able to place that it was him.

"Comrade China!" one of the political officers called out, concern colouring the name. "We're honoured to see you, but you shouldn't be here. America is still trying to claim you've been fighting in Korea."

China waved his free hand dismissively. "I'm well aware that our enemy has been persisting with his slander. I held back from our comrade's invitation to his Foundation Day-"

Korea shot him a look.

"-and kept my presence unobtrusive on his Liberation Day for that very reason. But this is our day, the day China's freedom was truly declared, one my soldiers have chosen to spend away from their homeland, fighting for that of our neighbours. You deserve to be celebrated for that, don't you think?" China half-turned his head to smile at Korea before looking back out at his comrades. "And should a free country bend to the whims of a paper tiger and neglect his people out of fear?"

"No!" one table roared, winning a toothy smile from him.

"Exactly," their country crowed. "If China let the disapproval of a few puppets stop him from marking the day his soldiers fought so arduously for, then we wouldn't have it at all. And if the United Nations sees fit to waste both of our time and take me to trial again, then I'll just have to prove my innocence once more. They can't punish an innocent man for a crime he never committed."

They could. They were punishing Korea for the 'invasion' they had laid at their feet. SH had no doubt that even if China was innocent, it wouldn't matter.

And he wasn't.

She could tell Korea was thinking the same thing. He subtly tried to pull his hand free, but only got it trapped more thoroughly.

"And so long as I get back before midnight, not even our antagonist can complain," China said impishly. "That isn't anywhere near enough time to heap all the praise I'd like to on all of you, but it is enough to at least share part of our National Day together." His voice softened slightly. "And the rest can come after you come home."

SH had to look down at the tablecloth as Yang sucked in a sharp breath.

Thousands of soldiers perished at the front every day, even without offensives planned. And America's recesses hadn't stopped.

"I had to come today," China said, his voice tender without being quiet. "Because every day, you give your lives for me and our comrades. Every day you're fighting with all your strength for our joint Liberation, and to Reunify Korea the way you Reunified China, and will one day Reunify us completely. And because even with all your courage and will, every day might be your last. If I couldn't spare even one to make sure you knew none of it went unappreciated, then the pamphlets our enemy showers you with would be true."

SH realized that she'd become familiar enough with their ally to wait for him to add something like 'And I would hate to let him be right about anything.' But he didn't.

"I would spare every day, if I could," China told them. "I would be here, fighting by your side, just as we fought against the Japanese and the Nationalist cliques together. But I can't."

The regret behind the words was like an open wound, causing SH's heart to squeeze for him, before she remembered he was a liar and he quite literally had been here for almost two years now.

'Dangerous.' She thought she understood how he'd convinced the UN he wasn't guilty.

"I have no choice but to work with our comrades on the homefront to make sure our country is shaped into one you're proud to come home to," he continued. "And leave you in the capable hands of our Comrade Deng. And our Comrade Korea."

Korea straightened as focus shifted to him, along with China's smile.

"This may only be our second meeting," the Chinese country lied. "But he sends me letters frequently, and all of them are filled with the highest praise for our People's Volunteers, and concern for your well-being."

Korea hunched slightly, eye twitching as he clearly fought not to glare at him.

"He's going to kill him tonight," South Pyongan inched over to whisper in her 'ear.'

That... was probably true. Hopefully SH could talk him out of it. He didn't need to aggravate his burns any more.

"As our comrade trusted us to come to his people's aid, I have nothing but trust in his care for you." China raised his head, smiling proudly. "Just as I trust that we made the right decision in coming here, and that I made the right decision the day I placed my faith in our Communist Party, and myself in your hands. This day is the third anniversary of the day it was proven that that faith and trust weren't misplaced."

His smiled softened, eyes dipping at the edges. "But I never doubted that they weren't."

An older soldier made a strangled sound before glancing away, pressing his fist over his mouth, the way men did when they were trying not to cry. China smiled kindly at him, then looked at Korea. SH's Countryhuman hesitated, and she thought he might stay silent.

But then his throat flexed, and he said, "And I don't doubt that the fires of this war have forged the relationship between Korea and China's people into one of unyielding steel. That you are spending another National Day in lands foreign to you, fighting for people whose language not all of you understand, isn't something that goes unappreciated. No matter what happens, Korea will never forget that when the world was against us, China-'s people stood with us."

'No matter what happens.'

SH swept that behind the wall, one corner of her lips lifting. He'd be happy to know the Mandarin he was speaking in hadn't conveyed his hesitation properly. He'd be less happy to know that her Korean translation had clearly captured his 이 changing to 의.

"To the end, Comrade Korea!" Ping Ziwei shouted, holding his glass up. "'Go ahead bravely for the millions of Koreans, to destroy the enemy of our fallen comrades!'"

SH recognized the quote from their informational debriefs. It was from the diary of the Chinese soldier that had drowned saving one of their village children. Korea clearly knew it, too.

"And win the War to Resist American Aggression and Aid Korea!" China called back, thrusting their linked hands in the air. "Long live Korea and China's friendship!"

Korea had startled when his arm was suddenly dragged up, but he recovered to shout, "Long live the joint struggle against Imperialism!"

"And-" China's teeth flashed as his eyes squinched up. "Happy National Day, comrades."

The moment his words finished falling into them, the hall erupted, the Chinese soldiers whistling and shouting stormy *"URA"*s with all their might, filling the cavern with echoes of joy as they stomped their boots and clapped their hands.

China beamed, still holding Korea's hand up, the other raised like he was about to sweep them both down into a curtain call bow.

It certainly made a picture, both of the men standing with their shoulders back and heads up under their flags crossed high on the wall, and between the long banners that flanked them, proclaiming 'LONG LIVE KOREA' and 'LONG LIVE CHINA' respectively. Korea's white uniform gleamed like fresh-fallen snow and China's black garb glistened like ink, but their epaulets and pins glittered in matching crimsons and golds. China's skin also complemented Korea's nicely (though maybe SH was biased, crimson and navy being the dominant colours on their flag).

If, theoretically, she did paint something for China after the war was over, it would make for a gorgeous piece. Though she would brighten her Countryhuman's complexion, and remove the bandages wrapped around his fingers to better showcase the contrast where they linked with China's.

He was being a good sport about it, too, not trying to- Ah. No. She'd looked closer and could see he was squeezing China's hand back too hard, his arm slightly quivering with the strain, like he was trying to break his fingers. It was the other country who was being a good sport.

SH internally sighed. 'Korea.'

Maybe she shouldn't paint it for China. Her Countryhuman probably wouldn't like the idea of someone else having a portrait with him in it. But she used the few moments as her country stood on the stage with their comrade, hands woven together and held up like a torch, to burn the image into her mind anyway. If she-

She would get a chance to paint it. The war would be over by next year.

They would have a ceasefire, at least.

On stage, China finally lowered their hands, loosening his grip. SH was too far away to scold Korea for how he cringed away, holding his wrist like the foreigner had been the one trying to snap his bones. At least he only did it for a second, and the Chinese were focused on their own Countryhuman, swarming him as he jumped lightly off the stage.

Most of them weren't as handsy as their people were with Korea, constraining themselves to taking his hand or patting his shoulder, like they were reassuring themselves he was real, but a few, some of the officers she recognized from being stationed around Pyongyang, that had been in the theatre on Foundation Day, were more bold, wrapping him in embraces. One even grabbed him by the back of the neck, pulling him in to touch their foreheads together, and China easily bent to let him, closing his eyes as he leaned in.

It looked like the Chinese really didn't find the way the Koreans treated Korea on holidays so strange after all.

"Are you not taking off your mask?" she asked the person that had come to stand beside her.

Liaotung looked at the crowd of people surrounding the stage, her snowy eyes wistful under her crimson scarf. "We're not as good of actors as him. We can't risk someone connecting Liao Juān and Liao Shī to Liaotung and Liaoxi."

"I'm sorry."

There was always a yearning, watching Korea with their people. Not to be touched in the same way, but to be embraced by their presence. For SH it was always fulfilled when their comrades were finished with their Countryhuman, and would come to thank her for her efforts and compliment her on her art. But the Chinese provinces couldn't satisfy that yearning. It must leave them with an unbearable ache. Especially when they had only been able to celebrate two of their National Days as themselves before this.

"Don't be," Liaotung said softly, eyes still fixed on her people. "We chose this. And we'll get to be with them one day."

One day.

SH squeezed her comrade's arm comfortingly, and she gave her a grateful smile before retreating to her table again, leaving her people to revel with her Countryhuman.

Korea had slunk off stage, going to stand to the side, next to the General. The man was watching their allies fondly. Neither he nor Deng Hua had seemed surprised to see China maskless either.

He looked over at Korea as he loomed next to him, holding his wrist again. SH got to witness her Countryhuman give a sideways glance to the man, who reached over to pat his hand. Only then did he remove it behind his back, like it had been cleansed.

Her country really was something.

The awarding of medals was even more exuberant than last year, the more somber mood of ceremony dispersed by the constant chatter of the Chinese soldiers talking amongst each other, sometimes just repeating the same thing in different ways, little ripples of incredulous delight that spread through the room. "Comrade China is here, he actually came to visit us, he's here."

The Soldier's Medals of Honour and the Orders of Freedom and Independence were theirs to give out, but China stood next to Korea as he pinned the heavy gold medals to their chests, and pressed the multi-coloured ribbons into their palms. SH could tell the contact made him uncomfortable, but he was bearing it well.

The Chinese didn't have their own medals. Liaotung had said their Party leadership considered the system as promoting harmful individualism. SH didn't agree with that view- in her experience, medals and honours just encouraged people to work and fight harder, aiding and inspiring their comrades in the process- but it was one she understood. She was just glad they were okay with being honoured the way they used in Korea.

Deng Hua gave his personal congratulations to each of them, too, and so did China. Every soldier, male or female, infantry or engineer, got pulled into his embrace as soon as Korea was done pinning them. He held each of them tightly, and even though the embraces weren't long, SH got the sense they all ended reluctantly.

It was strange to think that so many foreigners would be carrying one of the most prestigious awards in their country. When the war was over the Chinese would take them home to display on their mantles, or hide away in a box somewhere if they shared their Party's view of honours. The Soldier's Medal of Honour had been designed just after the war broke out, only made with the expectation that it would be their own soldiers wearing it, a few hundred given out in the short time it would take to reach Busan. But now there would be thousands of Chinese soldiers heading back across the Amnok River with a piece of their country pinned over their hearts.

She wondered if that was why Korea's jaw looked so tight.

When the ceremony was over, the food was brought out, and SH had to compose herself.

It was similar fare to the last National Day, simple but nutritious. Chicken-ginger soup that SH yearned for, though she knew her own would be a little lacking, fresh kimchi made with recently harvested cucumbers, patkalguksu (the red beans in the patjuk had been a big hit last year), and rice, of course. But the sudden smell of meat and rich broth made her mouth tingle.

"Oi." South Pyongan almost jumped out of her seat to grab SH before she could hustle off to help the cooks set the tables. "Uh-uh, no way. We're guests at this banquet. And what do guests do?"

"Eat the food," SH answered reluctantly.

"Yeah, that's what I thought." Her cousin forcibly pushed her back down into her chair. "No relapsing."

"Helping our comrades isn't exactly the same as... what we talked about." She glanced around, not wanting to elaborate, but their Chinese tablemates were all still clustered around their Countryhuman.

"Yeah, and having a little bit of soju isn't the same as having a bottle," South Pyongan retorted. "Sit and stay, cuz."

SH pouted slightly, eyeing the women as they set the plates and bowls of food on the tables. She couldn't resist taking hers directly from the comrade that came to give them theirs, helping her with the rest, too.

"Addict," her cousin judged once they were alone.

"This looks delicious, doesn't it?" she asked innocently.

"Total addict."

"Comrades," China called, voice rising above his admirers'. "Why don't you enjoy our Korean comrades' hospitality? I won't go anywhere. Well, not so long as the food is good."

His soldiers laughed and dispersed to their chairs, drawn by the smell of the steam wafting off their bowls. They started to eat right away, shovelling food into their mouths, in a rush to get back to spending time with their Countryhuman.

China walked over to a table, confidently perching on the edge of someone else's chair, the man eagerly making room for him, offering him a bite of chicken from his own chopsticks, which his Countryhuman took to the sound of cheers, the other men crowding in to feed him.

'Vulture,' SH decided, turning to her own meal.

"Comrade South Hamgyong," Yang said from around a mouthful of rice. "Where's your chicken?"

SH pulled her bowl of soup closer. Unlike his, which had chunks of shredded white meat floating in it, hers only had scallions and jujube floating in the cloudy liquid, and was smaller. Her spot of the table was also missing the thick red slurry and knife-cut noodles of the patkalguksu.

"This is our Chinese comrades' day," she said brightly. "We've saved all the good bits for you."

She didn't tell them the truth- that they needed to ration every bit of food that the could for winter. But it wasn't like the Chinese were unaware. Yang looked down at his bowl, guilt flickering across his eyes.

"It's okay," SH assured him, even though samgyetang was one of her favourite dishes. It was what Kim Jong-suk had made for her that night in her cabin. "This is more than enough."

Yang frowned. After a moment of hesitation, he plucked a piece of meat out of his bowl and tried to place it in hers.

"Oh no." SH blocked it with her hand. "It's okay, really."

"I'll take it if she doesn't want it," South Pyongan volunteered, leaning back in her chair. Then at SH's look, said, "Okay, fine, never mind," and returned to attacking her own soup.

Yang's chopsticks didn't retreat. "Your food situation isn't good right now, right?"

No. Especially not after the floods. SH hadn't got the calculations from Hae yet, but they were at a point where any loss of farmland could be disastrous.

"But you're generous enough to share what you have with us," the Chinese soldier continued. "Just like your civilians." His gaze went to her painting, then back to her. "I couldn't keep my meal down if you didn't get to have even a little meat."

SH watched the broth drop from the piece of white meat, a small dark stain blooming over the crimson tablecloth underneath.

She had to swallow back her saliva before she moved her hand away, consenting. "Alright. But just one piece."

Yang placed it in her bowl, satisfied.

"And just one piece for Comrade South Pyongan," South Pyongan said hopefully. "Maybe two because she's so awesome?"

SH gave her cousin a dry look, but her shamelessness seemed to win their Chinese comrades over, as Ping Ziwei and the man beside her both slipped her chicken from their bowls, which she greedily shoved directly in her mouth, making a noise you shouldn't in polite company, but SH was too far away to nudge her for.

And she knew she'd have to restrain herself to avoid making the same one. Though she was saving her chicken for last, as it was the best part.

She chatted with the Chinese soldiers, learning their full names. Liu Tao was from Liaotung, and had signed on towards the end of the civil war, only seeing a few battles, and Ping Ziwei was a veteran of the anti-Japanese struggle. Yang Xiaolong was from the Sichuan region, all the way in the south, and Korea was his first time seeing combat, like she expected.

"Why did you join the army?" she asked curiously, and he rubbed the back of his head.

"Oh, y'know, I just thought it would be cool to be a soldier."

"Oh, what's this?" Liu Tao raised his thick brows. "That's not what you told me."

Ping Ziwei leaned over to smack him upside the skull. "Don't give some bullcrap answer to an allied general."

Yang Xiaolong winced, clicking his tongue. "Alright, alright. I joined because..." He tapped his forefingers together, looking down at his bowl. "I really hated to think that Korea still wasn't free when China was. You won your war before we did, so it just seemed... unfair that we'd be truly Liberated before you." His voice got more muttery. "I wanted to help."

"Now there's a better answer," someone purred from behind them, and SH startled.

Yang Xiaolong startled even more, jumping to his feet and whirling around into a salute. "Comrade China!"

He bumped against his chair, almost falling backwards, only saved by his Countryhuman precisely grabbing him by his collar and righting him.

"At ease, comrade," he said lightly. "No need to hurt yourself over me."

The man's cheeks were painted almost as red as his country's as he ducked his head.

"And there's no need to be afraid of sincerity," China added. "No hearts were ever moved by disaffection."

'Aren't you disaffected most of the time?' SH wondered wryly.

But not when he was singing, she supposed. Or on the stage just now.

"Mm," she agreed. "It means a lot more to us that you came because you wanted to help, and not just to wield a gun."

"Even if it is embarrassing that you said it out loud," South Pyongan teased, earning a look from her cousin.

'If you want to talk embarrassing, I seem to remember you saying some pretty sincere stuff to me.'

South Pyongan made a face. 'Never bring that up.'*

"Don't listen to her," SH soothed Yang Xiaolong. "It's never embarrassing to care."

"R-Right," he stuttered, scarlet spreading to the rest of his face.

Sigh. Again.

SH suddenly realized that she was standing next to a foreign Countryhuman she 'didn't know well,' and hadn't even addressed him. She hurriedly turned, going to incline her head in a slight bow, but China placed a finger against her brow, stopping her.

"We've already met once, comrade," he said with a smile. "We're allies in the fight against Imperialism, so there's no need to be overly formal."

SH glanced sideways, finding Korea watching them with his eye narrowed. Even though it was only polite for a Provincehuman to bow to a foreign Countryhuman (they did it with CCCP after all), she had a feeling he wouldn't exactly be thrilled with her doing it to China at this stage, even if it was just for an act. And she probably wouldn't be the one receiving his ire for it.

"Of course," she said with what she hoped wasn't an overly-familiar smile. "I just didn't want to be impolite."

"What's a bit of impoliteness between friends?" China asked innocently. "Even though our acquaintance was brief, with how much your Countryhuman sings your praises to me, I feel like I know you as well as one of my own provinces."

SH knew Korea did not sing any of the provinces' praises to him, let alone in their fake letters. It was probably why he was showing her off tonight, to make up for withholding from bragging.

"Oh?" she said with the polite interest of someone who didn't know he was lying.

"En," China replied. "He's always going on about his talented little artist. Did you know our Comrade South Hamgyong actually created that big painting over there?" he said to his soldiers, gesturing at her canvas.

Yang Xiaolong's eyes widened. "You painted that?"

SH dipped her head demurely, and he exclaimed, "It's amazing!

"It isn't that good," SH denied.

"You kidding?" Liu Tao raised an eyebrow. "It looks just like one of those colour photographs."

"Better," Ping Ziwei appraised. "The colours look more real. When I looked at it I could've sworn we were walking through one of the villages we passed on the way here."

"I'm not-"

"What do we say when someone compliments us for something we don't suck at?" South Pyongan interrupted, coming over to take her by the back of the arms.

SH sighed. "Thank you," she said, which was still more humble than what her cousin would have. "But I haven't been painting very-"

"Nope, 'thank you,' full-stop."

SH blew out a puff of air, making the men chuckle.

"There we go, comrade," China said, smiling. "Humility never moved hearts either."

"I think some of your comrades over there want to talk to you." SH gestured vaguely across the room.

China followed the motion like there was actually a destination to it. "I believe you're right. Well comrades, enjoy the rest of your meals."

Yang Xiaolong saluted again, sitting back down to finish his patkalguksu with renewed vigour.

"By the way," China murmured into her 'ear,' making her twitch. "I can't help but notice that your Countryhuman's place setting is empty."

SH nodded to show she'd noticed, too, and he dipped his head, gliding away to another table.

She didn't entirely like that it felt like she was collaborating with China to get Korea to eat, but it was... nice that he genuinely seemed to want him to.

She knew she had to finish her own food first, or her Countryhuman would accuse her of wasting it if she approached. So she quickly returned to it, finishing off her cucumber kimchi, soaking up the last of the broth with a few spoonfuls of rice, plucking the scallions clinging to the sides of her bowl like scraps of emerald fabric into her mouth, and finally nibbling delicately on the piece of chicken, stopping herself from biting the ends of her chopsticks off with it.

She took a moment to savour it. They hadn't got to eat samgyetang on the hottest days this year, obviously, but the amount of people in the cavern had turned it slightly warm, so she could pretend.

Then she got up, giving South Pyongan a slight incline of her head towards their Countryhuman. Her cousin (mouth full of rice) raised her fist under the table. 'Go get 'em.'

SH made her way across the room. Korea pretended he didn't see her coming.

The General had left after the medal-giving ceremony, but that didn't affect her strategy much. She had never seen him try to make Korea eat, only ask her to, even though she was sure he was one of the only people that would have more success at it than her or her cousins. The only person now that Kim Jong-suk was gone.

Chagang had used to eat very meanderingly, finishing long after most of them. But recently he'd started eating with a militant swiftness, so his bowls were already clear, neatly stacked for a kitchen aid to take. He was talking to the soldiers next to him, but he gave her a brief glance as she approached.

'I tried.'

She let him know it was okay with her eyes. 'My turn.'

"Korea," she said brightly, stopping next to him.

"No." The word was flat, and he didn't look at her.

The room was loud, and Deng Hua's seat on his left was empty, the commander taking the opportunity to confer with his political officers farther down the table, but she still kept her voice low.

"It's a banquet. It looks strange if you don't eat anything."

"It is a banquet for the Chinese," he said stonily. "Not me."

"People are noticing." She was sure they had.

Korea's hands tightened on his thighs. "I'm not hungry."

SH didn't let her eyes flick to see how his knees were trembling slightly, even though he was sitting down. "You didn't eat this morning."

His nails sank into his legs. "South Hamgyong. Go."

She sighed, exchanging looks with Chagang.

'I will keep trying,' his slightly dipping eyelids promised.

'Good luck.'

She returned to her seat, where South Pyongan was dramatically recounting her epic tales of military conquest. Since if SH opened her mouth, she would have to tell the truth, she kept quiet, keeping her counter of exaggerated or outright false details to herself, and keeping her eye on Korea.

Until he shot her a glare from across the heads between them. Then she suddenly found other things to watch while she waited for him to cool off.

The hall echoed with the sounds of laughter and cheers, pulling SH's attention to Hae, giggling as the men around her regaled her with tales from the front. There was Hwang, hunched over a booklet of some sort with one of the political officers, Kangwon, talking seriously at the table of medics, and North Pyongan with the Liaos, laughing about something or other.

Just by coincidence, SH's gaze drifted near the door. Her light mood curdled slightly as she saw who was standing there.

North Hamgyong had sat at his table for less than ten minutes (she'd happened to notice), wolfing down his portion of food before retreating to the shadows again, standing there with his arms crossed.

Didn't he know how unfriendly that made him seem? No, he definitely knew. That was why he was doing it.

He was looking up at the electrical lights, which did nothing to illuminate the dark look on his face. She bet he was grinding his teeth over 'wasting electricity' instead of being glad that they'd repaired their power stations enough that they could lighten this cavern for a brief two hours.

Somewhere behind her, a group of soldiers broke into song, led by China's clear, resonant voice.

They had even more to be thankful to the Chinese for than some of their cousins. The Battle of Lake Changjin had taken place in her province, where tens of thousands of Chinese soldiers had given their lives to repel the Yankee advance, freezing to death in the sub-zero weather. It was their sacrifices that had allowed the KPA divisions in North Hamgyong's province to push down the coast without fear of being flanked, and they'd been there when Hungnam was decimated and freed.

That was probably why he hated them so much. Because they had helped free her province. Just like he hated Korea for freeing her. Just like he hated-

His eyes flicked to hers, like he felt them burning into him, and SH quickly looked away, before he could confirm they were.

She trembled slightly, fists grinding into the bandages around her thighs as she took deep breaths, trying to paint the dark thing back. It had punctured the wall again, something it had been managing with increasing ease, as easily as she could slide a pin though a piece of soggy mulberry paper. She could feel it leaking out, the claw turning to viscous black fluid as it seeped into the rest of her mind.

The singing, beautiful before, turned sharp and sour, stabbing at her ear drums and encouraging the thing to scrabble at the wall with its hind claws, trying to widen the breach. Her light meal churned in her stomach.

She hated that he could still make her feel this way, no matter how hard she worked to keep him out of her mind, refusing to think about anything he'd ever stabbed her with, pretending that all of Hamgyong was hers as she spoke with his villagers, that Korea had came to his senses and given it all to her, that he'd...

She didn't want to think about him that way. She didn't want to think about him at all. She wanted to paint him behind the wall with everything else, to trap him with the dark thing and keep it away from her.

Why did he have to make it so difficult?

When she looked back, he was gone.

The surge of anger left her, allowing her to shove the ink back with ink paints, brushing it back behind the barrier, sealing it over with Chinese bayonets dripping with foreign blood.

It still felt too thin. She could feel the rancid darkness pressing against the wall, the way its sides rose and fell, pushing at the concrete like it was alive, too, like it was part of it.

"Uh, SH?"

She flinched as someone spoke in her ear slit, hand automatically seizing the sharp metal chopsticks on the table.

"Whoa, no stabbing." South Pyongan raised her hands, quickly leaning down to mutter, "Something's going on with Korea."

SH looked up, alarmed.

Korea looked like he was still sitting normally at the table, but she knew her Countryhuman well enough to see the signs that he wasn't feeling normal at all. His eye was darting around in its socket aggressively enough to see, and the cords on his neck were straining as he sank down in his chair, his shoulders starting to rise like a cat's hackles. It was the look he got when he felt like he was under attack, even though no one seemed to be talking directly to him.

Chagang hadn't noticed, and was facing away from her so she couldn't alert him. She stood up, prepared to hustle over, but Korea beat her to it, shooting out of his chair and taking off, walking too fast to be casual. In a flash, he'd left the hall, the wooden door slamming closed behind him.

SH winced as people glanced over. Kangwon half-stood, but she silently let him know she would handle it.

She couldn't follow right away, or their comrades might think something was wrong. So she hurried over to one of the cooks clearing a table, requisitioning another small bowl of soup. She was happy to give it to her- Korea had had to turn one down to her face.

With attention back on China, who had dragged more people into his impromptu concert, SH made a beeline for the door.

She raised her brows at Chagang as she passed. 'What happened?'

He subtly shook his head, looking almost ashamed. 'I don't know.'

SH hurried into the corridor, finding it empty. Before she ran outside to see if Korea had taken the GAZ and left them stranded again, she diverted down the dead end hall.

She could hear him from outside the thin door, an awful guttural gagging, though it didn't sound like anything was coming up.

'Probably because you haven't eaten anything,' she thought with a sharp pang of worry.

"Korea, are you in here?" she asked loudly. She opened the door slow, giving him time to hide anything he didn't want her to see.

"Go away," he growled, voice still thick.

He was off to the side of the door, near the wall. She thought he might have been leaning against it before she called out.

SH stepped in and away from the exit, giving him an open path to it.

"I brought you some soup," she said because she knew she couldn't say anything about what she'd heard.

His eye avoided the bowl in her hands like it was a blinding light.

"I don't want it."

"Yes you do," she said gently. "You just don't want to take it from someone else. But you're not."

"We lost almost nine ri of farmland," Korea snapped. "We can't afford to waste anything."

She had no idea how to make him see that him staying healthy and alive wasn't a waste. She never had. And she didn't think it would help to mention that she'd overheard the cooks talking about how Chinese Command had donated supplies to the banquet, for likely the same reason China hadn't told him about it- it would just make it worse.

So she fell back on the one strategy she had, stepping closer as she lifted the bowl towards him, imbuing her voice with all the pleading and care she could.

"Please?"

Korea's eye finally dropped to the broth, wavering as he stared at it. She almost thought she had him, but then he tore it away, hunching as he turned away from her.

"I can't," he rasped, and he sounded so helpless for a moment that SH lowered the bowl.

He took advantage of her shock to slip past her, out the door. By the time she recovered, darting after him, he was already gone.

SH stared down the hallway at the exit door, still shuddering in its frame, heart aching for her Countryhuman, and darkness roiling for what America had done to him, and all of them.

She wanted to go after him, but she knew when he was like this, it was better to give him space, even if she would rather try to comfort him. Even if 'this' was getting more severe than she was used to.

Reluctantly, she went back into the hall, to make sure Korea's absence would go unnoticed.

—

North spilled outside, barely glancing around to make sure no sentries were nearby before he threw himself behind the nearest outbuilding. He spat and retched, trying to get the stench of rich meat broth out of his 'nose,' and the look of pity on SH's face out of his mind.

Ssi-bal, why had she had to follow him? Why couldn't she just accept that he didn't want to eat and leave him alone? Why hadn't she put down the soup and-?

He growled to himself, spitting again, before drawing in deep breaths of mountain air, the dampness of loam, thin sunlight on the rocks, the crispness of the fading leaves, and distant scent of smoke from cooking fires.

It just reminded him that it was almost winter.

"If you can't stand giving them our food, then why do you fucking do it?"

North stiffened.

North Hamgyong was standing at the corner. He must have come around from the other side of the small brick building. He had a cigarette in his hand, a thin trail of smoke winding up from it, more acrid than the distant ones.

"I don't want to hear anything about how they don't deserve it," North growled, trying to pretend he hadn't thought he was alone. "China's soldiers are dying for us. The least we can do is feed them."

And that wasn't what had sent him reeling from the hall, even if the cloying smells of food and deafening chewing hadn't helped.

"Tch." North Hamgyong tapped his ashes over empty air.

North tried to compose himself, stifling his breathing and calming his heart. But the brief sprint and the way it had kicked up when SH cornered him had sent it pounding like a drum again, shaking his thin frame. He stood there rigidly, looking out into the close of trees around the hidden entrance to the hall, avoiding North Hamgyong's eyes.

He needed to get himself under control, he needed to stop letting his weakness overpower him in front of his provinces, and at all.

If he didn't, he would lose them.

He was about to order North Hamgyong to leave him alone when his province said, "And what are you carrying?"

The roar of blood in his ear slits had almost drowned him out.

North turned slightly, eyeing him warily.

"Your epaulets." North Hamgyong jerked his chin roughly at the shoulder boards. "If we have four billion tons on ours, how much are you carrying?"

North looked down at his epaulets.

The embroidered thread criss-crossed over the board, weaving a golden backdrop. Unlike his provinces with their two large stars on each, he only had one, small and red, that sat cradled between two sheaths of golden wheat, tied with a red banner with the name of the Republic on it, his name. They wrapped around the Supung Dam and its hydroelectric plant, the lake and mountain range beyond framed behind it.

There had been discussion about adding the dam to their state crest. It had been designed and orchestrated by the Japanese. Some of their rebuilt factories had been suggested instead.

But North had cast his vote for the Supung, which sealed the decision. It didn't matter if foreigners had drawn up the schematics and ordered the parts. His people had been the ones to build it, working to the bone to divert the water, haul the earth and break the rocks, pour the cement base and construct the concrete forms. They had built the largest dam and power station in all of Asia, the third largest in the world, producing enough electricity to power almost all of Korea. And they had done it under slavelike conditions.

The Supung Dam represented the heights the Korean people had reached even under Occupation. And the higher ones they could climb to if they were free.

The red star burned into his eye as he said to North Hamgyong, "A country's worth."

More than four billion tons, or the millions the Supung Dam held back. More than all their people's hopes. He had his provinces', too, and those of every single Korean that had ever lived, did live, and ever would live.

North Hamgyong considered the answer, back straight, as the ashes on his cigarette grew longer. Then he gave a short nod, and held it out to North.

He turned his head. "Come on. They need to see us in there."

For a moment, his province didn't follow. Then he did, footsteps limping over the leaf litter.

North paused by the door, a crushing weight trying to stop him from opening it. He looked down at his stars again, gritting his teeth.

Then he tore it open, and disappeared into the underground, North Hamgyong on his heels.

Happy Day of the Foundation of the Republic! I have once more strategically postponed this chapter until today.

One of my favourite SH facts is that when she says 'Korea really hates abstract art' in Safeway Pyongyang, she is purposefully not revealing that she also hates abstract art, and with even more passion than him. Her line of 'it's illegal here' (which I changed because it was intended to be an SHism, but I realized I was overestimating people and some might actually believe that) is because she wants it to be illegal and she wants Y/N to stop thinking about abstract art right now and never think about it again. She'll never say she hates abstract art, she'll use little artist critiques 'It exists for itself, not the observer; it alienates the masses; bourgeois degeneracy,' but she will get very passive-aggressive if you attempt to hold a conversation about it, and if she saw an abstract canvas she would likely crush whatever was in her hand.

Fun fact- the abstract art movement was utilized by America in the same way jazz was, as a counter-revolutionary cultural Trojan horse, ostensibly claiming that abstraction was 'freedom' compared to Socialist Realism, but in reality 'divesting' politics from art and art from meaning, turning it into something toothless while giving the lure of it teeth. Which is just more proof that even the most meaningless art of all is political.

Thinking about the stat that at the height of the American occupation of South Vietnam, there were twenty times more prostitutes than female doctors or other professionals, three to five hundred thousand, almost one for every American soldier. Thinking about the girl kidnapped by American soldiers who planned to keep her for five days before killing her because she would be 'good for morale.' They made her carry their supplies, raped her at the rest stop that she helped set up, then stabbed and shot her dead the next day, afraid their backup that got called in would see her with them and disapprove. And because she was sick after being raped, and that made her 'less alluring.' The men that did it were only punished because one soldier got loud about it and persisted through all the death threats he received from every level of the army. None of them served their full sentence. Her name was Phan Thi Mao.
They've made a movie out of it, portraying the one man that spoke out as a hero who tries to save her. He didn't try in real life. He offered flimsy protests and when those didn't work he walked away so he wouldn't have to see it. He listened to her screams and cries while it happened. And then he sat back and let her murder happen and only spoke out once she was dead. I haven't watched the movie myself, but it apparently ends with a Vietnamese girl in America, a girl who likely only lives in America because her homeland was ravaged by them, telling him his nightmare is over. His nightmare can end. Phan Thi Mao's family's never did after she was carried out of their house screaming in the dark of morning. She was never allowed to heal. Maybe I'd feel differently if I watched it but the book fucked me up enough. And it sounds to me like they made her tragedy about him.
These things happened at every level, and were almost always hidden. They were only exposed when someone got loud, and almost no one ever got loud. Because why would they? The Vietnamese were just gooks, not people. The men were for killing and the women were for fucking. These are their own words, they say it over and over in their own admissions. 'When somebody asks, 'Why do you do it to a gook, why do you do this to people?' your answer is, 'So what, they're just gooks, they're not people. It doesn't make any difference what you do to them; they're not human.'

Two of the men that raped her were Hispanic. The superior that told the man not to make a fuss when he first told him was black. The higher superior's only concern was that the man who reported it didn't get hurt by the other men, while keeping everything else quiet. Rapes happen in every army, but even a brief overview of the American army versus their enemies, the Viet Cong, the KPA, the PVA, objectively shows that for all of them, the incidents are down to individuals. But in the American army, it is ingrained in every one of their ranks and every one of their races. It is not a few bad seeds, it is the entire apple grown on Imperialism. In the American army, the man that speaks out is in the minority. And he is almost never a hero, only a bystander. And he is never the victim. No matter what he's been told to believe, how deeply he's been groomed to believe it, he stops being a victim the moment he takes the life of someone just defending their home, and lets a girl help tidy up the place he knows she's about to get gang-raped in.
That's what Vietnamese expats want for Vietnam again. That's what's happening to Thailand right now, if 'lesser.'

You can read David Lang's Casualties of War for the full sorry on Internet Archive. Even if he's far too sympathetic to the bystander, in my opinion.

https://archive.org/details/casualtiesofwar0000lang
You need an account to borrow. If you do, be warned. The event is terrible. It made me break down.

https://www.commondreams.org/views/2014/10/23/one-my-lai-month

https://www.latimes.com/news/la-na-vietnam6aug06-story.html

Vietnam and Korea were the same. They were mirrors. It's just that only one got to Reunify, and only one was ever truly acknowledged.